Tuesday's raid, at an apartment building rented by the United Nations to house 26 Palestinian families, appears to be the work of some component of the Iraqi police, said Ivana Vuco, a human rights officer with the U.N. mission in Baghdad.

The 17 men were held for about nine hours, accused of being terrorists and Hussein sympathizers. Another 13 Palestinians were detained the same day near the Baladiyat compound, Vuco said. Many of the families have expressed their intention to leave Baghdad.

"I don't think anything like this, to the same extent, has happened before," Vuco said of Tuesday's detentions.

When Luay Mohammed, an unemployed tailor, was being held Tuesday, someone struck him in the shoulder with the butt of an AK-47 assault rifle, he said. After he was dropped off near his apartment, he gathered his clothes and his mattress and set off with his family for the Baladiyat compound, to load up a bus and leave Iraq.

"We are really feeling terrified about what's going to happen," he said. "The only thing we want to do right now is survive."

Breaking The Clinch (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

Iraq is at the beginning of a civil war fought using the tactics of genocide, and it has all the conditions to get much worse. As a Newsweek correspondent, Christian Caryl, wrote recently from Baghdad, "What's clear is that we're far closer to the beginning of this cycle of violence than to its end." As John Burns of The Times said on "Charlie Rose" last night, "Friends of mine who are Iraqis — Shiite, Sunni, Kurd — all foresee a civil war on a scale with bloodshed that would absolutely dwarf what we're seeing now."

Iraq already has the warlord structures that caused mass murder in Rwanda, Bosnia, Sierra Leone and elsewhere. Violent, stupid men who would be the dregs of society under normal conditions rise amid the trauma, chaos and stress and become revered leaders.

They command squads of young men who leave the moral universe and have no future in a peacetime world. They kill for fun, faith and profit — because they find it more rewarding to massacre and loot than to farm or labor. They are manipulated by political leaders with a savage zero-sum mind-set, who know they must kill or be killed, and who are instituting strategic ethnic cleansing campaigns to expand their turf.

Worse, Iraq already has the psychological conditions that have undergirded the great bloodbaths of recent years. Iraqi minds, according to the most sensitive reporting, have already been rewired by the experiences of trauma and extreme stress.

Some people become hyperaggressive and turn into perfect killers. Others endure a phased mental shutdown that looks like severe depression. They lose their memory and become passive and fatalistic. They become perfect victims.

Amid the turmoil, the complexity of life falls away, and things are reduced to stark polarities: Sunni-Shiite or Shiite-Sunni, human-subhuman. Once this mental descent has begun, it is possible to kill without compunction.

In Rwanda, for example, the journalist Jean Hatzfeld interviewed a Hutu man who had killed his Tutsi neighbor. "At the fatal instant," the man recalled, "I did not see in him what he had been before. ... His features were indeed similar to those of the person I knew, but nothing firmly reminded me that I had lived beside him for a long time."

The weakness of the Bush surge plan is that it relies on the Maliki government to somehow be above this vortex. But there are no impartial institutions in Iraq, ready to foster reconciliation. As ABC's Jonathan Karl notes in The Weekly Standard, the Shiite finance ministries now close banks that may finance Sunni investments. The Saadrist health ministries dismiss Sunni doctors. The sectarian vortex is not fomented by extremists who are appendages to society. The vortex is through and through.

The Democratic approach, as articulated by Senator Jim Webb — simply get out of Iraq "in short order" — is a howl of pain that takes no note of the long-term political and humanitarian consequences. Does the party that still talks piously about ending bloodshed in Darfur really want to walk away from a genocide the U.S. is partly responsible for? Are U.S. troops going to be pulled back to secure bases to watch passively while rivers of Iraqi blood lap at their gates? How many decades will Americans be fighting to quell the cycle of regional violence set loose by a transnational Sunni-Shiite explosion?

I for one have become disillusioned with dreams of transforming Iraqi society from the top down. But it's not too late to steer the situation in a less bad direction. Increased American forces can do good — they are still, as David Ignatius says, the biggest militia on the block — provided they are directed toward realistic goals.

There is one option that does approach Iraqi reality from the bottom up. That option recognizes that Iraq is broken and that its people are fleeing their homes to survive. It calls for a "soft partition" of Iraq in order to bring political institutions into accord with the social facts — a central government to handle oil revenues and manage the currency, etc., but a country divided into separate sectarian areas to reduce contact and conflict. When the various groups in Bosnia finally separated, it became possible to negotiate a cold (if miserable) peace.

Soft partition has been advocated in different ways by Joe Biden and Les Gelb, by Michael O'Hanlon and Edward Joseph, by Pauline Baker at the Fund for Peace, and in a more extreme version, by Peter Galbraith.

On Sunday, I'll give further publicity to their recommendations.

Crash Killed Most Guard Troops In Single Incident In 50 Years (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — The helicopter crash that killed 12 U.S. soldiers last weekend was the deadliest single incident for National Guard troops in at least 50 years, the National Guard Bureau said Wednesday.

Ten National Guard soldiers died in the crash Saturday, including Col. Paul Kelly, the highest-ranking Guard member to die since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. President Bush's plan to commit 21,500 more troops to Iraq relies in part on sending National Guard troops, raising the possibility of more casualties among the citizen-soldier units.

"I am deeply saddened by the loss of these outstanding National Guard soldiers and warriors," Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum, chief of the National Guard Bureau, said in a statement. "I cherish their service, honor their sacrifice, and mourn with their families."

The cause of the crash remains under investigation, according to the U.S. command in Iraq.

The UH-60 Black Hawk helicopter belonged to the Alabama Army National Guard and was flying with one other helicopter on a routine mission, according to the National Guard Bureau. The other helicopter reached its destination and sent a quick-reaction team that arrived at the crash site near Al Jadidah, northeast of Baghdad, within an hour. No survivors were found.

Two of the victims were Command Sgts. Maj. Marilyn Gabbard of the Iowa National Guard and Roger Haller of the Maryland Guard. That rank is near the pinnacle for enlisted soldiers. Gabbard was the first woman in the Iowa Guard to reach that rank.

Two active-duty soldiers also died in the crash, including Col. Brian Allgood, one of the top U.S. medical officers in Iraq.

Saturday's incident was the Guard's deadliest since the Korean War, the National Guard Bureau said. Before Saturday, the Guard's most recent deadliest incident was in 2005, when seven members of the Louisiana National Guard were killed by a roadside bomb, the bureau said.

Christine Wormuth, a senior fellow and expert on reserve-troop issues at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said mass-casualty incidents like the crash could have a lasting impact.

"It is a concern for the long-term sustainability of the Guard and Reserves," she said. "The question is whether we will be able to continue recruiting and retaining troops in sufficient numbers."

The Pentagon has begun to address such concerns recently by planning to expand the size of the active-duty Army and Marine Corps and limiting Guard and Reserve deployments to one year, Wormuth said.

There's no indication yet that casualties among Guard and Reserve troops are driving down recruiting numbers, she said. In 2006, the Army National Guard recruited 99% of its goal of 70,000 soldiers, and the Army Reserve reached 95% of its goal of 36,000 soldiers.

U.S. Military Tests A Nonlethal Weapon That Fires Heat Rays (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

MOODY AIR FORCE BASE, Ga., Jan. 24 (AP) — The military calls its new weapon an “active denial system,” but that is an understatement. It is a ray gun that shoots a beam that makes people feel as if they are about to catch fire.

Apart from causing that terrifying sensation, the technology is supposed to be harmless — a nonlethal way to get enemies to drop their weapons, the military officials said.

The weapon is not expected to go into production until at least 2010, but all branches of the military have expressed interest in it, the officials said.

During the first demonstration of the weapon for the news media on Wednesday, airmen fired beams from a large dish antenna mounted atop a Humvee at people pretending to be rioters and airmen and reporters who volunteered to be shot.

The device’s two-member crew found their targets through powerful lenses and fired beams from more than 500 yards away, nearly 17 times the range of existing nonlethal weapons, like rubber bullets.

People who were hit by the beam immediately jumped out of its path because of the sudden blast of 130-degree heat throughout the body. “This is one of the key technologies for the future,” said Col. Kirk Hymes of the Marines, director of the nonlethal weapons program at Quantico, Va., which helped develop the new weapon. The two devices currently being evaluated were built by the military contractor Raytheon.

Boost Military Spending (WT)

By Peter W. Huggins

DOJ_NMG_0121312

Our nation's ground forces face considerable challenges. The Army and Marines are both heavily engaged fighting insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan. Beyond these short-term tests, our ground forces need to rebuild or replace equipment destroyed or damaged in these conflicts as well as prepare to engage elsewhere in the world should the need arise. Our Army and Marines need greater funding.

But should any increase in funding for our ground forces come at the expense of the other services? One view argues that since the Army and the Marines bear the preponderance of the human cost of our current conflicts, any increases in their budget share ought to come at the expense of the Air Force and Navy, both of which are less directly engaged in what are predominantly ground conflicts. Such a conclusion, however, fails to consider the impact this choice would have on the many benefits provided by our nation's air- and sea-power.

With the advent of globalization, our national economy has grown increasingly tied to the international economy. The Commerce Department recently reported that one in five U.S. manufacturing jobs is linked to exports, while agricultural exports employ another one million people. The global economy is fueled by petroleum products, much of which are transported to their markets by sea. The success of global trade results, in large measure, from the freedom of navigation that international commerce enjoys on the high seas. Such freedom began in the 19th century with the dominance of Britain's Royal Navy; it continues today due to the efforts of the U.S. Navy.

The Air Force plays a crucial, yet overlooked, role in the conflict in Iraq. U.S. air-power has an enviable reputation as it has prevented any air attack on U.S. or its coalition partners since the Korean War. Our success in the air allows our ground forces to operate with the security of not having to worry about "the third dimension," while forcing our adversaries to contend with the consequences of ceding such control. How many soldiers or Marines would have made a conscious choice to go about their daily business today in Iraq or Afghanistan without the benefits of air superiority, without persistent surveillance and reconnaissance, or without on-call strike aircraft just a few minutes away?

The Air Force and Navy are also key to our nation's unprecedented conventional deterrent. Measuring the impact of deterrence is almost impossible, since it is, by definition, a psychological influence on an adversary's decision-making. Yet it is certain that our nation's considerable successes in recent high-intensity conflicts — due in large part to air- and sea-power — have had a deterrent effect on potential adversaries.

Air- and sea-power provide critical capabilities for our nation's policy-makers. But our air and maritime forces also face mounting budgetary challenges. The Air Force in particular, which is operating the oldest air fleet in its history, is beginning to see the strains of almost 16 years of sustained combat service — many forget that U.S. airpower maintained no-fly zones in Iraq from 1991 to 2003, with little ground-force presence. Without modernization, our nation's ability to provide ground forces with the accustomed luxury of an environment free of enemy air attack would be in jeopardy. Such freedom, taken for granted by many, should not be mortgaged to pay today's bills.

The current debate overlooks one option. Future military budget shares need not be zero sum. The Office of Management and Budget recently reported that the percentage of Gross Domestic Product devoted to national defense is at near-record lows, even with generous increases after September 11. Military spending as a percentage of discretionary spending is also at near-record lows. Increasing the size of the pie, the overall defense budget, would allow all our nation's military services to fill pressing needs such as expanding the ranks, rebuilding and modernizing the force and preparing for the challenges that the future holds.

Our nation stands at a crossroads. The versatility and robustness of our armed forces will be crucial to our country's future foreign-policy success in a world where the only certainty is uncertainty. Zero-sum arguments that advocate shifting money to one service at the expense of another overlook the other choice — increasing the defense budget. While the nature of the current conflict suggests that boosting defense spending to a share in line with past conflicts, such as World War II, Korea and Vietnam, is not necessary, an increase to the levels seen at the end of the Cold War — our nation's most recent "long war" — is warranted. It's the best, and smartest, decision we can make.

Authority For Office Disputed (ADG)

By Linda Satter

Arkansas Democrat Gazette, January 25, 2007

A Little Rock attorney appointed Friday to represent a man charged with capital murder and possibly facing the death penalty has filed a motion to declare Tim Griffin's appointment last month as U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas unconstitutional.

John Wesley Hall Jr., who represents Antoine Demetrius Baker, said in a 16-page motion filed Tuesday that Griffin's appointment last month by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales violates Article II, Section 2, of the U. S. Constitution, which covers presidential appointments. He said it also violates a section of the U. S. Code altered last year during Congressional reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act.

The reworded section of the act omits a subsection that previously caused an attorney general's appointment of a U. S. attorney to expire within 120 days. The effect is that an appointee may now serve indefinitely without having to go through the standard procedure of being nominated by the president and then scrutinized by the Senate, which then votes to confirm or deny the appointment.

Little noticed at the time, the revision has stirred anger since the discovery that a handful of U. S. attorneys across the country were inexplicably forced to resign recently and then were replaced under the new provision by appointees who had not gone through the standard procedure — although the Justice Department says it is subjecting all of them to the process.

Among those ousted was Bud Cummins, U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas, whose job as chief federal prosecutor has generated praise in the legal community. Cummins said he was asked to resign so that Griffin, who had worked in the White House as a Republican strategist, could have a chance to serve as U. S. attorney.

Cummins, also a Republican, began serving as U. S. attorney in 2001 after being nominated by President Bush and confirmed by the Senate.

Griffin declined to comment on Hall's challenge to the method in which Griffin secured the top legal position in the eastern part of the state. But the challenge was rebuffed Tuesday by the U. S. Department of Justice with more of the same language that the department has used over the past few weeks to defend its appointment of Griffin.

"Congress provided the Attorney General the authority in federal law (28 United States Code § 546) to appoint a United States Attorney because we must ensure that someone is able to carry out the important function of leading a U. S. Attorney's office in the event a vacancy arise," said Brian Roehrkasse, deputy director of public affairs. "We have clearly stated our commitment to having a U. S. Attorney in every district who is confirmed by the Senate, and thus there is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process."

Roehrkasse continued, in an e-mail, "Furthermore, our record since this appointment authority was amended clearly demonstrates we are committed to working with the Senate to nominate candidates for U. S. Attorney positions. Every single time that a United States Attorney vacancy has arisen, the President either has made a nomination or the Administration is working, in consultation with home-state senators, to select candidates for nomination." Michael Teague, spokesman for Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., confirmed Tuesday that Griffin met a couple of weeks ago in Washington with Pryor, and apparently also met with the state's other Democratic senator, Blanche Lincoln.

Teague said that while Griffin's meeting with Pryor was cordial, "the senator still contends that the way the White House is handling this is a disservice to Bud Cummins and, in the long run, to Tim Griffin." Teague said Pryor still expects Griffin to go through the nomination process although Griffin's name has not yet been submitted to begin that process.

Hall's motion states, "This is a death penalty case. Defendant alleges his chief prosecutor unlawfully (both statutorily and constitutionally) holds office, and his prosecutor will be asking a grand jury to add an aggravator [to an existing indictment] and will be asking a jury to sentence him to death."

If that isn't a "case or controversy" worthy of closer examination, Hall asserted, "then nothing is."

Baker, the purported leader of a gang who has been convicted of first-degree murder in another case in state court, is charged in federal court with instructing two men to kill Jerry Otis, 21, in December 2002. Otis was to testify against Baker but was killed at Baker's instructions, according to the indictment.

The case is assigned to U. S. District Judge G. Thomas Eisele. No hearing will be set until the government files a response to Hall's motion.

Appointment Called Unconstitutional (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

A lawyer alleges recent U.S. attorney selection violates appointments clause.

A veteran Little Rock, Ark., attorney has lodged the first constitutional challenge to the Bush administration's attempt to appoint a U.S. attorney without seeking Senate approval.

Griffin, who used to work for Bush political advisor Karl Rove, replaced Bud Cummins, a Bush appointee and one of seven U.S. attorneys around the country whom the administration has ousted since late December. The top federal prosecutors in San Diego and San Francisco were among those dismissed.

Some Democrats have suggested that the moves were made to reward friends of the White House or punish prosecutors who had taken actions that angered the administration.

Administration officials have denied that the moves were political and assert that Gonzales has the authority to take these actions under a 2006 amendment to the Patriot Act that allows recess appointments.

But Hall's challenge contends that the section of the Patriot Act that Gonzales is relying on is an attempted "end run" around the appointments clause, which mandates that the Senate confirm the president's appointees.

"Under the Constitution, only the president can appoint a U.S. attorney, not the attorney general, so this appointment is void," Hall asserted.

Hall raised the challenge in the case of Antoine Demetris Baker, who is accused of murder. Hall contends that the illegitimacy of Griffin's appointment means that the U.S. attorney's office can't take any action in the case.

He said he decided to raise the challenge in Baker's case because U.S. attorneys "have special responsibilities" in cases where they are seeking capital punishment.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that "Congress provided the attorney general the authority in federal law … to appoint a United States attorney because we must ensure that someone is able to carry out the important function of leading a U.S. attorney's office in the event a vacancy arises.

"We have clearly stated our commitment to having a U.S. attorney in every district who is confirmed by the Senate, and thus there is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process."

Lawyer Challenges Griffin Appointment As U.S. Attorney (AP)

AP, January 25, 2007

LITTLE ROCK (AP) - A defense lawyer has filed a challenge to the appointment of U.S. Attorney Tim Griffin, who was named without Senate confirmation in a move made possible by the USA Patriot Act.

Attorney John Wesley Hall Jr., who is representing a capital murder defendant, filed papers Tuesday in which he argues that the appointment is unconstitutional.

Griffin, who worked under President Bush political adviser Karl Rove, replaced Bud Cummins, who has said the Justice Department asked him last summer to leave his post.

Griffin was named interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas by Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez in a "recess appointment" after Congress adjourned for the year in 2006. The USA Patriot Act now allows Griffin to serve without having to be nominated by the president and go through Senate confirmation.

Previously, the appointment would have been good for 120 days.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehkrasse said the department is committed to having Senate confirmation hearings.

"There is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an atteompt to cirrcumvent the confirmation process," he said.

U.S. Sen. Mark Pryor is one of the three senators that have proposed legislation to prevent indefinite interim appointments of U.S. attorneys. Pryor spokesman Michael Teague says Pryor still expects Griffin to go through the nomination process.

Hall is representing Antoine Demetrius Baker, who is accused of ordering the murder of a witness in another case. Hall said Griffin's office intends to seek the death penalty in the case and that Griffin's appointment should be examined by the judge.

The government hasn't yet responded to Hall's motion and U.S. District Judge G. Thomas Eisele has not set a hearing on the matter.

Editorial: Political Meddling With Justice (NYT)

The federal investigation into Congressional corruption is approaching a crucial deadline and potential dead end. Feb. 15 is the last day on the job for United States Attorney Carol Lam of San Diego, the inquiry's dedicated prosecutor, who is being purged by the Bush administration.

Her investigation led to the imprisonment of former Representative Randy Cunningham, the California Republican who took millions of dollars in bribes in exchange for delivering lucrative government contracts. But just as Ms. Lam was digging into other possible wrongdoing, the White House decided to force her from office without explanation.

Ms. Lam has been investigating the dealings of Brent Wilkes, a private contractor and deep-pocketed political contributor who was designated co-conspirator No. 1 in the Cunningham case. Mr. Wilkes developed other cozy relationships. Among other avenues, the inquiry has been looking into rich government contracts secured by corporations and lobbyists with ties to Representative Jerry Lewis — the former appropriations chairman — and his staff. The Wall Street Journal is reporting that Mr. Wilkes could be indicted before Ms. Lam leaves office. The question now is whether her successor, as yet unnamed, will pursue the inquiry with the same dedication or will quietly smother it.

The outlook isn't promising. The administration is defenestrating at least six other U.S. attorneys. Yet Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is refusing to provide Congress with details on these unmerited dismissals. He insists that there's no attempt to quash fresh Republican scandals and says only the "very best" will be named as replacements.

We are skeptical, especially since the White House's reported choice to replace Little Rock's federal attorney is a Republican operative close to Karl Rove. Congress must demand a clear explanation from Mr. Gonzales and the White House on why these prosecutors are being ousted. It must search out every shady aspect of this clearly politically motivated purge — with a particular eye on Feb. 15.

Dropping Like Flies (HC)

Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 25, 2007

In the past year 11 U.S. attorneys have resigned their positions, some under pressure from their Justice Department superiors and the White House, even through they had commendable performance records.

Democratic senators are concerned that the high turnover is linked to an obscure, recently passed provision of the Patriot Act. The provision allows the Bush administration to fill vacancies with interim prosecutors for the remainder of the president's term without submitting them to the Senate for confirmation. Previously, interim appointments were made by a vote of federal judges in the districts served by the outgoing U.S. attorneys.

U.S. Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., contends that in his state U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins was improperly ousted in favor of a protege of Bush political adviser Karl Rove. Likewise in California, U.S. Attorneys Carol Lam of San Diego and Kevin Ryan of San Francisco were forced from their positions. Sen. Diane Feinstein, D-Calif., alleged that Lam fell out of favor with her Washington bosses for spearheading the bribery prosecution and conviction of Republican Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham last year. Lam reportedly had other politicians in her sights.

"I am particularly concerned because of the inference ... that is drawn to manipulation in the lineup of cases to be prosecuted by a U.S. attorney," Feinstein stated. "In the San Diego case, at the very least, we have people from the FBI indicating that Carol Lam has not only been a straight shooter but a very good prosecutor."

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales denied political motives figured in the multiple resignations of top prosecutors, and pledged that all interim appointments would be submitted to the Senate for confirmation. He reiterated that U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and can be removed for a number of reasons, including job performance and their standing in their districts. That isn't good enough for Feinstein and her Democratic colleagues, who have introduced legislation to reinstate the appointment of interim prosecutors by federal judges.

Gonzales is correct that the president is vested with the power to appoint U.S. attorneys. Unfortunately, the Patriot Act change eliminated the ability of the Senate to exercise its constitutional oversight of those nominations to make sure they are qualified and not simply political plums handed out to supporters in the waning years of the administration.

The attorney general's pledge to bring the wave of interim appointees before the Senate for confirmation is welcome, providing it is done in a speedy fashion. Still, the Patriot Act needs to be amended to restore judicial appointment of interims.

No president should be able to fire top government prosecutors from their positions for political reasons and then install successors without a thorough vetting by the constitutionally charged legislative body.

Unisys To Continue Justice Asset Tracking System Work (WASHTECH)

DOJ_NMG_0121316

By William Welsh, Deputy Editor

Washington Technology, January 24, 2007

Unisys Corp. will continue supporting a consolidated asset tracking system used by the Justice Department to monitor property seized from criminals under a new contract. The eight-year deal may be worth as much as $112 million, the company said.

Under a blanket purchase agreement, Unisys of Blue Bell, Pa., will provide applications and managed services support for all system operations.

Unisys will handle systems integration, systems development, engineering, network management, production support, and security and certification. The company also will be responsible for customer support, program management, verification and validation.

The Justice Department's asset tracking system tracks, monitors and reports on property seized and forfeited in the prosecution of criminal activities. Ten law enforcement agencies used the consolidated system.

The new contract extends Unisys work on the asset tracking system project. Over the past five years, Unisys has modernized all of the system's core business applications while maintaining legacy system operations during the process, the company said.

Unisys has 32,000 employees and had annual sales of $5.7 billion in 2006. The company ranks No. 20 on Washington Technology's 2006 Top 100 list of the largest federal IT contractors.

Ex-Enron Executive Begins 18-month Prison Term (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Enron's former investor relations chief entered a federal prison in Texas today to serve an 18-month sentence for helping top executives mislead Wall Street about the company's financial viability.

Mark Koenig, 51, surrendered at a men's prison in Three Rivers, about 74 miles south of San Antonio, at noon today, prison spokesman Michael Ginster said.

With his surrender, Koenig became the eighth former Enron executive to serve prison time in the aftermath of the company's collapse more than five years ago.

Koenig pleaded guilty in August 2004 to aiding and abetting securities fraud for misleading Wall Street analysts to conceal Enron's precarious financial condition before the company collapsed in December 2001. As head of investor relations, he was Enron's main liaison to Wall Street.

"I definitely did not make the right choices in my last year at Enron," Koenig told a judge at his sentencing in November. "I am profoundly sorry for that."

Koenig's former second-in-command, Paula Rieker, pleaded guilty to insider trading earlier in 2004 and is serving probation for two years.

About a year ago, Koenig kicked off prosecution testimony in the fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron Chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling. He testified that while no one explicitly ordered him to lie, he felt pressure to do so to keep his job.

Both Lay and Skilling were convicted, but Lay died of heart disease in July. His record was subsequently wiped clean. Skilling began serving a 24-year, four-month prison term for 19 criminal counts at a Minnesota prison last month.

Next week another Enron felon, former finance executive Michael Kopper, is slated to surrender at a prison in Big Spring, about 450 miles west of Houston.

Kopper pleaded guilty in August 2002 to two counts of conspiracy for helping devise and carry out schemes to cook Enron's books while skimming millions of dollars for himself

CRIMINAL LAW:

Witness: Libby Part Of Leak Plan (USAT)

By Richard Willing

WASHINGTON — Lewis "Scooter" Libby was part of a White House strategy to use press leaks to blame the CIA for faulty intelligence about Iraq's efforts to acquire nuclear bomb material, a former top CIA official testified Wednesday.

Libby was annoyed by reports that the administration had ignored evidence that its claims that Iraq sought nuclear fuel were wrong, said Robert Grenier, the CIA's former assistant secretary for operations.

Then Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, Libby asked Grenier about former State Department official Joseph Wilson, who had investigated the claims about Iraq's nuclear intentions for the CIA. Grenier testified that he also told Libby that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, was a covert CIA official.

Grenier testified during Libby's trial on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. Libby, 56, is charged with lying to FBI agents and grand jurors during a federal probe into how Plame's identity was given to reporters in the summer of 2003.

On Wednesday, Libby's lawyers tried to show that prosecution witnesses who say they told Libby about Plame may have faulty memories.

Grenier said he first told authorities that he didn't remember discussing Plame with Libby but, more than a year later, said he did. Grenier said he didn't tell authorities about the Plame conversation until mid-2005, when news stories about Libby's possible role in revealing her identity made the information more "relevant."

Earlier Wednesday, Grenier said Libby's interest in Wilson was triggered by a May 2003 New York Times column that alleged that Cheney had encouraged the CIA to send Wilson to Niger in 2002 to investigate claims that Iraq had sought uranium in the African nation. Wilson's findings — that the claims were unfounded — were overlooked when President Bush charged in January 2003 that Iraq had sought uranium.

A July 2003 report by columnist Robert Novak naming Plame as Wilson's wife was also part of an administration plan to "throw the blame" on the CIA, Grenier said. The column implied the CIA was guilty of "nepotism" for picking an officer's spouse for the uranium mission, he said.

Grenier's statements, in the trial's second day of testimony, helped show the administration's internal conflicts, as inspectors failed to locate weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and critics of prewar intelligence surfaced in the press.

Prosecutors allege that the Bush administration officials engineered the leaks to undermine Wilson's credibility. The key issue in the trial, however, is not any attempt to damage Wilson. Instead it is whether Libby intentionally lied when he told FBI agents and grand jurors in late 2003 and 2004 that he first learned Plame's identity from NBC reporter Tim Russert. Russert, who is expected to testify, has already denied that.

The day's final witness was CIA official Craig Schmall, who performed Libby's daily intelligence briefing. Prosecutors used Schmall's testimony to counter defense assertions that Libby was too busy with national security issues to remember talking about Plame's identity.

Schmall testified that when he briefed Libby in mid-June 2003, Libby was "pretty excited" because he had recently been visited by film stars Tom Cruise and Penelope Cruz. Cruise, a practitioner of Scientology, lobbied Libby on behalf of German Scientologists, who Cruise said were being persecuted by the German government, Schmall recalled.

A former high-ranking CIA official testified yesterday that, when Vice President Cheney's agitated chief of staff called him out of the blue in June 2003 to ask what he knew about a CIA-sponsored trip to Niger, he jumped to get answers.

Summoned out of a meeting with the CIA director to take I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's urgent call later that same afternoon, then-Associate Deputy Director Robert Grenier said he relayed all he had learned about former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, the man behind news reports of the trip that had Libby so concerned.

Yes, Wilson had gone on a CIA-sponsored mission to check out intelligence that Iraq was trying to buy uranium for nuclear weapons and had concluded that the tip was unfounded, Grenier testified he told Libby. And, he told Libby, it appeared that Wilson's wife, a CIA officer, had suggested Wilson for the trip.

The timing of Grenier's response and Libby's anxiety over Wilson are central to the prosecution's allegation that Libby lied to investigators when he said that he believed he first learned CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity from NBC's Tim Russert a month later. Grenier is one of three government officials to testify, so far, that they held conversations with Libby about Wilson's wife weeks before Libby contends he learned her name.

Libby has pleaded not guilty to five felony counts during the investigation of how Plame's identity was disclosed to the media. His defense maintains that he got confused about details of conversations with reporters amid the crush of his work on urgent national security issues.

The second day of trial testimony continued to throw back the curtain on a Bush administration beset with rivalries, self-interested alliances and attempts at blame-shifting. Those efforts were particularly intense during the summer of 2003, with U.S. troops in Iraq still unable to find the weapons of mass destruction that President Bush had cited to justify a preemptive war.

Fleshing out the finger-pointing inside the administration is important for both the defense and the prosecution. Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald has argued that Plame was the victim of an internal administration scramble as the vice president sought to discredit Wilson. Fitzgerald has alleged that Libby lied to conceal his and Cheney's efforts, as well as Libby's discussions about Plame with reporters.

Grenier said that Libby was fixated on one set of facts that Grenier relayed. He asked, would the CIA release to the news media the information that Wilson's trip was supposed to answer questions raised not just by Cheney's office, but by the State Department and the Defense Department as well?

Yesterday, defense attorneys sought to raise doubts about several of Libby's former administration colleagues, who are now witnesses for the prosecution, by attempting to show that they had flawed memories of events -- and that they had allegiances or other motives that would bias them against Libby. The defense also asserted that, after a criminal investigation into the leak began in the fall of 2003, the White House tried to protect presidential adviser Karl Rove and seemed willing to sacrifice Libby.

Defense attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. pressed former undersecretary of state Marc Grossman, the prosecution's first witness, to acknowledge his close friendship with his boss at the time, then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, an internal critic of the war and of Libby.

Wells suggested that Grossman had a "fishy" meeting with Armitage just before Grossman was interviewed by the FBI and has given conflicting accounts of events over time.

Ari Fleischer, a former White House press secretary who is expected to testify for the prosecution, also has a motive to help the prosecution, Wells has said. Fleischer had demanded immunity before he would talk about his conversations with Libby, then had admitted to government prosecutors that he had spoken to several reporters about Wilson's wife in the days before he left his job.

In questioning Grenier, defense attorney William H. Jeffress Jr. emphasized the rift between the CIA and the White House.

Grenier said he remembered reading a story in The Washington Post on June 12, 2003, the day after he tried to answer Libby's questions, that quoted anonymous administration sources as saying that the CIA never told Cheney that his questions were the impetus for Wilson's trip or about Wilson's findings.

"Wasn't this embarrassing to the CIA?" Jeffress asked Grenier. "Didn't you tell the FBI that you thought the White House was trying to shift blame to the CIA?"

Grenier testified that he did surmise that the White House was pointing a finger at the CIA for not alerting them about Wilson's findings.

"The administration was trying to suggest that had they only known about the eminent Ambassador Wilson's [information] . . . it would have somehow stopped the White House from continuing on its errant path to war," Grenier said. "I think they were trying to avoid blame for not providing [the truth] about whether or not Iraq had attempted to buy uranium."

Weeks later, Grenier said he saw Plame's name revealed in Robert D. Novak's syndicated column and figured that it was the work of the White House. In fact, Armitage and Rove have acknowledged that they were Novak's sources. Jeffress also sought to undermine Grenier's testimony by pointing out that Grenier initially told FBI agents and a grand jury that he did not remember whether he had told Libby that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. Only later, Jeffress said, did Grenier notify investigators that he had mentioned that she was an employee. "Do you find your memory gets better the further away from an event you are?" Jeffress asked pointedly.

Ex-Officials Testify They Informed Libby Of The Identity Of A C.I.A. Operative (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — Prosecutors in the perjury trial of the former White House aide I. Lewis Libby Jr. paraded a roster of former government officials before the jury on Wednesday to testify that they had informed him about the identity of the C.I.A. operative Valerie Wilson, contrary to Mr. Libby's claim that he had learned about her weeks later from reporters.

Mr. Libby's lawyers spent their time cross-examining those witnesses in an effort to attack both their credibility and their memory.

Mr. Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, has put the issue of memory front and center in his defense on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. He is charged with lying to both a grand jury and to F.B.I. agents who were investigating the leak to reporters of the identity of Ms. Wilson.

Mr. Libby has sworn that he did not discuss Ms. Wilson's identity with reporters in the spring and summer of 2003. But two reporters, Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, and Matthew Cooper, formerly of Time Magazine, have testified that Mr. Libby explicitly told them about Ms. Wilson.

One official to testify, Robert L. Grenier, a former senior official at the Central Intelligence Agency, testified Wednesday that he received an anxious phone call from Mr. Libby on June 11, 2003, asking about reports that a former ambassador had made a trip to Africa to check on reports that Saddam Hussein had tried to buy uranium in Niger for Iraq's weapons program.

Mr. Libby, Mr. Grenier said, seemed irked by accounts that the former ambassador, Joseph C. Wilson IV, the husband of Ms. Wilson, was telling reporters that he had been sent on a fact-finding mission to Niger at the behest of the vice president's office.

Mr. Grenier said he promised to look into the matter, but before he could speak with Mr. Libby again, he was summoned out of a meeting with the director of the C.I.A. by Mr. Libby seeking answers.

He said he told Mr. Libby that Mr. Wilson did indeed go on the mission to Africa and he added, as an afterthought, that Mr. Wilson's wife, who is also known as Valerie Plame, worked at the C.I.A.

The purpose of Mr. Grenier's testimony from the prosecutor's point of view was to cast doubt on Mr. Libby's account that he did not remember learning about Ms. Wilson from officials when he testified that he learned about her from journalists.

But William H. Jeffress Jr., one of Mr. Libby's lawyers, quickly set about taking apart Mr. Grenier's account. He noted that in his first appearance before a grand jury and in an interview with F.B.I. agents, Mr. Grenier did not say he had told Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson.

Mr. Grenier said he had not remembered that part of the conversation with Mr. Libby and only recalled it more than a year later when he went before a grand jury again.

With a generous dollop of scorn, Mr. Jeffress asked why Mr. Grenier had first told the grand jury that he had no recollection of telling Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson, only to change his story later.

"I was saying what I thought was true at the time, and I subsequently had a different recollection," replied Mr. Grenier, who held a high rank in the agency as Iraq mission manager.

Mr. Jeffress asked, "Do you find that your memory gets better the further away from an event?"

Mr. Libby's lawyers seemed to have two agendas in mind. Not only did they want to underscore the fragility of memory — Mr. Libby has said that if he testified incorrectly about his conversations with reporters it was only because he simply remembered incorrectly — but also to create a vexing, lengthy and complicated narrative for the jury.

The prosecution, in contrast, is aiming for a streamlined and simple case: Did Mr. Libby knowingly lie to the grand jury and to F.B.I. agents?

Mr. Jeffress also quizzed Mr. Grenier about some of the ill-feeling between the White House and the C.I.A. over Mr. Wilson's trip. On Tuesday, Mr. Libby's chief lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., startled the court when he said that his client had been made a scapegoat by White House officials to protect Karl Rove, President Bush's principal political adviser.

Craig Schmall, a C.I.A. employee whose job was to brief Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney, testified that his notes showed Mr. Libby had spoken to him on June 14, 2003, and that he was annoyed by Mr. Wilson's trip to Niger.

On cross-examination, Mr. Schmall acknowledged that Mr. Libby's workday in that period was taken up with issues like Iraq developments, an East African terrorist network and Al Qaeda.

Mr. Schmall's notes from a session with Mr. Libby show a comment about the actors Tom Cruise and Penélope Cruz, who had visited the White House and raised concerns about the treatment of Scientologists in Germany. "He was a little excited about it, and I was a little excited about it," Mr. Schmall said of the celebrity moment in their day.

Earlier, Mr. Libby's defense team went after the memory and credibility of Marc Grossman, the former under secretary of state. He had given statements that he had been asked on May 29, 2003, by Mr. Libby about the Wilson trip. He said that after canvassing the State Department he reported back that Mr. Wilson had made the trip for the C.I.A. and that his wife had played a major role in selecting him for the mission.

Libby Defense Says Witnesses Also Suffered Memory Lapses (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

WASHINGTON — I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's defense against perjury charges, which rests in part on what he has described as innocent memory lapses, appeared to gain some ground Wednesday when his lawyers showed that two government witnesses in the case had memory issues of their own.

Former CIA official Robert Grenier, questioned by Libby's lawyers, acknowledged that he initially told a federal grand jury in January 2004 that he did not believe he had shared information about the status of CIA operative Valerie Plame when he spoke with Libby weeks before she was identified in a newspaper column. But Grenier said he testified 18 months later in another grand jury appearance that he believed he had given Libby that information after all.

Grenier was called by the government to help prove the central charge against Libby: that contrary to what he told investigators, Libby obtained information about Plame, the wife of an administration war critic, before her identity surfaced July 14, 2003, in a syndicated column by Robert Novak. Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, told a grand jury that he learned about Plame from journalists and had passed along gossip they offered him. The government claims that he made up the story in an apparent effort to protect his boss.

Another official — Marc Grossman, a former State Department undersecretary for political affairs — also testified Wednesday that he had discussed Plame with Libby but conceded there were discrepancies in the accounts that he had initially given FBI agents. Grossman said he could not account for the differences.

Grenier said he changed his testimony after reflecting on a feeling of guilt that he had after talking with Libby and the possibility that he had shared potentially classified information with him. He also said it was becoming apparent from newspaper reports that how and when Libby learned about Plame was becoming of paramount interest to investigators.

The disclosures, on the first full day of the perjury and obstruction trial, appeared to buttress a central defense claim.

Libby, through his lawyers, has conceded that he may have misspoken to investigators, but only because he was preoccupied with matters of national security, which clouded his ability to recall events.

His lawyers were able to show Wednesday that such memory problems may be an occupational hazard for high government officials.

"Do you find that your memory gets better the further away from an event you are?" William Jeffress, one of Libby's lawyers, asked Grenier. "Your memory improves with time?"

Grenier, who was the CIA's point man on Iraq at the time of his conversation with Libby, said he could not account for any single event that changed his thinking. "I developed the growing conviction that I had in fact said it," he said. "It's like, 'Wake up and smell the coffee. You must've told him.' "

Plame is married to former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV; in an opinion piece in the New York Times on July 6, 2003, Wilson said that President Bush had misled the nation in his State of the Union address when he said Saddam Hussein was seeking weapons-grade uranium in Niger. Wilson had assessed the claim on a CIA-sponsored trip to the African country in 2002 and concluded that it was baseless. Articles about his trip began to appear in newspapers in May 2003.

Both Grenier and Grossman testified that Libby had called them in June 2003 to ask if they knew anything about the then-anonymous ambassador and the circumstances of the trip.

The discussions, they testified, eventually led them to disclose information about Plame to Libby.

Grenier said he treated the request with urgency and recalled being pulled out of a meeting with then-CIA Director George J. Tenet to take a phone call from Libby. "Someone came to the door and beckoned me out…. I went out of the conference room and I was handed a note indicating that I should call Mr. Libby," he said. "I don't think I had ever been called out of a meeting with the director either before or since."

Grossman ordered up a State Department report that chronicled the Wilson trip, which mentioned that his wife worked for the CIA, a fact that he passed along to Libby.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., another of Libby's lawyers, questioned Grossman about conversations he had with then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage immediately before and after Grossman spoke to the FBI for the first time in October 2003. Grossman said that Armitage divulged to him what was then a major secret: that Armitage had been the source for the Novak article about Plame.

Grossman said he was glad Armitage had decided to confide in him before his FBI interview.

"He said it was the dumbest thing he'd ever done in his life," Grossman said. "He said he felt terrible about it, that he'd offered to quit and reported it fully to the FBI. I was shocked and disappointed. But for me, I thought he'd given me a piece of professional courtesy, and I appreciated it."

During questioning, Wells said that a transcript of Grossman's FBI interviews indicated he had known before he commissioned the State Department report that Plame worked for the CIA, though he testified Tuesday that the document was his original source for the information.

"You accept the fact that you told the FBI something different on Feb. 24, 2004, than you told this jury?" Wells asked.

"Yes, sir," Grossman replied.

The prosecution on Wednesday scored some points in trying to rebut what some lawyers have called Libby's "busy man" defense.

The government introduced notes taken by Libby's CIA briefer during a meeting in June 2003. The notes revealed that Libby had taken time out to visit with actor Tom Cruise and his then-girlfriend Penelope Cruz, who had requested time with the influential administration aide to complain about German government criticism of Scientology — of which Cruise is a well-known follower.

"Mr. Libby told me about it during the briefing," Craig Schmall, the CIA briefer, said. "He was a little excited about it. I was a little excited about it."

At The Libby Trial, Hints Of Intrigue And Betrayal (NYT)

By David Johnston And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — The assertion by lawyers for I. Lewis Libby Jr. that White House aides had sacrificed him to protect Karl Rove, the senior political adviser, appears to be based primarily on Mr. Libby's own sense that the administration had failed to defend him adequately as the C.I.A. leak case unfolded.

But there is little known evidence to buttress the suggestion by Mr. Libby's defense team in his obstruction and perjury trial that unnamed White House officials were deliberately setting Mr. Libby up to be a scapegoat.

Mr. Libby's lawyers said in an opening statement on Tuesday that he felt so abandoned by the White House as the leak investigation intensified in the fall of 2003 that he appealed to his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Cheney subsequently wrote, according to the defense's opening statement: "Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy who was asked to stick his neck in the meatgrinder because of the incompetence of others."

The defense team's statements set off a debate across Washington about whether they were part of a legal gambit to divert attention from the underlying charge that Mr. Libby lied to F.B.I. agents and the grand jury or whether his lawyers had evidence of an effort within the White House to focus the blame on Mr. Libby.

Even if the assertion is shown to be true, it is not clear how it would help refute the charges that Mr. Libby had perjured himself.

Mr. Libby's lawyers have so far offered few details about how he might have been set up as a fall guy for Mr. Rove. White House aides said little about the alleged rift on Wednesday, indicating they were prepared to grant their former colleague wide latitude to present an aggressive defense — even if it meant letting stand unanswered a story of intrigue and disloyalty involving President Bush's and Mr. Cheney's most trusted aides.

The accusations of scapegoating came as a surprise. In the past, White House aides have portrayed Mr. Libby and Mr. Rove as colleagues who moved in different orbits, but whose paths crossed collegially on various pieces of White House business, including the effort to defend a flawed statement in Mr. Bush's State of the Union speech in 2003 that Iraq had sought nuclear fuel in Africa.

But Mr. Libby may have had reason to feel singled out. He was the only White House official known to have been authorized to seek out reporters in the summer of 2003 in an effort to explain an intelligence report that the administration had used to make a case that Iraq was interested in acquiring uranium ore for its suspected nuclear program, according to documents in the case.

Mr. Cheney approved of Mr. Libby's confidential meetings with reporters, according to the prosecution. The vice president had also spoken to Mr. Bush, who authorized the declassification of parts of a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq to provide Mr. Libby with more information to discuss with the journalists, the legal papers said.

There may have been other reasons Mr. Libby felt the White House was turning against him. Under questioning from reporters, Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, said on Sept. 29, 2003, that Mr. Rove had no involvement in the leak of the identity of an intelligence officer, Valerie Wilson. But it took nearly a week before Mr. McClellan made a similar defense of Mr. Libby.

In each instance, Mr. McClellan's statements, which he said at the time were based upon conversations with Mr. Rove and Mr. Libby, proved to be inaccurate; Mr. Libby and Mr. Rove had spoken to reporters about Ms. Wilson, who had worked undercover.

While Mr. Libby felt he was being left to fend for himself, there is little public evidence so far to support his lawyers' suggestion that Mr. Libby was the victim of a deliberate effort to shift the blame to Mr. Libby to protect Mr. Rove, who by the fall of 2003 was masterminding Mr. Bush's reelection campaign.

The issue of whether there was a conspiracy at the White House either to reveal Ms. Wilson's identity or to cover up for the White House officials who engaged in such a plot was a central focus of the grand jury inquiry conducted by Patrick J. Ftizgerald, the prosecutor. Mr. Fitzgerald did not charge anyone with participating in a conspiracy and has never suggested that there is any evidence that one existed.

Mr. Fitzgerald spent many months exploring the issue, investigating one newspaper report of a broad conspiracy that later proved to be inaccurate, according to lawyers with clients in the case. Those lawyers said Mr. Fitzgerald questioned their clients, often in minute detail, about what they had done or said about the case. Associates of Mr. Rove, speaking on condition of anonymity, dismissed the idea that there was a cabal against Mr. Libby.

But the defense can marshal an argument that Mr. Libby was initially left out in the cold as the White House began mounting a defense of Mr. Rove, a review of White House comments on the leak inquiry shows.

On Sept. 29, 2003, as the leak inquiry was picking up steam and reporters were pressing to learn Mr. Rove's role, Mr. McClellan said Mr. Rove had told him he was not involved in the leak. He called the accusations of Mr. Rove's involvement "ridiculous."

Asked about Mr. Libby in that afternoon's press briefing, Mr. McClellan initially appeared noncommittal, saying, "If someone did something like this, it needs to be looked at by the Department of Justice." Later Mr. McClellan said, "I've made it clear that there's been nothing, absolutely nothing, brought to our attention to suggest any White House involvement, and that includes the vice president's office, as well."

But a government filing in the spring suggested that Mr. Libby was dissatisfied with Mr. McClellan's handling of the questions about his involvement. The filing showed that Mr. Libby had drafted a handwritten list of talking points for Mr. McClellan that read: "People have made too much of the difference in how I described Karl and Libby. I've talked to Libby. I said it was ridiculous about Karl, and it is ridiculous about Libby."

Former White House officials said they were surprised to hear of any rift between Mr. Rove and Mr. Libby. "One of their strengths was that they worked together," said Lawrence B. Wilkerson, a former State Department official who has become a critic of how the administration had handled Iraq. "They didn't show any ankle — it was always a team effort."

Several former officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that Mr. Rove and Mr. Libby had several areas of intersection. Mr. Libby also held the rank of a presidential adviser, and he stood in for Mr. Cheney frequently on domestic and foreign policy meetings. Both men had a hand in the marketing, and later, the defense, of the Iraq strategy. But they approached it from different angles. Mr. Libby was involved in developing and assessing intelligence about Iraq and using it to build the case for the war, and then defending that case as it began to unravel. Mr. Rove built a re-election strategy for Mr. Bush that relied heavily on his prosecution of the war against terrorism and the Iraq invasion.

Both men had their own contacts among journalists. Mr. Rove dealt mostly with political reporters, including the conservative columnist Robert Novak, who first disclosed Ms. Wilson's identity. Mr. Libby tended to speak with reporters who focused on national security matters, including Judith Miller, then of The New York Times.

Mr. Fitzgerald has also introduced a new player into the mix, Ari Fleischer, Mr. McClellan's predecessor as White House press secretary. Mr. Fleischer, Mr. Fitzgerald said in court on Tuesday, had been informed by Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson's identity as the wife of Joseph C. Wilson, the former diplomat whose criticism of pre-war intelligence about Iraq had set off the case. Mr. Fleischer had later discussed Ms. Wilson with reporters including David Gregory of NBC News, according to the account.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's lawyer, has argued that Mr. Fleischer's testimony came after an immunity deal and that he had no notes about the lunch he reportedly had with Mr. Libby. But that argument fits what appears to be a general strategy by Mr. Wells to show a confusing situation where loyalties, and memories, are questionable.

Cities See Crime Surge As Threat To Their Revival (USAT)

By Haya El Nasser

LOUISVILLE — A minister who regularly conducts prayer vigils against violence and counsels crime victims is beaten by a gang of youths. Five people are shot and wounded at a community festival. A softball player is shot and wounded at a game, in front of 100 witnesses. One person is killed and four wounded in a shooting outside a funeral home as people gather for a wake.

These crimes happened in very public settings here last year — two of them within 2 miles of the heart of this Ohio River city's downtown. Such incidents inevitably give communities the jitters, but cities are especially skittish now because the nation's violent crime rate is rising after more than a decade of decline, and the stakes are higher.

The drop in crime helped spark an urban revival that attracted thousands of residents and billions of dollars of investment to downtowns from Louisville to Miami, St. Louis and Denver. Now, city leaders across the nation are fearful that crime will kill the renaissance.

For a city such as Louisville, where downtown is flourishing, keeping crime in check is paramount. More than $1 billion has been invested in the commercial heart of the city this decade. By 2010, at least another $1 billion is expected to come in. Five hotels are set to open, and the 2000 housing units now downtown are expected to double by 2009.

Rising crime "has the potential of being damaging," says Jerry Abramson, mayor of Louisville from 1985 to 1998. He was elected again in 2002 after Louisville merged with surrounding Jefferson County; he was re-elected in 2006. "We all live day by day in terms of concern of some horrific thing happening in our central business district that would set us back."

Murders and robberies continued to rise nationwide during the first six months of 2006, according to the FBI, and violent crime overall appears headed for a second straight year of increases. Mayors and police chiefs regularly assure the public that violent crimes still are confined mostly to poorer drug- and gang-infested areas, but they are sounding alarms:

•One of the first sessions at the U.S. Conference of Mayors' winter meeting that began Wednesday in Washington tackled initiatives to fight rising crime. Mayors are calling for a federal-local partnership to stem double-digit increases in murders, assaults and robberies in some cities.

•The National League of Cities has put the surge in violent crime on its legislative agenda, calling it one of the major challenges affecting quality of life.

•Mayors and police chiefs from about 55 cities who met last fall identified many factors pushing up crime rates: gangs, drugs, truancy, a growing culture of violence among youths, a profusion of illegal guns, unemployment and a wave of more than 600,000 ex-offenders finishing their prison terms and returning to the streets every year.

Government 'walked away'

Abramson and some other mayors also blame the federal government for cutting funding for crime prevention and phasing out a Clinton administration program that added 100,000 police officers nationwide. They say Washington's focus has shifted to homeland security at the expense of hometown security.

"The consensus is that the federal government walked away from that partnership," Abramson says. "Crime all of a sudden begins to ratchet up but police on the street have ratcheted significantly down. We draw a correlation."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse disagrees. "The increase in violent crime in some areas does not appear to be related to federal spending for law enforcement," he says. "DOJ spending has never accounted for more than 4% of total spending on state and local law enforcement."

Trenton, N.J., Mayor Douglas Palmer, president of the Conference of Mayors, met with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi this month. He hopes cities can gain more support now that Democrats control Congress.

"Over the '90s, cities have made great strides in coming back, revitalizing neighborhoods, but we've seen an escalation of violence," Palmer says.

"We have fewer police officers in our cities now than ever, with a greater proliferation of guns on the streets. … It is of the highest priority." Signs of the trend:

•The Police Executive Research Forum, a national police advocacy group, reported in October that murder, robbery and assaults had increased substantially in a cross-section of cities. The title of its report: A Gathering Storm— Violent Crime in America.

"There was a general sense that crime for most communities had dropped to such levels that it no longer was the issue that it was in the '90s and '80s," says Chuck Wexler, executive director of the police group. "We've seen a volatility in crime that we haven't seen in the previous eight years — and not just in the inner cities."

•Preliminary FBI data released last month show that violent crime rose 2.2% nationwide in 2005, the largest annual increase in 14 years and the first since 2001. In the latest statistics available, violent crime rose 3.7% from January to June 2006 compared with the first six months of 2005. Murders went up 1.4%, felony assaults 1.2% and robberies 9.7%. Property crime dropped 2.6%.

Justice Department teams visited 18 cities in November and December to determine why violent crime is spiking in some cities and not in others. They met with state and local law enforcement "to gain a better understanding of what is causing this increase and determine which efforts had been most effective in helping fight violent crime," Roehrkasse says.

•Orlando had 49 homicides last year, more than double the 22 in 2005. About 60% were linked to drugs. In Memphis, homicides rose from 118 in 2004 to 160 last year. Crime is down in Los Angeles and Chicago. In some cities, homicides are down, but robberies are up.

"We had a general rise in violent crime in not all but most cities in every region," says David Harris, professor of law and values at the University of Toledo College of Law.

'Perception is reality'

Mayors find themselves in an awkward spot. On one hand, they want to publicize their crime problems to get more funding. On the other, they worry that too much crime talk will create a negative perception of cities and scare off people.

"It has a very detrimental effect on what mayors work on each and every day to try to entice businesses to come," Palmer says. "Perception is reality."

Adds Harris: "City officials are quite aware that whatever progress they've made in attracting new residents and bringing people back to live in the city would be at risk if people didn't feel safe."

Cities must deal with crime head-on, says urban historian Joel Kotkin, author of The City. "We all hoped that the days of relatively high crime rates had come and gone," he says. "We now know the problem is not going away."

Many cities are taking action:

•In Trenton, homicides spiked to 31 in 2005 but dropped to 18 last year. More than 70% were gang-related, Palmer says. "We took down the leadership of nine gangs," he says. "They're in jail."

The city is cracking down on truancy and providing job training while redeveloping deserted industrial areas, getting rid of 5,500 deserted properties and building 1,600 homes for working families.

"We're making our cities more livable, but it's all inextricably tied to the whole crime piece," Palmer says. "We need resources."

•In Milwaukee, 1993 saw 160 homicides, a record high. By 2004, it had a record low 88. They climbed the next year to 122, then inched down to 103 last year.

"We did see probably a 20% increase in other categories of violent crime … an increase in armed robberies and shootings," says Mayor Tom Barrett, a former congressman.

Barrett and other mayors are working to strengthen background checks of gun buyers. He launched a fatherhood initiative to address the problem of absentee dads. He cut firefighting staff to start the year with 1,970 sworn police officers, the highest number since 2000, but is struggling to fill almost 200 vacancies, he says.

Downtown is thriving. About 14,000 people live there, 10 times more than a decade ago. Waterfront high-rises are going up. Work is starting on The Brewery, a multimillion-dollar conversion of the 26-acre old Pabst brewery complex into a residential and commercial center. The site borders downtown and inner-city neighborhoods.

•In Miami, overall crime is down, but homicides are up.

"The market is literally being flooded with assault weapons coming from Eastern Europe, the old Soviet bloc countries," Police Chief John Timoney says. Guns such as AK-47 rifles are selling for $150 to $200 compared with $700 or more not long ago, he says.

"Every jerk who wants one can have one," Timoney says.

Crime, he says, is not affecting Miami's downtown, where thousands of condominiums have been built or are planned. "But I was in New York when there was an all-time record high of homicides," he says. "Three kids were killed. Tourists from Utah were killed in the subway. When you start getting untraditional killings, that's when you get people's attention."

Louisville is proactive

While violent crimes in Louisville have occurred away from downtown, the city has been proactive. Security cameras were installed in high-crime areas and neighborhood watch programs strengthened. Police on horses and bicycles patrol the Fourth Street Live area of clubs, stores and restaurants. The city has razed low-income housing and built mixed-income housing.

"Downtown is one of the, if not the, safest geographic areas in our community," Abramson says.

So far, 70 homicides in 2004 (the highest since 1997 when there were 85), 64 in 2005 and 51 in 2006 have not quelled downtown's resurgence. The Muhammad Ali Center opened in recent years, the convention center was expanded, and an arena is planned. The city soon will break ground on Museum Plaza, a $465 million, 61-story skyscraper that could transform Louisville's skyline.

Police Chief Robert White has reached out to the community since he arrived four years ago. "If we're going to have a long-term effect in fighting crime, we have to get people engaged," he says.

Billboards across town advertise a 24-hour crime tip line, 574-LMPD. The first month in operation, 123 calls came in. Two years later, about 2,000 calls on average led to at least 30 arrests every month. Police credit the tip line with solving 18 homicides and shutting down three methamphetamine labs.

Donnie Morris, who lives in the high-crime West End, runs Prevention 2000 to teach children about gun safety, drugs and other threats. He and his wife, Jefferson County District Court Judge Joan Stringer, encourage churches to report anonymous crime tips they receive from their congregation.

"Areas that are most affected by crime are the ones that don't call the police, but they'll call their clergy," Morris says.

Phil and Kathy Scherer are the kind of empty nesters that many downtowns are attracting these days. The two had always been downtown boosters. After 33 years in the suburbs, they decided to "walk the walk," says Kathy, 58.

They bought a 3,000-square-foot penthouse in Preston Point, a striking modern building with a view of the river. She says she feels more comfortable being alone at night there than she did in her old suburban house.

Young people crowd the streets on their way to a skate park nearby. Joggers run by the waterfront. Mounted police trot past.

"We have always hoped that Louisville would have that 24-hour component," says Phil, 63, a city native and president of a commercial and industrial real estate firm. "I don't see crime as a deterrent."

Mayors hope it stays that way. The police executive association, however, expects the trend of rising crimes to continue this year.

"Robberies are occurring in parts of cities that didn't normally have robberies," Wexler says. "Cities are concerned."

The U.S. Department of Justice confirmed that Tijuana police arrested Manuel Martinez, 41, on Monday. He is accused of abducting the girl outside a school.

According to police, Martinez pulled the girl into a burgundy Toyota truck with California license plates, tied her up and threatened to rape and kill her. Police found the truck and rescued her, officials said. They also found U.S. Navy credentials, a military knife and various sexual aids in the truck, police said.

Martinez is a civilian contractor working for the U.S. Navy, according to the Justice Department. He is being held on kidnapping, attempted murder and other charges.

Rape Scene With 12-year-old Actress Stirs Debate (AP)

By Debbie Hummel, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 25, 2007

PARK CITY, Utah — At a festival that features several films with sexual content, including full male nudity and a documentary about bestiality, a Southern Gothic tale that includes the rape of a young girl is causing the biggest stir.

“Hounddog” is the story of Lewellen, a girl played by 12-year-old Dakota Fanning, who is growing up in the 1960s South. She is a free spirit obsessed with Elvis Presley and has little supervision by her abusive father and alcoholic grandmother.

Even before the first screening of “Hounddog” at the Sundance Film Festival this week, a Christian film critic, citing Fanning’s age, decried the movie as child abuse, and Roman Catholic activist Bill Donohue called for a federal investigation.

Fanning is defending her work as well as the movie, and so is the head of Sundance, who said it was courageous for director Deborah Kampmeier to tackle “challenging material.” “Hounddog” is entered in the festival’s dramatic category.

The disturbing scene lasts a few minutes, but is not graphic. There is no nudity, the scene is very darkly lit and only Fanning’s face and hand are shown.

Kampmeier said it took her a decade to get the film made, largely because of the rape scene, but cutting it was a compromise she was unwilling to make.

“This issue is so silenced in our society. There are a lot of women who are alone with this story,” she said.

"When you're shooting a film, it's the images you line up next to each other that create a story," Kampmeier said. "If you have a hand hitting the ground, Dakota screaming 'stop' and you see a zipper unzip — that creates a rape."

Ted Baehr, chairman of the Christian Film and Television Commission and publisher of the Web site movieguide.org, claims "Hounddog" breaks federal child-pornography law. He said the law covers material that "appears" to show minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct.

"Even if they're not actually performing the explicit act, we are dealing with a legal issue here," he said.

Baehr said Fanning is being exploited in the film, and that it should be considered an outrage.

"Children at 12 do not have the ability to make the types of decisions that we're talking about here," he said. "If we're offended by some comedian's racial slur, why aren't we offended by somebody taking advantage of a 12-year-old child?"

Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, said he has asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate whether antipornography laws have been broken.

Kampmeier said she talked with the children and their parents, but didn't go into great detail with the young actors about the content.

"I didn't have to articulate to Cody and Isabelle the psychological elements that were going on in this film," she said. "I used images to tell the story. I didn't manipulate these children or explain to these children what was going on."

Fanning said she and Kampmeier talked for months before the film was shot and spent a day painting pottery together and discussing the story.

"It's not really happening," Fanning said of the rape. "It's a movie, and it's called acting. I'm not going through anything. Cody and Isabelle aren't going through anything, their characters are.

"And for me, when it's done it's done," she said. "I don't even think about it anymore."

Sundance director Geoffrey Gilmore said independent filmmakers should pursue sensitive subject matter.

"I feel the mission and very nature of what Sundance is about is to provide a platform for that," he said.

Former Treasurer Sentenced To Prison (AP)

By Tim Korte, The Associated Press

AP, January 25, 2007

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) — Former state Treasurer Robert Vigil was sentenced Wednesday to three years in federal prison for pressuring a contractor to hire the previous treasurer's wife, despite concerns that she was unqualified.

Vigil, 53, was convicted in September of a single count of attempted extortion. Jurors acquitted him of 23 other counts of extortion and racketeering.

Vigil remained free after sentencing, wearing an ankle monitoring bracelet, but the judge ordered him to report to prison within 60 days.

"Mr. Vigil, good luck to you," U.S. District Judge James Browning said at the end of the hearing. "I hope you and your family can put this behind you. I hope the state can as well."

Vigil was also fined $97,000 and sentenced to three years of probation after his release. He resigned in October 2005, after the Legislature started impeachment proceedings.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathon Gerson said Vigil and co-conspirators — including Michael Montoya, his predecessor as treasurer — "horribly abused state trust to enrich themselves and enrich their friends."

Montoya pleaded guilty to lesser charges and aided the prosecution in its case against Vigil.

Vigil himself thanked jurors and judges for granting him a fair trial, as well as his friends for their support.

"I also want to thank all my family. They mean more to me than anything on earth," Vigil said, briefly choking up and glancing toward relatives. "I love them so much."

WMC-TV, January 25, 2007

Memphis cop snared in federal sting

A Memphis Police officer was arrested Wednesday as a result of Operation Tarnished Blue, an ongoing investigation by local, state and federal law enforcement into police corruption.

The officer is accused of money laundering.

Orlando Hebron is accused of taking nearly $8,000 in government funds, then making false statements to investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0121327

The indictment details a six month undercover investigation involving what appeared to be two kilos of cocaine, thousands of dollars in cash and offers of money laundering.

U.S. Attorney David Kustoff said the federal indictment alleges Hebron made several offers to launder money for an undercover informant. Prosecutors began this case after they received a tip.

"This investigation was originated by the Memphis Police Department," Kustoff said.

Federal documents allege that the informant agreed to give Hebron about $3,000 in cash. In exchange for the cash, Hebron promised to launder the money and return $2,400 of it in the form of a check.

Documents show Hebron never followed through, and told the informant he used some of the money "to pay some bills."

"This was a very thorough investigation and an investigation that brought someone to justice who wears the uniform," Kustoff said.

The indictment also alleges Hebron agreed to assist the informant in a robbery at a mini- storage last November where the informant says thousands of dollars in cash and two kilos of cocaine were stored.

This time the informant gave Hebron $4,900 to launder. Both decided to hide the fake drugs planted by the FBI.

When FBI agents interviewed Hebron about the break-in two months later, Prosecutors say he admitted to being there, but made several false statements about the incident.

"This office takes public corruption very seriously," Kustoff said. "It's a priority of this office."

Hebron was hired at the department in 1995. He was assigned to school security at Mitchell High School. He faces 15 years imprisonment if convicted.

Neteller Founder Pledges To Fight Charges (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott In New York

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

John Lefebvre, the co-founder of Neteller who stands accused of laundering billions of dollars in illegal online gaming proceeds, plans to fight all of the charges against him, his lawyer said.

"He's going to be contesting everything we know about the charges right now," said Vincent Marella, his attorney, outside the New York court where Mr Lefebvre was due to appear yesterday for a bail hearing.

Stephen Lawrence, the other founder of the London-listed online money transfer company who is charged alongside Mr Lefebvre, last week confirmed he would also contest the allegations.

Mr Lefebvre is on $5m bail and has had his passport confiscated after being arrested in Los Angeles last Monday. His lawyer described the circumstances of his arrest as a surprise, and said the US authorities were trying to send a message with the recent spate of arrests in the online gambling industry. "I think they want to stress the point that they are serious about enforcing gaming laws."

The US justice department considers online gambling to be illegal although it is an established and regulated industry elsewhere in the world.

David Carruthers, former chief executive of Betonsports, is awaiting trial in St Louis on fraud and racketeering charges related to his role at the internet gaming company.

But some US lawyers have questioned whether criminal prosecutions are likely to be successful because the companies involved are not based on US soil.

Mr Marella questions the validity of the charges. "I don't know why the [US authorities] are bothering with this now, or why at all. It's not clear that this is a liable area of law enforcement."

Neteller quit its US business following the arrests.

The US attorney for the Southern District of New York has sparked anger in London by seeking information from several banks and other businesses in connection with a wide-ranging inquiry into online gaming.

UC Riverside Official Is Indicted In Bribery Case (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

A UC Riverside administrator was indicted Wednesday on federal charges of soliciting and receiving several bribes from the contractor in charge of constructing the university's psychology building.

Theodore Chiu, 53, an associate director of the Office of Design and Construction, solicited a $50,000 bribe from Irvine contractor FTR International Inc. on Oct. 31, according to the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles.

Chiu asked for the payment when the company's president, Nizar Katbi, raised concerns about the $35-million project, including Chiu's choice of a subcontractor, according to an FBI affidavit.

Feds Probing Pirro - Again (NYDN)

By Leo Standora, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, January 25, 2007

The feds have again widened their criminal probe of former Westchester District Attorney Jeanine Pirro - this time to see if she used the resources of her office in her failed campaign against Sen. Hillary Clinton, WNBC reported yesterday.

FBI agents and local investigators are focusing on whether Republican Pirro or her staffers ran background checks on donors to her 2006 senatorial campaign using computers and databases at the DA's office, the station's Jonathan Dienst reported.

A number of former members of Pirro's campaign have been questioned by investigators, he said.

"If she used the resources of her office to check whether her donors were criminals, that's a good thing, not a bad thing," he said.

The good news for the couple yesterday was that Albert Pirro was reinstated as a lawyer, more than six years after he was disbarred for a tax fraud conviction.

His misadventures - the tax conviction, fathering a child with another woman, speeding tickets - often have been blamed for his wife's failure to rise beyond the local level in GOP politics. Jeanine Pirro eventually dropped out of the race against Clinton because of pressure from party chiefs.

She then switched to the state attorney general's race, losing to Andrew Cuomo.

She initially came under investigation for allegedly plotting to eavesdrop on her husband. The probe was later widened to include a jewelry business she ran briefly while DA.

Naples Daily News, January 25, 2007

Fernando Ferrer Jr. faces up to 30 years at his April sentencing

A jury Wednesday convicted a Collier County man of stealing the identities of 1,130 patients at Cleveland Clinic Naples that were used to submit more than $7 million in false claims to Medicare, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami.

Fernando Ferrer Jr. of Naples, a registered owner of Advanced Medical Claims in Naples, was convicted after a three-day trial in U.S. District Court in Fort Lauderdale on eight counts of conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government, computer fraud, wrongful disclosure of individual health information and aggravated identity theft.

Ferrer, 29, faces up to 30 years in prison at his sentencing April 27 before U.S. District Judge James Cohn in Fort Lauderdale. His co-defendant, Isis Machado, 23, of Miami Lakes, is also scheduled to be sentenced that day by Cohn.

Ferrer and Machado became the first individuals in South Florida convicted of criminal charges for violating the federal law protecting patients' privacy rights, known as the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPPA), according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Machado pleaded guilty on Jan. 11 to one count of conspiracy to commit computer fraud, identify theft and wrongful disclosure of individual health information. She faces a maximum of five years in prison and could be ordered to pay up to $250,000 in fines.

Machado was a front desk coordinator at Cleveland Clinic in Weston beginning in May 2005 and had authorized access to the hospital's computerized patient files.

Ferrer, her cousin, convinced her she could make money by copying patient information, including their Medicare numbers and Social Security numbers, and selling the information to him, according to their indictment in September. Federal authorities say Machado sold the information to Ferrer for $5 to $10 for each patient information.

Machado was caught by a co-worker at Cleveland Clinic Weston on June 26, 2006, and was fired. Hospital officials reported the theft to federal authorities and cooperated with the investigation.

The theft of the patient information resulted in more than $2.5 million in false Medicare claims being paid to health-care providers in the Miami area, according to authorities.

Following the indictment in September, Cleveland Clinic officials in Cleveland, Ohio, wrote the 1,130 Naples patients and established a toll-free number for them to call for help in credit and identity monitoring.

The Bradenton Herald, January 25, 2007

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - A jury convicted a man Wednesday for his involvement in the theft of personal and medical information of more than 1,100 patients at a suburban hospital, authorities said.

Fernando Ferrer Jr., 29, of Naples, was found guilty of one count of conspiring to defraud the United States, one count of computer fraud, one count of wrongful disclosure of individually identifiable health information, and five counts of aggravated identity theft, the U.S. Attorney's Office said in a statement.

Isis Machado, 23, of Miami Lakes, worked as a front desk coordinator at Cleveland Clinic in Weston from May 2005 to June 2006. She downloaded patient files and then sold them to Ferrer, who then made false Medicare claims as owner of Advanced Medical Claims Inc. in Naples, the indictment said.

Ferrer used the information to bill medical providers in Miami for services that were not rendered, resulting in $7 million fraudulently billed to Medicare, federal investigators said.

Machado entered a guilty plea Jan. 12 on one count of conspiracy to commit computer fraud, identify theft and wrongful disclosure of individual health information. Machado then testified against Ferrer.

Ferrer faces a maximum penalty of 30 years in prison.

Machado faces a maximum penalty of five years in prison, a $250,000 fine and could be ordered to pay restitution, according to authorities.

Ferrer and Machado are to be sentenced on April 27.

The names of their attorneys were not immediately known.

'Ambassador To Cash' Convicted In Con (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 25, 2007

A former Chicago investment adviser whose business card touted him as "Ambassador to Cash" was convicted Wednesday by a federal jury of conning an ailing woman out of more than a quarter million dollars.

Jurors took about three hours to find Brian D. McGowan guilty on 18 counts of wire fraud and one count of investment-adviser fraud.

During the nearly three-week trial, testimony by the mother of Michael Jordan and that of athletes with ties to Chicago denied claims by McGowan that he had managed their financial affairs.

Following the verdict, U.S. District Senior Judge John Grady said McGowan's testimony was the most egregious perjury he had seen in more than three decades on the bench.

Prosecutors are to return to Grady's courtroom Thursday in a bid to have McGowan taken into custody as a danger to the community and flight risk. He has been free on bail since he was charged in 2003.

McGowan, 49, now of Hilton Head, S.C., faces up to 5 years in prison at his sentencing May 9, according to Assistant U.S. Atty. Rachel Cannon.

In closing arguments to the jury Wednesday, McGowan's lawyer, Robert Gorence of Albuquerque, claimed that the victim of the fraud, Camille LaMie, formerly of Chicago, had pulled the con on McGowan.

In a rebuttal argument, Assistant U.S. Atty. Diane MacArthur warned jurors that McGowan was "continuing the con and trying to con you."

McGowan was convicted of misrepresenting his experience and qualifications and falsely claiming to manage finances for several sports stars to entice LaMie to invest almost $270,000, nearly her entire life savings.

Jordan's mother, Delores; former Bears player Matt Suhey; former basketball player Tim Hardaway; and former representatives of Bears great Walter Payton all testified that McGowan's claims of managing their investments—caught on the undercover tape-recordings—were false.

Prosecutors said McGowan introduced his mother to LaMie in an effort to win her trust. LaMie, now 63 and living in Myrtle Beach, S.C., has multiple sclerosis and requires a wheelchair.

McGowan claimed that he invested LaMie's $268,000 in legitimate investments, but prosecutors contended most of the money fueled a lavish lifestyle for McGowan.

McGowan bought a house overlooking mountains in Albuquerque, paid off his car lease, took numerous ski trips and shopped at Gucci, prosecutors said.

LaMie grew so desperate to get her money back from McGowan that she once attempted suicide, according to testimony. But Gorence scoffed at the claim as "a joke" and contended it was "another ploy to gain sympathy."

In addition to referring to himself as "Ambassador to Cash" on his business card, McGowan used stationery embossed with displays of foreign and U.S. currency, prosecutors said.

Prosecutor Cannon reminded jurors that McGowan once claimed to LaMie that a check hadn't been delivered to her after his dog bit an Airborne Express employee. Cannon called that explanation "a new twist on the oldest lie"—that the dog had eaten the homework.

"He is hoping to bury the truth in the avalanche of lies he has told you from the witness stand," Cannon told jurors.

Dugan back in DuPage Jail for Nicarico murder trial Convicted killer Brian Dugan was moved to DuPage County Jail on Wednesday to await trial for the 1983 murder of Jeanine Nicarico, 10, of Naperville. Through his lawyers, Dugan had asked to remain in Pontiac Correctional Center throughout the legal proceedings, citing a fear that DuPage inmates might attribute bogus incriminating statements to him. DuPage Judge George Bakalis rejected that request last fall. Dugan, who is serving life terms for two other murders and three sex attacks, has unsuccessfully offered to plead guilty to avoid the death penalty.

Girl, 12, sexually assaulted in Back of the Yards alleyChicago Police are asking for the public's help in finding a man who sexually assaulted a 12-year-old girl Tuesday in a Back of the Yards neighborhood alley. The girl was walking in the 4800 block of South Winchester about 4:45 p.m. Tuesday, when a man chased her into the alley. He grabbed her throat and sexually assaulted her, police said. Police described the attacker as a Hispanic man between 28 and 30 with a thin build and no facial hair. He had a small "post-type earring in his left eyebrow," and wore a dark, hooded sweat shirt and blue jeans, police said. Anyone with information should call police at (312) 492-3810.

Public defenders' chiefs seek Shakman protectionFive division chiefs in the Cook County public defender's office filed a petition in federal court Wednesday asking that their jobs be protected under the Shakman decree banning political hiring and firing. The lawyers -- Dorene Kuffer, Camille Kozlowski, Darlene Williams, Vicki Rogers and Kendall Hill -- received memos on Dec. 8 stating that County Board President Todd Stroger wanted them to sign undated resignation letters. Most ignored the memo, according to the petition. Three weeks later, they were told to sign the letters or they would be fired immediately, according to the petition filed with Judge Wayne Andersen. The filing seeks to have the division chiefs' jobs protected by the Shakman decree.

Investment adviser found guilty of tricking womanA former Chicago investment adviser who lied about having celebrity clients faces up to 5½ years in prison after a jury found him guilty of tricking an ailing woman into investing with him. The jury deliberated for about 3½ hours at the Dirksen Federal Building on Wednesday. Prosecutors said Brian D. McGowan tricked Camille La Mie, 63, into handing over the bulk of her wealth by boasting that his clients included Michael Jordan's mother and former NBA star Tim Hardaway. Prosecutors said McGowan used some of La Mie's money to pay his own bills. McGowan's attorney argued that La Mie, formerly of Chicago, was angry with McGowan because he'd failed to hide her income from the government. She then proceeded to set up McGowan, defense attorney Robert Gorence argued.

No passport, no problem -- yet So what happened to people who flew in to O'Hare and Midway airports Tuesday without the required passport? "We took their names down and gave them a fact sheet and a passport application," said Chirese Miles, spokeswoman for the Chicago office of U.S. Customs and Border Protection. "Nobody is being detained." Tuesday was the first day for a new rule requiring people entering the United States from Mexico, Canada and the Caribbean by airplane to present a valid passport. The unofficial grace period -- Customs has not decided when it will end -- is designed to document the names of travelers without passports so they can be flagged on future flights. "What, if any, action would be taken then would be determined on a case-by-case basis," said Miles. The first day went smoothly across the country, with Customs reporting no detainees or delays. In Chicago, of the estimated 1,600 people entering O'Hare and Midway on Tuesday from Mexico and the Caribbean, about two dozen did not have passports.

Man dies in plant accident A 20-year-old man died this week after his head got entangled in a hydraulic compressor at a southwest suburban distribution plant. Shawn Menzie, of Harvey, was operating a cardboard compressor Monday at Sertoma Centre at 4100 W. 127th St. in Alsip when he got caught, Alsip Police Chief Robert Troy said. Menzie was feeding pieces of cardboard into the machine and apparently stuck his head into the apparatus, Troy said. It was not clear why Menzie stuck his head into the machine, Troy said. Menzie died from blunt trauma to his head and neck.

Manhattan: Guilty Plea In Defrauding Of Priests (NYT)

Robert Riggio of Manhattan, who was charged with defrauding more than 60 priests over several years, pleaded guilty to wire fraud in Federal District Court yesterday, prosecutors said. Mr. Riggio, 60, faces up to 40 years in prison when he is sentenced in April, said Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan. Mr. Garcia said that Mr. Riggio stole more than $200,000 from 2004 to 2006 by calling priests with bogus pleas for help and requests for money. The funds often came from the priests' personal savings, Mr. Garcia said. Mr. Riggio was arrested in September after he asked for money from an F.B.I. agent posing as the niece of a priest who had been defrauded, Mr. Garcia said.

Shooting Suspects Led Quiet Lives (AP)

By KIM CURTIS

AP, January 25, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO - They'd long since exchanged the radical idealism of their youth for comparatively quiet lives as janitors, job counselors and Little League coaches. They'd become husbands, fathers and grandfathers.

But memories of a violent era in American history came rushing back this week when eight men with ties to the Black Panther Party were arrested in the 1971 killing of a San Francisco police officer.

Prosecutors say members of the Black Liberation Army, a violent offshoot of the Panthers, stormed the lobby of a police station that August night, killing Sgt. John V. Young by firing a shotgun through the speaking hole in a glass partition. A civilian clerk was hit in the arm as she ducked for cover behind a file cabinet.

According to prosecutors, Francisco Torres, Herman Bell and Henry Watson Jones staged the attack. John Bowman, Richard Brown and Harold Taylor were the lookouts. Ray Michael Boudreaux and Ronald Bridgeforth were the getaway drivers.

Anthony Bottom was supposed to be part of the attack team, but he was arrested the night before after attempting to fire a machine gun at a police sergeant.

Bowman died of liver cancer in December, and Bridgeforth is believed to have fled the country.

Seven others were arrested Tuesday on charges of murder and conspiracy to commit murder. An eighth, Richard O'Neal, was charged only with conspiracy.

Investigators say new evidence led them to finally make the arrests in Young's killing, but they won't specify what that is. Lawyers for some of the former BLA members say the case is really about revenge.

It isn't the first time their names were tied to Young's death, but six of the eight men had managed to live relatively normal lives in the ensuing 36 years.

Taylor, now 58, moved to Florida where he worked as a utility lineman and lived with his daughter and girlfriend.

Boudreaux, 64, and Jones, 71, moved to Altadena, north of Pasadena, where they live within a mile of each other and remain friends. Boudreaux is an electrician for Los Angeles County; Jones is a real estate appraiser.

Torres, 58, moved to Queens, New York where he's lived in the same house for 27 years, according to his lawyer, Michael Warren, who called this prosecution "ridiculous" and "without any merit whatsoever." He said his client is a married "family man" with two sons who's active in his community and coaches Little League. He said Torres served in the U.S. Army in Vietnam and was disabled by Agent Orange.

Richard Brown, 65, and Richard O'Neal, 57, stayed in San Francisco. Brown worked for nearly 20 years as a job counselor and developer at a community center and O'Neal worked as a custodian for the city.

Bell, 59, and Bottom, 55, were the two exceptions. Both are serving life sentences for killing two New York City police officers during the same violent spree that claimed Young, according to authorities. But both men earned college degrees in prison, a warden has credited Bottom with helping to prevent riots. Bell, a former scholarship athlete, coaches inmate football teams. Both maintain they were framed by the FBI.

Police reopened the case in 1999, saying they had new information. A grand jury heard evidence and several members of the group refused to testify, but no charges were filed.

In 2005, police turned the case over to the state attorney general's office. Again, several people were summoned and refused to testify, including Taylor, Brown, Boudreaux and Jones. They argued the grand jury system is inherently unfair because defendants aren't allowed to have a lawyer present.

They also protested their treatment during an earlier phase of the investigation.

Two years after the killing, Taylor and Bowman were arrested in New Orleans. But a judge dismissed the charges in 1976 because the men had allegedly been tortured by San Francisco police officers during an interrogation.

Over three days, the men said, they were stripped, blindfolded and beaten. They were covered with blankets soaked in boiling water and their genitals shocked with an electric prod. Without food or water, Taylor has said publicly, the men finally relented and confessed.

Under those circumstances, Taylor recalled during a recent public speaking engagement, "Whatever you want me to say, I will say it."

Until the officers who beat them were brought to justice, the men said, they would refuse to answer the grand jury's questions. They went public, speaking to activist and community groups from Boston to Chicago and vowing to dedicate the rest of their lives to stopping torture.

They even gained the support of Harvard law professor Charles Ogletree and actor and San Francisco native Danny Glover. Ogletree did not return a call on Wednesday; Glover was in India and unavailable.

Two defense lawyers said Wednesday they believe the new charges are retaliation for the former Panthers' public statements.

"The government was embarrassed" when earlier attempts to indict the men fell through, said Warren, Torres' lawyer.

Taylor appeared briefly in court Wednesday via a video link from a Panama City, Fla. jail, where he's being held without bail. He said he would fight extradition to California, but does not yet have a lawyer.

Jones' lawyer, John Philipsborn, said he looks forward to defending his client.

Boudreaux's lawyer, Michael Burt, said his client is innocent. "He didn't murder anybody," he said.

Brown's longtime friend, the Rev. Amos Brown, called him a "decent human being," who's been active in his community. He's a member of the African American Police Community Relations Board and an anti-poverty neighborhood group. The pastor of Third Baptist Church said he visited his friend in jail Tuesday and he declared his innocence.

Stunned Friends Laud The Men They Know Now (SFC)

By Leslie Fulbright And Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, January 25, 2007

Talk in the Western Addition, whether on the steps of old Victorians, on the benches near the community center or among residents of the housing projects, is centered on Richard Brown.

Not the Richard Brown who police say participated in the killing of a police officer 35 years ago, but the Richard Brown who is a father, community activist and mentor to neighborhood youth.

And at a Bayview district community center, some workers on Wednesday were still reeling from the news that Richard O'Neal, a 57-year-old maintenance man who changed their lights and joked with them, did not show up for work because he is in jail.

Brown, 65, is among eight men charged Tuesday with murdering San Francisco police Sgt. John Young and conspiring to commit murder in other attacks. O'Neal, who also lives in the Western Addition, was arrested but charged only with conspiracy.

"Richard Brown is someone who is intensely concerned with his community and goes way beyond the call of duty," said the Rev. Arnold Townsend, an assistant pastor at Rhema Word Christian Fellowship Church who has known Brown for nearly 40 years. "He's been involved in almost every good work that went on in our neighborhood."

Jim Queen, a commissioner with the city's Juvenile Probation Department, has known Brown for 20 years and has watched the effect he had on neighborhood youth over the years.

"He has a fantastic rapport with the young people in the Western Addition," Queen said.

"He grew up there and had a special way with the kids, a stern tough-love way. He demanded high standards and made sure he was always available to them," Queen said.

Brown, who lives in the apartment complex on the 1000 block of Fillmore Street, worked for 20 years as a program coordinator in the Employment Service Program at the Ella Hill Hutch Community Center until he was laid off three years ago. He also is a founding member of the African American Police Community Relations Board and several other neighborhood organizations.

"His job was never 9 to 5," Townsend said. "He was at community meetings at night, on boards, in the neighborhood, working for affordable housing. He was always bugging me to come to meetings. We didn't do fun together; I never saw him out in the clubs."

O'Neal, who has two grown sons and whose wife was murdered in 1979, has worked for the past few years at the Southeast Community Center on Oakdale Avenue in the Bayview. The four-story concrete building primarily houses classes offered by City College of San Francisco.

People who work there said they were stunned by his arrest, recalling him as a kind and gentle man who always had a smile on his face and would at times stay late to fix lights or other things.

Veronica Hunnicutt, the dean of the southeast college campus, said she knew a teenage O'Neal when she was a schoolteacher in the late 1960s.

She met him again through his job at the facility.

"Oh, my God, we're just utterly stunned. It's taken us all aback because he is such a nice man," Hunnicutt said. "He is a trusted employee who would do anything to help us.

"I hope they look at all of the information, because this man has been wonderful out here. He would take the shirt off his back to try to help you."

Henry Calhoun, a site supervisor at the campus, said O'Neal is a good person, "friendly, outgoing, easy to get along with. I hope everything will be all right for him in the long run. I hope they release him."

Both Brown and O'Neal have criminal records. Brown was arrested twice in 1968 for his alleged involvement in shootouts with police. He also was convicted in 1961 of robbery and in 1973 of buying a gun with a fake identification and denying he was a felon.

State prosecutors said O'Neal was one of three men who opened fire on Lawrence Heap, a patrol special officer who was sitting in a car outside a San Francisco convalescent home he was guarding.

Heap was struck in both arms but returned fire, wounding O'Neal. O'Neal, then 21, was convicted and served prison time in the case, his attorney said.

Police said all the men charged Tuesday were members of the Black Liberation Army, a militant offshoot of the Black Panthers that operated from about 1971 to 1981.

"We all make mistakes with our lives," Hunnicutt said. "Based on the gentleman that we worked with and how kind and gentle of a man we knew, it would be a shame if what he has done with his life is not factored into this. We know people are punished for their crimes, but there is also something called redemption."

Neighbors said O'Neal is a quiet guy. He has worked for the city's public works department since 1981. Over the years, he made street signs and did maintenance work at City Hall, just a few blocks from his home.

Attorney James Bustamante described O'Neal as an "easygoing, straight-shooting guy" who hasn't been in trouble with the law since his early 20s.

Many in the Western Addition community knew both men: O'Neal was the quiet one who kept to himself, and Brown was an activist and mentor to neighborhood youth.

Mesha Monge-Irizarry, whose son was killed by San Francisco police, knows Brown through his work with the African American Police Community Relations Board.

"He is a very focused brother who does a lot of work without taking credit, who is loved and respected by the community," she said. "The arrest of this old man, who has been a youth counselor fighting violence day to day, is obscene. He was deterring kids from street crime, helping our youth to have a positive outlook on their future."

Dario Harper, 35, grew up in the Western Addition and has known Brown his entire life.

"He has this way of talking to young people and helping them understand they have to change the way they live if they want to survive," Harper said. "Based on his life experiences, people respected him so they listened.

"We don't have a lot of older people who take the time to talk to us like he does."

THE DEATH OF SGT. JOHN YOUNG Ex-militant Seen As Likely To Testify At Cohorts' Trial (SFC)

By Jaxon Van Derbeken, Chronicle Staff Writer

More than 30 years ago, Ruben Scott testified against his alleged Black Liberation Army brethren in the slaying of two New York City police officers.

Now, defense attorneys suspect, Scott will be alone among the former militants to testify against his one-time confederates, who were charged Tuesday in the 1971 slaying of San Francisco police Sgt. John Young and a larger conspiracy to kill police.

While state prosecutors won't say whether Scott will take the witness stand, defense attorneys say he is the only insider whose testimony has ever been used to convict BLA members of a crime.

And he is the only former BLA member previously indicted in the slaying of Young whom prosecutors have chosen not to name again in the current case. The charges against him were dismissed in 1976.

"We assume he is a witness for the government -- he had a case dismissed in San Francisco on this very same incident," said Stuart Hanlon, a lawyer for Herman Bell, an alleged leader in the group who was convicted when Scott testified in the New York case and who now is accused of killing Young with a shotgun.

If Scott is slated to take the stand for the prosecution, a major issue will be whether his testimony should be allowed -- or believed -- because of statements he long ago gave implicating himself and two other reputed BLA members in Young's slaying while incarcerated in a New Orleans jail.

The confession led to the 1975 indictments of Scott, Harold Taylor and John Bowman in the ambush attack on San Francisco's Ingleside Police Station that resulted in Young's death and the wounding of a civilian clerk.

But the statements were ruled inadmissible because of court findings that they had been obtained after the men were tortured by New Orleans police and denied access to defense lawyers.

Scott, in a taped interview with a radio journalist in December 1975, said he was subjected to days of torture in New Orleans. The abuse relented, he said, only when he was speaking to federal agents and San Francisco police.

He recounted how he was stripped and punched in the stomach and chest. He said at one point his feet were put in a water tank and he was threatened with electrocution. New Orleans police also stuck him with cattle prods and needles, he said.

"They have a little thing: They don't hit you in the face, where it would show," he said. One investigator cocked a gun and threatened to shoot him through the ear "to see if the bullet would come out the other ear," he said.

Over a period of four to five days, he said, "New Orleans police department would wup on you, beat you, then bring you to the FBI to talk."

The alleged abuse occurred two years after Young was shot on Aug. 29, 1971, when at least three men stormed into Ingleside Police Station and, through an opening in the station's bulletproof glass, blasted the veteran police officer with a shotgun, killing him. A civilian clerk also was shot in the attack, but she survived.

The current charges name Bell as Young's killer. Also named in the charges is another man convicted of killing the New York officers, Anthony Bottom. They are also accused of orchestrating a larger conspiracy to kill officers between 1968 and 1973. Taylor and Bowman, who recently died, are also named in the charges, as are Richard Brown, Francisco "Cisco" Torres, Ray Boudreaux and Henry Watson Jones. Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth is charged but has not been arrested. Richard O'Neal, a custodian at San Francisco City Hall, is named in the broader conspiracy but not in the Young slaying. Brown and O'Neal appeared in San Francisco Superior Court on Tuesday but did not enter a plea.

Hanlon, Bell's defense lawyer in the new San Francisco case, said that given what Scott has been subjected to -- and other statements he has made at odds with his past confession -- his credibility as a witness is doubtful.

"He has given various statements saying he was tortured," said Hanlon. "He's just all over the place. He had been tortured. He is a tortured soul."

Scott also recounted the torture when he testified in 1975 to help convict BLA members Bell, now 59, Bottom, now 55, and the late Albert Nuh Washington of the slayings of the two New York police.

The prosecutor in the New York slayings, Robert Tanenbaum, now a private lawyer in Beverly Hills who co-wrote a book on the case, said Scott's testimony helped gain convictions of three men in the May 21, 1971, slaying of New York police Officers Waverly Jones and Joseph Piagentini.

The first trial of five men originally charged in the New York officers' death did not go well for prosecutors, Tanenbaum said. After the first trial ended in a hung jury, a New York police investigator went to New Orleans to talk to Scott again, Tanenbaum recalled.

The investigator said Scott had previously suggested he had an "ace in the hole," Tanenbaum said. At that point, Scott -- facing charges in San Francisco in the slaying of Young four years earlier -- suddenly agreed to testify against the five men who were accused, helping secure three convictions. The charges against two brothers, Francisco and Gabriel Torres, were dismissed during the second trial.

Scott, at the time of the second trial, was being held on suspicion of a bank robbery in New Orleans.

It was Scott, Tanenbaum said, who led authorities to a missing gun that belonged to one of the New York officers. Scott went with authorities to Mississippi, who unearthed the gun where Scott said he watched Bell bury it on a farm where Bell grew up.

"Everything he said to us was corroborated -- when you put a witness on, you vouch for his credibility as an officer of the court. I thought he was credible. Based on the corroboration, I thought he was highly credible," the former prosecutor said.

Scott also recounted how New Orleans police tortured him into confession, using cattle prods, Tanenbaum said. He also expressed fear to the judge that his life was at risk in custody.

Amid the allegations of abuse, the first San Francisco case collapsed in 1976. The grand jury indictment was dismissed after a court found that the men lacked counsel and had been tortured in New Orleans.

Michael Burt, who represents Boudreaux in the Young slaying, said Scott apparently testified before the grand jury that later indicted him. Burt said he has records showing that Scott was the only one of three accused who got such a subpoena. He apparently was a cooperating witness, Burt said.

Still, Burt said, defense lawyers have never seen any grand jury testimony by Scott or anyone else in the indictment.

"The file is missing -- we have made lots of efforts to get it," Burt said. "The original file and testimony and everything that happened are no longer part of the public record."

Convicted NY Cop Killer Stole Pennsylvania Man's Identity (AP)

By William Kates, Associated Press Writer

The real John T. Healy wants everyone to know he's no cop killer.

"I'm just a regular guy," said Healy, 47, of Yardley, Pa., who has endured a nightmare over the past two weeks after learning that the man who apparently stole his identity two years ago was charged with _ and ultimately convicted of _ killing an upstate New York police officer.

It was bad enough the thief stole $3,500 from his bank accounts, purchased a used Cadillac Escalade under his name, bought car insurance and even bailed a criminal cohort out of jail _ which led to an armed bounty hunter showing up at his doorstep.

"It's been quite unsettling," Healy said in a telephone interview Wednesday.

"It's not so much the money, I've gotten that back. It's the hassle and aggravation, over and over," said Healy, a salesman for Home Depot. "Seeing your name in the paper being charged with murdering a cop is pretty intense."

The man authorities prosecuted under the name John Healy was convicted Monday of second-degree murder for his role in the death of New Hartford Police Officer Joseph Corr following a million-dollar jewelry store robbery.

Corr, 30, was gunned down in February 2006 behind a convenience store in Kirkland, N.Y., as he chased "Healy" and an accomplice, Walter Richardson, who were running away after their getaway car crashed.

"Healy" was captured at the crash scene and charged with murder because he participated in the crimes that led to Corr's death. Richardson, the suspected gunman, hijacked a tow truck and fled. He was killed the next day in a shootout with U.S. Marshals near his home in Chester, Pa., 15 miles southwest of Philadelphia.

Assistant Oneida County District Attorney Kurt Hameline said the defendant was indicted as "John Healy, et al," because a check of his fingerprints turned up approximately 20 different aliases.

Prosecutors settled on the name John T. Healy because the suspect had a Pennsylvania driver's license with that name on it, Hameline said.

"We assumed it was a name he made up. We did not know there was a real John T. Healy until after jury selection began," said Hameline, who only learned of the real John Healy when he got a call Jan. 10 from Yardley Police Officer William Golden, who was investigating the stolen identity case.

At that point, Hameline said, prosecutors decided to go ahead with the trial rather than introduce an element of doubt about who the defendant was. The jury convicted the fake Healy after deliberating for just two hours.

"We're still not 100 percent sure who he really is. Toussaint Martin is a name he was using most recently before he was John Healy, but we're not even sure of that one. It didn't make sense to make a motion to change his name if we don't even know if it's the right one," Hameline said.

FBI Special Agent Jerri Williams in Philadelphia said Wednesday that the defendant is known to her agency as Toussaint Martin, 38, formerly of Philadelphia. He has been "known to law enforcement for a number of years" and was a suspect in other jewelry store robberies when he was caught in New York, she said.

If the defendant's identity is firmly established before he is sentenced on March 22, prosecutors will make a motion then to change his name, Hameline said. If not, he will be sentenced as John Healy and prosecutors will ask Judge Michael Dwyer to issue a legal document clarifying the real John T. Healy's identity so he can prove he's not a convicted murderer.

"We understand the problems this has created for him and obviously we're sorry that he's had to suffer these consequences," Hameline said.

Healy suspects his identity was stolen in autumn 2005 when he lived in an apartment in Yardley. He said maintenance men were in his apartment at the time. After they left, his benefits package from his employer _ including his Social Security number _ turned up missing, along with one of his checks.

He's also experienced problems traveling. He said he had to endure lengthy interrogations from customs officials when he returned from a trip to Canada and from ship employees when he came back from a cruise in the Caribbean. Each time he had to explain his identity had been stolen.

Healy said he was unaware of the murder trial until two weeks ago when he received calls from local media outlets.

"I had buddies call up and say, 'Hey, can I get some jewelry for my wife?'" he said, trying to find some humor in his situation.

Hameline said the fact that the ID theft is on record in national criminal databases should protect the real John Healy in the future. Healy, who is separated with two young daughters, said his credit appears fine. He recently bought a new house.

"I'm not bitter about it, and I wouldn't have wanted to jeopardize their case, but it's strange to me that they couldn't figure out who he was before they tried him. They had, what, 11 months? I just don't understand," Healy said.

Documents Dispute Delays Coke Secrets Trial (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 25, 2007

The judge in the Coke secrets trial sent the jury home Wednesday morning so attorneys could haggle over how to handle sensitive documents the company says contain proprietary trade information.

Coke's lawyers and prosecutors had thought the judge was going to seal hundreds of pages of Coca-Cola documents from public view, showing them only to jurors who would be sworn to secrecy.

Testimony Delayed In Coca-Cola Trial (AP)

By Johnny C. Clark

AP, January 25, 2007

ATLANTA - A federal judge delayed testimony Wednesday in the trial of a former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant because of controversy over the use of sensitive documents.

A government prosecutor asked for a recess to review more than 750 pages of defense documents to determine whether portions should be redacted before being shown to the jury.

U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester granted the recess until 11 a.m. Thursday. When Forrester released the jury for the day, he expressed frustration with the prosecution and defense attorneys.

"In an effort to simplify things - they didn't," Forrester said.

Joya Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal conspiracy charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty. Two co-defendants have pleaded guilty to conspiracy, and one has testified against her.

Williams, Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged plans were foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light.

The executive Williams worked for, Javier Sanchez Lamelas, is expected to return to the stand when testimony resumes. He testified Tuesday that there was no reason for Williams to bring confidential Coca-Cola documents to her home.

Bloomberg News

The Arizona Republic, January 25, 2007

ATLANTA - A former Coca-Cola Co. secretary's trade-secrets theft trial was stopped for a day so the company can work with prosecutors to keep sensitive information from becoming public.

A dispute over documentary evidence arose between prosecutors and defense lawyers as Javier Sanchez Lamelas, a company vice president for trademarks, was to resume testifying Wednesday against Joya Williams. U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester stopped the trial until today.

At issue is whether much or all of the defense documentary evidence would be sealed, even though it had been edited by the government to delete trade secrets. Forrester said edited papers introduced in court will be made public. The judge gave prosecutors another day to talk with company lawyers and re-edit papers if necessary.

Killer's Statement Won't Lead To Charges (AP)

By Gene Johnson, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, January 25, 2007

SEATTLE -- A convicted murderer's statements to the FBI about the deaths of two young girls in Washington are not sufficient to bring criminal charges in the deaths, though the man remains "a viable person of interest" in the slayings, investigators said Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors in Idaho said Tuesday that Joseph Edward Duncan III had confessed to the Washington killings and the slaying of a California boy in statements to the FBI after he was arrested in July 2005 with an Idaho girl who had vanished seven weeks earlier.

The prosecutors referred to the statements in a filing in which they gave their notice of intent to seek the death penalty on charges that Duncan kidnapped the Idaho girl, Shasta Groene, and kidnapped and killed her brother, Dylan.

But on Wednesday, Washington authorities said the statements about the deaths in their state weren't enough to merit charges. Though Duncan's statements revealed some knowledge of the case, he could have gleaned it from a fellow inmate or elsewhere, King County sheriff's spokesman Sgt. John Urquhart said.

He said the county could not file charges based on the information Duncan provided, but that Duncan would remain "a viable person of interest."

"Characterizing what Duncan said as a 'confession' has a huge impact on the family," Urquhart said. "They think the case has been solved and that we know who killed their kids. But we don't know that for sure, and we continue to investigate."

In the notice of intent to seek the death penalty, the U.S. attorney's office in Boise said Duncan confessed to killing Carmen Cubias, 9, and Sammiejo White, 11, in Washington state in 1996 and Anthony Martinez, 10, in California in 1997.

The two girls were abducted from the Crest Motel in Seattle. Their skeletal remains were found 17 months later in Bothell, a Seattle suburb.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Wendy Olson in Boise has declined to discuss Duncan's statements in detail. The King County prosecutor's office in Seattle also declined to comment.

Duncan pleaded guilty last October in Idaho state court to first-degree murder and kidnapping for the May 16, 2005, hammer slayings of Dylan and Shasta's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie, and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade. Prosecutors say he killed them to get Dylan and Shasta, then took the siblings to the mountains of Montana, sexually abused them for weeks, and killed Dylan. The boy's body was found at a remote campsite.

The girl was rescued when she was seen with Duncan at a Denny's restaurant in Idaho.

California authorities have charged Duncan in the Martinez case; they said a partial fingerprint was matched to Duncan.

Deal Struck Over Jeffs' Evidence? (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 25, 2007

Federal prosecutors say they have struck a deal with Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs over documents, letters and other evidence seized when he was arrested.

That deal voids any claims Jeffs has that the documents are privileged communications between the polygamist leader and his followers, the U.S. Attorney's Office for Utah said in a motion asking a federal judge to dismiss the evidence-dispute case in Nevada.

Jeffs' lawyers maintain the documents are protected under his First Amendment right to freedom of religion. Richard Wright, Jeffs' Nevada attorney, was out of town and did not return a call seeking comment Wednesday.

In court documents filed in federal court in Las Vegas, the U.S. Attorney's Office revealed that a deal was made with Jeffs in the days following his arrest.

"The United States would provide Mr. Jeffs' counsel with copies of all documents and imaged computer files seized from the Escalade so that Mr. Jeffs and his counsel could designate which items they believed to be privileged," assistant U.S. Attorney Jared Bennett wrote, adding that Jeffs agreed to it.

Jeffs, 51, was a fugitive on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until his capture in a traffic stop near Las Vegas last August. Jeffs was in a Cadillac Escalade with one of his wives and his brother when they were pulled over by a Nevada Highway Patrol trooper because the vehicle's temporary tag wasn't visible.

In an affidavit obtained by the Deseret Morning News on Wednesday, an FBI agent revealed more details about Jeffs' arrest. Conflicting stories raised suspicions about a man in the car who identified himself as "John Findley."

"The driver of the Escalade was removed from the vehicle for questioning, whereupon he told the trooper that he and his two companions in the Escalade were on a one-week vacation," FBI Special Agent Martin Schwarz wrote. "The driver stated that they had been to San Francisco, Calif., to see the ocean and that they were travelling to Hilldale (sic), Utah."

Warren Jeffs The trooper questioned "John Findley," who said they were on their way back to Denver.

After getting the driver's consent to search, the trooper found envelopes addressed to "President Jeffs" and two yellow envelopes containing cash, debit cards and tools. FBI agents arrived on the scene and spoke to "John Findley," who admitted he was Warren Jeffs.

A search warrant for the Escalade was filed days later.

"The FBI inventory found numerous items, including hundreds of documents, computers, cash, debit cards, several electronic devices, wigs, and masks," Schwarz wrote.

A few days after Jeffs' arrest, Wright filed an emergency motion in federal court seeking to have the papers either returned to the FLDS leader or sealed. The U.S. Attorney's Office claims a deal was made to let Jeffs' attorneys review the seized evidence. Federal authorities have organized a special "taint team" of lawyers to look at the documents and computer files and settle any disputes over what is privileged.

Jeffs' lawyers are crafting a list of evidence they believe is privileged, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"Mr. Jeffs concedes that 'adequate safeguards are in place' to protect the allegedly privileged seized materials," Bennett wrote.

In the court documents, the U.S. Attorney's Office said that Jeffs remains "the subject of an ongoing federal investigation." U.S. Attorney's spokeswoman Melodie Rydalch would not comment beyond that statement on Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors have also asked that any future legal challenges be moved from Las Vegas to Salt Lake City, where the FBI's case is based.

Meanwhile, lawyers for the financial arm of the FLDS Church want a judge to let them see what the FBI seized. The lawyers have filed court papers asking to see if any evidence has to do with the United Effort Plan Trust, which is now under a Utah court's control.

Jeffs is facing an April trial on charges of rape as an accomplice. He is accused of performing a child bride marriage between a 14-year-old girl and her 19-year-old cousin.

Jurors Hear Closings In Case Against Abortion Provider's Killer (AP)

By Carolyn Thompson

AP, January 25, 2007

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) — Anti-abortion extremist James Kopp made a last attempt Wednesday to convince jurors he didn't mean to kill a doctor he shot, while a prosecutor countered there are "no do-overs" when shooting someone.

The two sides presented their closing arguments in Kopp's trial on charges he violated the federal Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act by killing Dr. Barnett Slepian with a single shot from a Russian military rifle in 1998. He could face life in prison without parole if convicted.

Kopp, known as "Atomic Dog" among his peers, is already serving a 25-year-to-life sentence for a state conviction on second-degree murder in the doctor's death.

Representing himself during his federal trial, he acknowledged firing the shot that killed Slepian inside his Amherst home but said his goal was to disable the doctor and prevent him from performing abortions the following day.

"If it happened the way I wanted it to, he would have his arm in a sling," said Kopp, 52, who is suspected in the nonfatal shootings of three Canadian doctors and one in Rochester.

"There are no do-overs, no take-backs when you take an assault rifle and pull the trigger," Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathleen Mehltretter said.

Though U.S. District Judge Richard Arcara had instructed Kopp not to discuss abortion during the trial, Kopp at least twice began describing the procedure in detail during his closing statement and was stopped each time by the prosecution and judge.

"Abortion is murder. I tried to stop it," he said.

"Dr. Slepian, bless his heart, he felt force reflected back on him that he began," Kopp said, as Slepian's widow, Lynne, and her parents watched from the courtroom's front row.

Lynne Slepian and two of the couple's four children, then 7 to 15 years old, were in the kitchen with Slepian when the bullet pierced his body and ricocheted off a cabinet and wall before coming to rest in an adjoining room.

"Do not be concerned your vote is a vote against children," Mehltretter told jurors. "It is a vote for children to live in a safe and orderly society."

After the Oct. 23, 1998, shooting, Kopp fled to Mexico, Ireland and finally France, where he was captured in March 2001. He was added — along with Osama bin Laden — to the FBI's list of the Ten Most Wanted fugitives in June 1999.

Jurors deliberated about an hour Wednesday before being sent home after asking to review testimony concerning the timeline of the shooting. Deliberations were scheduled to resume Thursday morning.

3rd Dallas Sibling Gets Prison Over Katrina Relief Theft (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, January 25, 2007

A Dallas man who used stolen Hurricane Katrina debit cards is joining two of his siblings in prison over the same scam, authorities said.

Abram Wesley Hines, 25, was sentenced Wednesday to 10 months behind bars, the U.S. attorney's office said.

He's the middle brother of Brian Oneal Hines, 21, and Charmaine Denise Hines, 32, also of Dallas.

Brian Hines was a paid Red Cross temporary worker and also a volunteer, officials said. He admitted stealing at least 80 Red Cross debit cards meant for victims of Katrina, which hit the Gulf coast in August 2005.

He was sentenced to 30 months and ordered to make nearly $203,000 in restitution. She was sentenced to 41 months in prison and ordered to repay more than $23,000.

Evidence presented Wednesday to U.S. District Judge Jorge Solis indicated Abram Hines received about $15,000 in cash, credit cards and a car as a result of the fraud.

New Ethics Charges For N.C. Prosecutor (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

Mike Nifong, whose prosecution of three Duke University lacrosse players on rape and sexual misconduct charges has faced growing criticism, has been hit with a second set of misconduct charges.

In a complaint filed Wednesday, the North Carolina State Bar accused Durham County District Attorney Nifong of withholding evidence from the defense and making misleading statements in court. It charged him last month with violating rules of professional conduct by making misleading and inflammatory statements to reporters about the athletes, who were suspended from the university.

Duke permitted two of the athletes, Reade Seligmann and Collin Finnerty, to return to school this month, following the dismissal Dec. 22 of rape charges, the most serious charges against them. The third defendant, David Evans, has graduated. All three say they are innocent.

The expanded ethics complaint, which says Nifong's actions amount to a "systematic abuse of prosecutorial discretion," could lead to his disbarment, says L. Thomas Lunsford II, the state bar's executive director.

Nifong's lawyer, Dudley Witt, says, "We will strongly dispute any suggestion he (Nifong) intentionally withheld evidence." He says his client will not step down and continues "his day-to-day duties."

The complaint says a trial is scheduled for May.

Nifong removed himself from the case Jan 12. He said he had a conflict of interest after the first ethics charges were filed. The office of State Attorney General Roy Cooper has taken over.

Cooper has a special prosecutions unit that handles dozens of cases annually referred by district attorneys, says his spokeswoman, Noelle Talley.

Nifong dropped the rape charges after the accuser, a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a lacrosse team party last March, said she was no longer certain she'd been raped. Nifong said he would continue to pursue kidnapping and sexual offense charges.

The new complaint cites instances between May and mid-December when Nifong said in court or legal filings that he knew of no additional evidence that would help the defense. The complaint says that testing done by DNA Security Inc. had concluded by April 10 that none of the samples given to police by 46 lacrosse players matched any material found on the accuser. A week later, Nifong charged two of the men with rape.

Last month, DNA Security's director testified that he and Nifong agreed to include only DNA matches in their report, not results showing no matches between the accuser and players.

Nifong, despite the controversy over his handling of the Duke case, won election last fall after being appointed in the spring to replace a district attorney who had become a judge.

More Ethics Charges Brought Against Official In Duke Case (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

The North Carolina State Bar filed a second, more serious round of ethics charges yesterday against the district attorney in Durham, N.C., accusing him of "systematic abuse of prosecutorial discretion" in the sexual assault case against three former members of the Duke University lacrosse team.

The bar complaint said the district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, had illegally withheld DNA evidence from defense lawyers and then intentionally misled the presiding judge and bar officials about doing so.

The new charges added to a previous ethics complaint accusing Mr. Nifong of making false and prejudicial remarks about the case to the news media. A three-member independent panel is expected to hear the matter against him this summer. Penalties could include disbarment.

Mr. Nifong's lawyer, David B. Freedman, denied yesterday that there had been "any sort of intentional unethical conduct." In a telephone interview, Mr. Freedman said that Mr. Nifong had a "flawless record" for ethics in 28 years as a prosecutor and that a written response, to be issued within 30 days, would give his side of the case.

"I have great confidence the panel will render a fair and just verdict," Mr. Freedman said.

The case against the former players is being reviewed by the state attorney general's office, which took it over from Mr. Nifong after he recused himself on Jan. 12. At the time, he said he faced a conflict of interest between prosecuting the case and defending himself against the first set of ethics charges, filed Dec. 28.

Much of the new ethics complaint focuses on Mr. Nifong's handling of private DNA testing and his remarks to a judge and bar officials about it. Those tests were arranged by Mr. Nifong after a state laboratory found no semen, blood or saliva from lacrosse players on or in the woman or on her clothes. Using a more sophisticated test, the private laboratory found DNA from multiple men on the woman and her underwear, but none from any of the lacrosse players.

Mr. Nifong and the lab director decided to tell defense lawyers only about the positive matches, including a link to the woman's boyfriend, in a summary report of the DNA work, said the bar, a state agency that regulates lawyers in North Carolina. The negative findings, which the bar said "tended to negate the guilt of the accused," were included only in laboratory reports not given to defense lawyers for more than six months.

North Carolina law requires prosecutors to share all relevant information with defense lawyers promptly. Mr. Nifong told the judge in the case that he had turned over everything he had — "a misrepresentation and false statement of material fact made to a tribunal," the bar wrote. Mr. Nifong later objected to a defense request to turn over the full laboratory reports, citing cost and privacy concerns and terming the papers sought "a witch hunt list," the bar said.

Mr. Nifong said in court on Dec. 15 that a defense motion two days earlier on the withheld DNA results was "the first I heard of this particular situation." Later he said he had meant that it was the first he had heard of defense accusations that the results had been concealed, not that they existed. But the bar said the accusations themselves had not been raised until after Mr. Nifong spoke in court.

In an interview last month, Mr. Nifong agreed that the DNA results had been potentially exculpatory, but said they had not seemed important to him because he was no longer then pursuing the case on the basis of DNA evidence.

Convicted Con Artist Tells How He Could Steal Your Home (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

LEAVENWORTH, Kan. — When Brent Barber tells you — and he's about to — how easy it is to steal your house out from under you, or take your money and ruin your credit, even while he's sitting in prison, you'd better listen.

A one-time millionaire with a house on a golf course, Barber was sentenced in October to 12 years in prison for masterminding the largest mortgage fraud ever prosecuted in Missouri, and most other states too, the FBI says. He pleaded guilty to a five-year scam that involved nearly 300 properties in Kansas City, Mo., and victimized more than 80 people.

Nationally, mortgage fraud has spread in the past few years, with losses totaling around $1 billion last year, the FBI says. The real estate boom, along with looser lending standards, built an ideal breeding ground for smooth-talking con artists like Barber. Those hurt by fraud are not only lenders, but also the thousands of other homeowners who pay higher interest rates as a result, and the neighborhoods where foreclosures depress property values, invite crime and drain city resources.

Fraud cases are likely to continue rising this year and next, the Mortgage Asset Research Institute says. That's because fraud has become harder to hide in today's slower housing market, when lenders have more time to review applications and appraisals. And because fraudulent loans tend to fall into foreclosure after about three years, many bad loans from the real estate boom have yet to surface.

About 30 miles from where Barber used to live, he sits in a transfer detention center circled by fences topped with razor wire, waiting to be moved out of state. Barber, 42, who did not testify at his trial, spent more than two hours explaining to a reporter how to find victims, steal from homeowners and lenders, and hide the crimes. Then he offered advice on how to avoid being scammed.

"If I wanted to be a stinker, I could tear up any state I walked in," he boasts. "From right here in jail, I could do every one of the things I talked about" with USA TODAY.

You'd better believe him, says Linda Marshall, the assistant U.S. attorney who prosecuted Barber. "Unfortunately, I think that's very realistic, because so much can be done by computer, telephone and fax — things he has access to in prison. And if he didn't, with the help from someone on the outside, he could accomplish it."

Barber's crimes spotlight flaws in the mortgage lending and regulatory systems and show how easy it is to exploit the greed and trust in human nature.

The FBI had Barber on its radar screen for months, but the case was inactive. To investigators, Barber looked small-time because he used "straw" buyers to hide his deals, Marshall explains. He got caught after an angry ex-business-associate walked into an FBI office one day and started singing.

Barber and nine accomplices have been convicted or pleaded guilty, and a few others will soon be indicted, Marshall says. After Barber was convicted by a jury, he pleaded guilty to 104 other counts of money laundering, conspiracy and the interstate transfer of funds obtained by fraud. He was ordered to pay $11 million in restitution.

One of his most effective scams, documents show, looked like this:

Say a real estate investor came to you and told you banks wouldn't let him buy any more property because his credit was maxed out. But if he could buy a property in your name, he'd give you $1,500 to $2,500 for the trouble of signing the documents.

He'd pay all the costs and either find a tenant to cover the mortgage or pay it himself. And after a year, he'd sell the property and share the profits with you. Sound good? If you said yes, you'd be what criminals and the FBI call a straw buyer.

Barber or his accomplices often helped the straw buyers lie on loan applications to qualify for the mortgages, documents show. He also used fraudulently inflated appraisals to buy and sell the properties and pocketed the profit. In other cases, Barber would keep the rent but stop paying the mortgage. Many of these "straws" were stuck with empty, decaying properties and mortgages they couldn't afford.

Lenders suffered losses on 205 of the 283 properties in the case, according to court documents. Marshall says most of the straws lost their properties to foreclosure or signed them over to the lenders to avoid foreclosure, and several filed for bankruptcy protection.

Elderly people make attractive prey, Barber says. They tend to have low bills, high credit scores and all the documentation banks need.

"You say: 'Look you're not really going to owe money. It's going to be my house, or the tenants are going to be making payments. … The rent is $500, and the payment is $300. By signing here, you're going to get the difference," he explains.

One of Barber's straws, Elvin Barton, told the judge, "I'm 70 years old, and because of him I have to start all over. … Mr. Barber gained my trust through manipulation and used my good name and credit to add to his wealth. Mr. Barber never intended to live up to his promises, leaving me with six foreclosed homes. I could not make the payments."

Barber's advice: Verify everything.

If people offer a real estate deal, Barber says, verify where they've lived for the past 10 years. Ask for and speak to their banking references. Check credit scores. Ask to see their tax returns. See if lawsuits have been filed against them.

After police arrested Barber in August 2004, several witnesses told them Barber had blank real estate deeds in the back of his gold Infiniti Q45 luxury car, Marshall says. Deed fraud is almost impossible to detect before the damage is done.

"The whole system of (real estate) recording is set up assuming the society is sheep and there are no wolves," Barber says.

He sketches a series of scenarios in which he could "steal" your home and borrow against it, and you wouldn't know until his lender tried to foreclose on your house.

Barber could, for example, find an older neighborhood where most residents are retired and their homes paid off. He could forge a homeowner's signature, he says, and deed the house to himself. He could buy a notary's stamp for about $35 at an office supply store, and file the fake deed at the county recorder's office for $21.

Then, with the title to the property in his name, Barber could take out a mortgage against it. "If you could buy one house that way," he says, "you could buy 20 a day."

In fact, no county recorder's office will verify the information on real estate documents, says Mark Monacelli, president of the Property Records Industry Association. The recorder's job is to ensure that documents are filled out properly, signed and notarized.

"The system has always been vulnerable," says Monacelli, who agrees that if anyone wanted to commit such fraud, it's not hard.

Recently, Monacelli's organization formed a group to find ways to help county recorders combat fraud. Los Angeles and Philadelphia now alert property owners by mail when key documents are filed against their property.

Barber's advice: Title companies should have to call lenders to verify paid-off loans. Counties should require that deeds be filed by the buyer, in person, with I.D.

After his arrest, Barber was free on bail until May 2005, when prosecutors found out he and another partner had defrauded a man facing foreclosure on his home. So the judge jailed Barber until the trial.

Nationwide, foreclosures are inching up as people with shaky credit fall behind on payments. Nearly 5% of borrowers are behind on mortgages, and the figure is projected to climb as people with adjustable-rate loans see their payments exceed what they can afford.

This could be the next wave of fraud, Barber says. He says he could approach a homeowner who's falling behind on a mortgage and offer to assume the loan and rent out the house to cover the payments. Barber says he'd leave the loan in the name of the homeowner, who'd still be responsible for it. He could pocket the rent and hide past-due notices from the homeowner.

"It would take three months before the lender is even going to start foreclosing, and even when they start foreclosing, I can hold off that foreclosure for six months to a year. … So if I had one house and the rent is $600 a month, I'd have $7,200 on that house (in a year), and if I got 10 houses, I'd make $72,000," he says.

Barber's advice: Verify that documents are filed. If you're behind on your mortgage, try to rent out your house and move to a cheaper apartment. If you're behind $3,000 in payments, ask the tenants for a deposit of that amount. Put a no-sublease clause in the contract. And verify the tenant's rental history. Sign up for a credit-score alert program that will notify you if there's a change in your credit file, such as an overdue payment.

Barber is sitting on a plastic chair in a 5-by-5-foot "meeting cell" with the real estate section of the local paper. He reads aloud the ads he thinks have potential for fraudulent mortgage applications, such as: "Real estate loans. Residential, commercial, cash-out, refis, all credit types accepted. 100% non-owner-occupied investment loans."

Barber blames lenders for approving loans with little or no proof of a borrower's finances, for making fraud easy to commit. These "stated loans" are also known in the industry as "liar loans." They were designed to help people who were self-employed or working on commissions, with incomes that vary from year to year.

But in high-cost areas like California, where homeowners often must stretch beyond traditional lending ratios to afford a home, about 75% of buyers have turned to loans that require low or no proof of income or assets, up from 34% in 2000, according to First American LoanPerformance.

The mortgage industry knows that loans with little or no documentation speed the approval process, "But they are open invitations to fraudsters," according to a report by the Mortgage Asset Research Institute. "When these loans were introduced, they made sense, given the relatively strict requirements borrowers had to meet before qualifying," says the April 2006 report. "However, competitive pressures have caused many lenders to loosen these requirements to a point that makes many risk managers squirm."

Barber is blunter: "The word 'stated' should be synonymous in the world with 'fraud.' "

Corey Carlisle, a senior director for the Mortgage Bankers Association, concedes there has been a rise in fraudulent stated-income loans but contends that stated-income loans are "a tried-and-true loan documentation type for lenders."

Barber's advice: Ban stated loans.

After two hours, Barber is still imagining new scams. His mind seems trained to see and exploit weaknesses in the real estate system. He suggests safeguards to stop fraud; then he thinks of ways around them.

With good behavior, Barber could be out of prison in nine years. And though he admitted his guilt in court, in his interview with USA TODAY he offers no regrets about the people he hurt.

"I guess I had drive to want to earn a little money," he says. He pauses and sighs. "And I think my priorities were out of alignment."

Prosecutors Want DeLay Charge Reinstated (AP)

By Kelley Shannon

AP, January 25, 2007

Prosecutors attempting to restore a conspiracy charge against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay argued Wednesday that the "plain language" of Texas law means he can be charged with conspiring to violate the election code.

But lawyers for DeLay and two co-defendants told the Court of Criminal Appeals the law is clear in their view — that conspiracy was added to the state election code after prosecutors allege the crime happened.

"Historically, there have been limitations on the use of conspiracy laws," said DeLay's attorney, Dick DeGuerin of Houston.

Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle's office is appealing lower court rulings that threw out the charge accusing DeLay and Republican fundraisers Jim Ellis and John Colyandro of conspiring to violate the Texas election code and its ban on corporate campaign contributions.

It could be weeks or months before the appeals court makes a decision.

DeLay and the co-defendants are still charged with money laundering and conspiracy to launder money, but state district Judge Pat Priest has said he doesn't have jurisdiction and can't hold a trial until the appeals court makes its ruling.

DeLay, now out of Congress, wants to get the criminal case behind him, DeGuerin said.

Prosecutors' appeal of the dismissed conspiracy charge allowed them to put off DeLay's trial and hurt him when he was trying to regain his leadership post and during his re-election bid last year, DeGuerin said.

"Being able to drag it out this long has caused the maximum damage to Tom DeLay," he said.

Prosecutors allege that DeLay, Ellis and Colyandro illegally funneled $190,000 in corporate contributions through DeLay's Texans for a Republican Majority political action committee and through an arm of the National Republican Committee to seven GOP state legislative candidates in 2002.

The defendants say they did nothing wrong.

The 3rd Court of Appeals agreed with Priest's ruling, then prosecutors appealed the decision to the Court of Criminal Appeals.

In a brief filed with the court, prosecutors rejected defense lawyers' contention that the state's conspiracy law didn't apply to the Texas Election Code until 2003. They outlined a series of steps in legislative history to back up their argument.

"The plain language ... is clear and unambiguous: the offense of criminal conspiracy applies to all felony offenses defined by Texas law, including the offense of unlawfully making a corporate political contribution," prosecutors wrote.

DeGuerin has disputed that, also saying the law is clear.

"There was no conspiracy to violate the election code on the books at the time that the conduct took place. There's no such crime, in other words," DeGuerin said.

DeLay and his co-defendants were indicted in September and October of 2005. Soon after, DeLay stepped aside as majority leader. He remained a member of Congress, representing his suburban Houston district, and won his Republican primary last March.

After an extended court fight that ultimately prevented the Republican Party from placing a new candidate on the November ballot, DeLay withdrew from the race. A write-in Republican candidate couldn't muster enough voter support, and Democrat Nick Lampson won DeLay's seat.

The United States is paying a heavy price for the mandatory sentencing fad that swept the country 30 years ago. After a tenfold increase in the nation's prison population — and a corrections price tag that exceeds $60 billion a year — the states have often been forced to choose between building new prisons or new schools. Worse still, the country has created a growing felon caste, now more than 16 million strong, of felons and ex-felons, who are often driven back to prison by policies that make it impossible for them to find jobs, housing or education.

Congress could begin to address this problem by passing the Second Chance Act, which would offer support services for people who are leaving prison. But it would take more than one new law to undo 30 years of damage:

¶Researchers have shown that inmates who earn college degrees tend to find jobs and stay out of jail once released. Congress needs to revoke laws that bar inmates from receiving Pell grants and that bar some students with drug convictions from getting other support. Following Washington's lead, the states have destroyed prison education programs that had long since proved their worth.

¶People who leave prison without jobs or places to live are unlikely to stay out of jail. Congress should repeal the lifetime ban on providing temporary welfare benefits to people with felony drug convictions. The federal government should strengthen tax credit and bonding programs that encourage employers to hire people with criminal records. States need to stop barring ex-offenders from jobs because of unrelated crimes — or arrests in the distant past that never led to convictions.

¶Congress should deny a request from the F.B.I. to begin including juvenile arrests that never led to convictions (and offenses like drunkenness or vagrancy) in the millions of rap sheets sent to employers. That would transform single indiscretions into lifetime stigmas.

¶Curbing recidivism will also require doing a lot more to provide help and medication for the one out of every six inmates who suffer mental illness.

The only real way to reduce the inmate population — and the felon class — is to ensure that imprisonment is a method of last resort. That means abandoning the mandatory sentencing laws that have filled prisons to bursting with nonviolent offenders who are doomed to remain trapped at the very margins of society.

CIVIL LAW:

PBS&J Pays More Than $6.4M To Settle Claims (MH)

By Patrick Danner

AND DAN CHRISTENSEN

The embezzlement by three former employees at engineering firm PBS&J continues to cost the firm: PBS&J paid more than $6.4 million to settle claims it overcharged the federal government on "hundreds of contracts," the Justice Department announced.

The overbilling, the government said, arose from a $36 million embezzlement scheme perpetrated by PBS&J's former chief financial officer and two underlings between 1992 and 2005.

The embezzlement involved shifting funds and fabricating entries in the company's books to cover up the scheme and resulted in PBS&J's audited overhead rates being overstated, the Justice Department said in a statement. Overhead includes items like management salaries, rent, insurance and benefits.

The three former PBS&J employees, ex-CFO W. Scott DeLoach, Maria A. Garcia and Rosario Licata, each pleaded guilty in September to their roles in the embezzlement. They are scheduled to be sentenced next month.

DOJ_NMG_0121345

Joining the Justice Department in the civil investigation of PBS&J were the Office of the Inspector General for the Department of Transportation and the Defense Contract Audit Agency.

A lawyer for PBS&J and a company spokeswoman couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

PBS&J ranks as one of the largest engineering firms in the country, with 3,900 employees and 2005 revenue of $530 million. The company recently moved its headquarters to Tampa from Miami, where it was founded in 1960.

"Companies that enter into contracts with the government must maintain accounting controls and procedures that ensure that the costs and rates that they submit to the government are accurate," said Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general of the civil division in Washington.

The Justice Department said more than a dozen federal agencies were affected by the fraud, including the Army, Homeland Security and the Department of Interior.

PBS&J, which has had an auditor combing its books, previously disclosed that various state transportation agencies were overcharged as a result of the embezzlement.

The St. Petersburg Times reported on its website this month that PBS&J refunded $11 million to the Florida Department of Transportation.

Claims Against Six Ex-FBI Agents Dropped (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 25, 2007

Case was tied to Bulger handling

It took 22 years for the family of slain Quincy fisherman John McIntyre to prove that the FBI's mishandling of longtime informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi caused his brutal killing in 1984.

But after winning a landmark $3.2 million wrongful death suit against the government in September, lawyers for McIntyre's mother and brother notified a judge yesterday that they are dropping additional claims they had made against six retired FBI agents.

"We proved what we wanted to prove," said McIntyre's brother, Christopher, adding that he and his mother want to get on with their lives and weren't up for another drawn-out legal battle that would once again rehash his brother's murder. "This is starting to take a toll on everyone."

McIntyre and his mother, Emily, 77, of Quincy, had been seeking a jury trial on civil rights claims against the six retired agents, including Bulger's and Flemmi's former handler John J. Connolly Jr., as well as John Morris, Robert Fitzpatrick, James Ring, James Greenleaf, and James Ahearn. Another former agent, Roderick Kennedy, had previously been dismissed from the suit by a judge.

US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay, who had ordered the government to pay the McIntyre's $3.2 million after an 18-day bench trial, had yet to rule on the agents' assertions that federal law barred the McIntyres from seeking damages from them, since they had already won a damages claim against the government.

In his ruling last September, Lindsay found that Connolly warned Bulger and Flemmi that McIntyre was cooperating against them, knowing that the tip would probably lead to McIntyre's slaying. He also found that the FBI failed to properly supervise Connolly and failed to investigate numerous allegations that Bulger and Flemmi had been involved in drug trafficking, homicide, and other crimes.

Connolly was convicted on federal racketeering charges in 2002 for protecting Bulger and Flemmi from prosecution and warning Bulger to flee just before the gangster's 1995 indictment. Connolly is serving a 10-year sentence and is awaiting trial in Miami in a 1982 gangland slaying.

Attorney E. Peter Mullane, who represents Connolly in the civil case, said Connolly didn't warn Bulger and Flemmi that McIntyre was cooperating and that Connolly continues to assert his innocence.

The McIntyres' lawyers, William Christie and Steven M. Gordon , said they believed they could have proven their claims against the agents if the case had gone to trial, but were concerned that the case would take too long to resolve in view of Emily McIntyre's age and poor health.

"We decided it was just best to pursue our judgment against the United States," Christie said.

Fitzpatrick, former special agent in charge of the FBI's Boston office, testified during the McIntyre trial that he had urged his superiors to drop Bulger as an informant in the early 1980s amid allegations that the gangster was involved in drug dealing and homicide. Yesterday, Fitzpatrick said he was angry that he had been named in the suit because "I obviously was one of the only people who tried to do anything" about Bulger.

A spokesman for the Department of Justice declined to comment yesterday on the dismissal of the claims against the agents or on whether the government will appeal Lindsay's $3.2 million verdict.

The McIntyres' suit was the first of 17 filed against the government by families of victims of Bulger and Flemmi to go to trial. Ten were dismissed, mostly on grounds they were filed too late, and six are poised to go to trial.

Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence for 10 murders, testified that he and Bulger killed McIntyre, 32, on Nov. 30, 1984, after Connolly warned them that McIntyre had implicated them in an unsuccessful plot to ship weapons to the Irish Republican Army aboard a Gloucester trawler.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Ex-deputy Arrested In 1964 Race Case (AP)

By Emily Wagster Pettus And Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, January 25, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. — A white former sheriff's deputy who was once thought to be dead was arrested on federal charges Wednesday in one of the last major unsolved crimes of the civil rights era — the 1964 killings of two black men who were beaten and dumped alive into the Mississippi River.

The break in the 43-year-old case was largely the result of the dogged efforts of the older brother of one of the victims, who vowed to bring the killers to justice.

James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klansman from the town of Roxie, was charged with kidnapping hitchhikers Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19.

The victims' weighted, badly decomposed bodies were found by chance two months later in July 1964, during the search for three civil rights workers whose disappearance and deaths in Philadelphia, Miss., got far more attention from the media and the FBI.

Seale is expected to be arraigned Thursday in Jackson.

A second man long suspected in the attack, church deacon and reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, now 72, was not charged.

Sources close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities.

Prosecutors did not say why Seale was not charged with murder.

The arrest marked the latest attempt by prosecutors in the South to close the books on crimes from the civil rights era that went unpunished. In recent years, authorities in Mississippi and Alabama have won convictions in the 1963 assassination of NAACP activist Medgar Evers; the 1963 Birmingham, Ala., church bombing that killed four black girls; and the 1964 Philadelphia, Miss., slayings.

"I've been crying. First time I've cried in about 50 years," Moore's 63-year-old brother, Thomas, said after the arrest. "It's not going to bring his life back. But some way or another, I think he would be satisfied."

Dee's sister, Thelma Collins, told The Associated Press through grateful sobs: "I never thought I would live to see it, no sir, I never did. I always prayed that justice would be done — somehow, some way."

Seale and Edwards are suspected of kidnapping the two victims in a Klan crackdown prompted by rumors that black Muslims were planning an armed "insurrection" in rural Franklin County. Seale and Edwards were arrested at the time.

But, consumed by the search for the three missing civil rights workers, the FBI turned the case over to local authorities. And a justice of the peace promptly threw out all charges against Seale and Edwards.

For years, Seale's family had told reporters that he had died.

But in 2005, Thomas Moore and a Canadian documentary filmmaker, David Ridgen, found Seale, old and sick, living just a few miles down the road from where the kidnapping took places.

"If they hadn't brought it to my attention, I wouldn't have known to do anything," said U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton, chief federal prosecutor in Jackson.

Thomas Moore said he always carried a burden of guilt over his younger brother's death.

"I walked around with an amount of shame," the Colorado Springs man said. "I didn't know why, why it happened to us, that I wasn't there to do something — to do SOMETHING."

Former Gov. William Winter, who was co-chairman of President Clinton's racial reconciliation initiative, said the latest arrest — though done by federal rather than state authorities — shows that Mississippi "now is obviously seeking to make up for lost time in bringing people to justice."

"Mississippi is taking a look at those crimes that were committed in a different era when a different attitude prevailed," said Winter, who was governor in the 1980s.

On May 2, 1964, Charles Moore and Dee were hitchhiking near an ice cream stand in the town of Meadville when Seale pulled over and offered them a ride, a Klan informant told the FBI. The Klan had heard rumors of black Muslim gunrunning in the area, and Seale believed the two were involved, authorities said.

According to FBI interrogators, Edwards admitted that he and Seale took the two men into the woods for a whipping. But Edwards said both men were alive when he left them.

An informant told the FBI that Seale's brother and another Klansman took the unconscious blacks to the river, lashed their bodies to a Jeep engine block and some old railroad tracks, and dumped them over the side of a boat. The other Klansmen and the informant have since died.

Searchers were combing the woods and swamps for James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner when the remains of Dee and Moore were discovered near Tallulah, La. The bodies of Chaney, Goodman and Schwerner were found in an earthen dam in Mississippi a short time later.

According to FBI documents from the 1960s, authorities confronted Seale and told him they knew he and others killed the hitchhikers, and "the Lord above knows you did it." "Yes," Seale was quoted as replying, "but I'm not going to admit it. You are going to have to prove it." The U.S. Justice Department reopened the case after The Clarion-Ledger of Jackson uncovered documents indicating that the beatings had occurred in the Homochitto National Forest, giving the FBI jurisdiction. But the case languished until Seale was located.

"I had other plans to confront him a long time ago — violently," Thomas Moore said.

Seale lived in Roxie, which was once a thriving farm community in southwest Mississippi. It is now dotted with decaying homes, and the only buildings still in use are a small antique store, a bank and a post office.

Bobby Hunt, 55, a lifelong resident of Roxie and a cousin of one of the slain men, Henry Dee, said people have talked less about the murders over the years, but the victims have not been forgotten.

"Henry was a nice person. He would help people," Hunt said.

He said Seale's arrest made him feel "a little better." "It took all those years but they finally got justice."

Associated Press writer Allen G. Breed in Raleigh, N.C., contributed to this story.

By Jerry Mitchell

JACKSON, Miss. — Six years ago, reputed Klansman James Seale scoffed at the notion he'd ever be arrested for kidnapping and killing two African-American teenagers in 1964.

He may not be scoffing now, arrested today on federal kidnapping charges in connection with the Ku Klux Klan's May 2, 1964, abduction and slayings of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore.

Asked in 2000 if he had anything to do with crime, Seale replied, "I ain't in jail, am I?"

The arrest of the 71-year-old former cropduster marks the 28th arrest from the civil rights era in the United States over the past two decades.

Since 1998, Moore's brother, Thomas, has been pushing for justice in the case.

Upon learning of the arrest, he choked up. "I'm very emotional," he said. "I don't know what to say."

He said he's grateful and thankful the day finally came. "I'm just glad I had something to do with it," he said. "I just hope Charles and Henry Dee know there is justice on the way."

Dee's sister, Mary Byrd, also welcomed the news. "I feel good now," she said. "Yes, indeed."

Since 1989, Mississippi and six other states have re-examined 29 killings, leading to 22 convictions, most recently in 2005 when a Neshoba County jury convicted Edgar Ray Killen of manslaughter for orchestrating the Klan's killings of three civil rights workers, James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner.

"We are extremely pleased to see that the federal government is truly committed to taking care of its unfinished business from the civil rights era," said Alvin Sykes, a Kansas City activist whose work helped lead to the reinvestigation of the 1955 killing of Emmet Till.

Sykes is now pushing legislation that would create a cold cases unit within the Justice Department to track down unpunished killers from the civil rights era. "When Congress passes the Till bill, you can best believe there will be a lot more perpetrators from that era who will be facing the bar of justice for the lynchings they thought they got away with many years ago," Sykes said.

The slayings of Dee and Moore are among dozens of killings that plagued this nation during the civil rights movement. The names of 40 martyrs from the movement can be found on the National Civil Rights Memorial in Montgomery, and nearly half of those killings took place in Mississippi.

Seale was arrested once before in connection with the slayings. That came Nov. 6, 1964, when authorities arrested him and Charles Marcus Edwards on murder charges.

At the time, authorities confronted Seale and told him they knew he and others took Dee and Moore "to some remote place and beat them to death," FBI records say. "You then transported and disposed of their bodies by dropping them in the Mississippi River. You didn't even give them a decent burial. We know you did it. You know you did. The Lord above knows you did it."

"Yes," Seale was quoted as replying, "but I'm not going to admit it. You are going to have to prove it."

When authorities arrested Edwards, he "admitted that he and James Seale picked up Dee and another Negro in vicinity of Meadville and took them to an undisclosed wooded area where they were 'whipped,'" a Nov. 6, 1964, FBI document says. "States victims were alive when he departed the wooded area."

According to FBI documents, Dee and Moore were hitchhiking from Meadville when Klansmen coaxed them into their vehicle by pretending to be law enforcement agents. Deep in the woods, Klansmen repeatedly beat the teens, believing they knew something about a rumor regarding gun-running in Franklin County.

Finally, one of the pair claimed the guns were being hidden in a church, hoping to stop the violence.

It didn't.

Klansmen loaded Dee and Moore into the trunk of a car and hauled them across the Mississippi River. There, Klansmen tied them up and weighted them down with a Jeep motor block before dumping them into the Old River two miles south of King, La.

On July 12, 1964, a fisherman found Moore's body and reported it to authorities.

Two months after the arrests, then-District Attorney Lenox Foreman asked to have the murder charges thrown out, saying further investigation was needed.

FBI agents pressed forward, but many were fearful, including potential witnesses. "This informant advised he would not testify under any circumstances because he is concerned for his life and the lives of his family," a Jan. 12, 1965, FBI document reads.

At the time of the killings, Seale and Edwards worked for International Paper Co.

The FBI said the Klan in those days infiltrated unions at that company and others in Natchez. On Feb. 14, 1964, Alfred Whitley, a black employee at Armstrong Tire Co., was abducted and whipped. Two weeks later, Clinton Walker, a black employee at International Paper, was killed on his way home. His car was riddled with bullets.

In 1965, George Metcalfe, an NAACP leader and Armstrong employee was nearly killed when a bomb exploded his car. Two years later, his friend and fellow employee, Wharlest Jackson, died when his truck exploded.

"The Klan ruled then," Thomas Moore recalled. "There were a lot of things that happened back then."

As years passed, the killings of his brother and his friend were forgotten — like so many others from the civil rights era.

In 1998, memories of his brother's killing were rekindled when he read about the dragging death of James Byrd in Texas and decided to write a letter.

Shortly after a judge sentenced Imperial Wizard Sam Bowers to life in prison in 1998 for ordering the 1966 killing of NAACP leader Vernon Dahmer, Thomas Moore wrote District Attorney Ronnie Harper, asking him to look into the case. Harper agreed, but acknowledged he lacked the resources to investigate the matter.

On Jan. 13, 2000, The Clarion-Ledger reported White's killing wasn't the only violence that took place in that forest — so had the beatings of Dee and Moore.

After FBI agents reported they had destroyed their files in the case, The Clarion-Ledger found they weren't destroyed and got copies.

The Clarion-Ledger also tracked down and interviewed Seale, who blamed the newspaper for talk of reprosecution. "You don't have anything better to do but to stir this stuff up," he said.

The FBI reopened the case, only to stall when they believed the FBI's key informant in the case, Ernest Gilbert, was dead.

The Social Security Death Index showed a man of the same name had died in Mississippi in 1999, but the real Gilbert was still alive and living in Clinton, La.

In spring 2000, ABC News producer Harry Phillips tracked him down and got the former Klansman to share his story of a friend's confession to the crime. The FBI then interviewed Gilbert.

Gilbert told The Clarion-Ledger how Seale's brother, Jack, came to him and confessed his involvement in Dee and Moore's killings. "I couldn't live with it," Gilbert said. "I wish I never had been in the Klan. It messed my life up."

But by the end of 2000, authorities let the case grow cold. They still had questions regarding federal jurisdiction and were busy preparing to prosecute Ernest Avants for White's killing.

Federal authorities didn't get interested again in the Dee-Moore killings until July 13, 2005 — a few weeks after jurors convicted Killen in the killings of Chaney, Goodman and Schwerner.

That's when Thomas Moore met with U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton of Jackson, convincing him to have his office take a second look at the case.

No charges are expected against Edwards, who has been interviewed by the FBI and may be a witness against Seale.

Mississippi native Myrlie Evers-Williams, chairman emeritus of the national NAACP, still shudders when she recalls the dark days when the Klan reigned in Mississippi.

"It was fear at its worst. You could easily link it to what took place in Nazi Germany," recalled Evers-Williams, whose husband was assassinated by a Klansman in 1963. "It was being afraid to sit in your living room on a sofa because there was a window."

Mississippi Man Arrested In Killing Of 2 Blacks In ’64 (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

ATLANTA, Jan. 24 — A 71-year-old man was arrested Wednesday in Mississippi on federal kidnapping charges stemming from the 1964 killing of two black teenagers who were tied to trees, whipped and drowned.

The suspect, James F. Seale, a former crop-duster, was indicted in Jackson and taken into custody in the southwestern Mississippi town of Roxie, not far from where the two young men were seized.

The charges against Mr. Seale, some seven years after the Federal Bureau of Investigation reopened the case, are the latest in a string of prosecutions of racially motivated slayings from the 1950s and ’60s. While virtually all the prosecutions so far have proved successful, investigators have long warned that every passing year makes it more difficult to build a case.

Many of those killings became nationally infamous, like the murder of three civil rights workers — James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner — portrayed decades later in the movie “Mississippi Burning.” But like dozens of lynchings in that era, the deaths of the two victims in this case, Henry H. Dee and Charles E. Moore, both 19, were far more obscure.

The discovery of their bodies, in the Old River near Natchez, Miss., attracted attention mainly because it was initially thought that they might be those of two of the three missing rights workers, who, as the nation looked on, were being sought by federal agents, dozens of volunteers and 400 Navy sailors.

Still, the F.B.I. took on the Dee-Moore case, and in November 1964 Mr. Seale, the son of a chapter leader of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, and another man, Charles M. Edwards, were arrested. Local authorities never prosecuted them, however, even though Mr. Edwards, according to the case file, had told federal agents that he, Mr. Seale and others had beaten Mr. Dee and Mr. Moore, who, Mr. Edwards said, were alive when he left them.

Mr. Dee was a sawmill worker; Mr. Moore had recently been expelled from college after participating in a student demonstration. According to a variety of accounts pieced together from F.B.I. files, the Klan mistakenly believed that they were Black Muslims involved in plotting an armed uprising.

That season had been dubbed Freedom Summer by civil rights volunteers hoping to get blacks onto the voter rolls, but in and around Natchez it was a time of terror spread by the Klan. When Klan members saw Mr. Dee and Mr. Moore hitchhiking in early May, they returned with reinforcements and ordered them into a car.

The two were taken deep into the Homochitto National Forest, where they were secured to trees and beaten. They were then driven across the nearby state line to Louisiana, where they were tied to an engine block and thrown into the river with tape covering their mouths.

Mr. Edwards is still living, although The Clarion-Ledger of Jackson reported Wednesday that he was not expected to be arrested and was a potential witness in the case against Mr. Seale. James Newman, the sheriff of Franklin County, which includes Roxie, said Mr. Seale was in poor health and used a cane to walk.

Mr. Edwards is described in the documents from the time as an admitted Klansman. In an interview in 2000 with Jerry Mitchell of The Clarion-Ledger, who has written extensively about the case, Mr. Seale denied being a Klansman or knowing any members, although his family's involvement in the Klan is well documented.

The F.B.I. reopened the case in 2000 after investigative files that had been thought lost were recovered, and after Mr. Mitchell reported that the killings had most likely occurred on federal land, giving federal prosecutors jurisdiction in what was seen as a case potentially involving murder charges. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department declined Wednesday to explain the decision to charge Mr. Seale with kidnapping, and a spokeswoman for the United States attorney in Jackson did not return phone calls.

In 2002, Mr. Seale's son began telling newspaper reporters that his father was dead. But Thomas Moore, the elder brother of Charles Moore, returned to the area with a documentary filmmaker on a trip in 2004, and a local resident directed him to the mobile home where Mr. Seale lived. Mr. Seale ran inside and shut the door.

State, Federal Law Enforcement To Monitor Police-involved Shootings In DeKalb County (AP)

By Errin Haines, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2007

TUCKER, Ga. - Newly appointed DeKalb County Police Chief Terrell Bolton said Wednesday that reducing the number of police-involved shootings is his top priority, and said federal and state authorities will now be called to the scene to monitor those incidents.

Bolton made the announcement flanked by officials from the GBI, FBI and DEA, as well as DeKalb CEO Vernon Jones and district attorney Gwen Keyes-Fleming.

"Today is a major step for the DeKalb County Police Department," Bolton said. "In our approach to deadly force, my prayer is that it will never be the same."

Bolton, who was hired last month, said his department has nothing to hide, and that the new initiative is meant to encourage transparency and make citizens feel more comfortable.

GBI and DEA agents will respond to police-involved shootings as they happen, working as monitors and reporting inappropriate behavior to DeKalb superior officers.

"If they see something we are doing that is out of order, it will be brought to our attention," Bolton told reporters at a press conference. "Our desire is to have as many eyes and ears as possible."

The FBI will not be involved in investigations, but has offered additional training along with the other two agencies.

The chief plans to meet with the other agencies to further discuss how the partnerships will work.

Last year, DeKalb County officers were involved in 12 deadly police shootings, which those attending the press conference declined to discuss Wednesday. The shootings have drawn federal and local investigations, and the increase in shootings led to an independent review of police training and use-of-force procedures by a consulting firm that found some deficiencies.

Jones said at the time the report was released that there were no widespread problems at the department.

The district attorney's office is reviewing the shootings and the Justice Department is "gathering information" about the shootings, according to a Dec. 12 letter from a Justice official to a community activist.

DeKalb Police Shootings To Be Monitored (AJC)

By David Simpson, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 25, 2007

Monitors from state and federal law enforcement agencies will go to the scene of all future shootings of suspects by DeKalb County officers, Police Chief Terrell Bolton announced Wednesday, responding to a spate of fatal police shootings that have spurred a grand jury investigation.

DeKalb apparently will be the first major metro Atlanta police department to bring state and federal officials to shooting scenes to observe the police investigation.

"Today, the DeKalb County Police Department is saying we have nothing to hide," Bolton said at a news conference, flanked by District Attorney Gwen Keyes Fleming and representatives of the Georgia Bureau of Investigation, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the FBI.

Bolton, in his second week on the job, said he asked the other agencies to help him address concerns raised last year, when DeKalb police shot to death 12 suspects, more than any other department in metro Atlanta. One officer also was killed.

Bolton said the GBI and DEA agreed to his request to supply investigators who will be trained in DeKalb procedures so that they can go to shooting scenes.

The monitors from the other agencies will not write reports but will immediately alert the police commander on the scene if they see anything "out of order," Bolton said. He said he was confident those agencies would not allow any problems to go unreported, and he promised he would alert the district attorney "or even the FBI" if he had evidence of wrongdoing.

The FBI cannot send a monitor to cooperate with DeKalb police because it could later be called upon to investigate the same incident, Bolton said. But he said the FBI has offered training help to DeKalb police.

Representatives of the DeKalb district attorney's office already go to shooting scenes and review police shooting cases. But The Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported last week that records of many of those investigations are missing, and the surviving records show the DA's office often relied on police reports rather than on independent fact-finding.

A special grand jury is expected to review last year's 12 fatal shootings by DeKalb police. Bolton declined to comment on the cases Wednesday.

Officials in Fulton, Cobb and Gwinnett counties said Wednesday they have not called state or federal officials to the scene of shootings by their county police force. No information was available from Atlanta police.

Change of perceptions

Gwinnett District Attorney Danny Porter said the outside monitors may provide more public assurance than investigative help.

"I don't see what these monitors will accomplish if they are not able to control the investigations of these shootings," Porter said.

"Now I've never said that I felt that DeKalb had a problem with how they investigated their police shootings in the past, because I don't. But they may think this will help change the way the public perceives their investigations."

Porter and Cobb District Attorney Pat Head, who presents all police shooting cases to a grand jury, were surprised that drug agents would participate in shooting investigations.

So was Geoffrey Alpert, a criminology professor at the University of South Carolina who has studied police use of force.

"I think generally inviting other agencies to be part of an evaluation is very, very important. I think it shows some transparency, I think it shows some willingness to do it appropriately," Alpert said.

However, he added, "You want someone who has credentials, who has experience, who has enormous knowledge of police shootings."

Alpert said it is important for outside reviewers to look beyond the question of whether an officer committed a crime and to consider whether officers violated policies — violations that might have contributed to the shooting.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported in November that a review of police shootings from 2001 through 2005 showed an internal review board repeatedly found that officers violated certain key policies, such as forcing confrontations without adequate backup. Most of the officers involved received little or no discipline, and the department did not address the patterns in its training programs.

Keyes Fleming, DeKalb's district attorney, and her two predecessors have said the district attorney has no mandate to look for policy violations. But the special grand jury expected to convene soon could consider whether to recommend additional oversight of police shootings, Keyes Fleming has said.

'Supportive' of officers

Around the country, some police departments are overseen by civilian review boards, some with full-time investigators. Other departments have full-time professional monitors who report to elected officials.

On Wednesday, Keyes Fleming said through a spokeswoman, "I think Chief Bolton's multijurisdictional approach is a good step for DeKalb County and its citizens. We look forward to continuing to work with the Police Department and these other government entities."

Iffat Muhammad, who has helped organize protests since her brother, Abraheem, was shot to death by an officer in August 2006, offered cautious approval of the new policy.

"It sounds good. It sounds like a step in the right direction. But honestly, I don't know," she said.

Muhammad's brother, Abraheem, was killed by a DeKalb police officer in August. Her brother was shot by an officer checking on a trespassing complaint. He attacked the officer and tried to get her gun, police said.

Muhammad said she was disappointed that Bolton did not meet with families or community organizations before announcing his move.

At the news conference, the chief urged the department's critics to judge police on their future actions rather than being "shackled" by the past.

Bolton also assured officers "that we're going to be supportive" and praised county CEO Vernon Jones for his past statements defending police use of force.

"It takes a special leader to stand up for the men and women of the department," he said.

Jones, who attended the news conference, said, "I'm excited about our new beginning here in DeKalb County for this Police Department."

Jones said he earlier visited a new class of police cadets and learned they will receive extra training in "de-escalation" techniques to try to avoid violent confrontations.

Cleveland Officer Investigated On Claim He Beat Suspect (CLPD)

By Mark Puente, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, January 25, 2007

Drug suspect suffered cuts, bruises

A Cleveland police officer is under investigation over allegations he beat a suspected drug dealer to find out where he hid a package of cocaine.

Narcotics Detective Jamal Ansari, a 22-year-veteran, is accused of dragging Damon Alexander, while handcuffed, around his Shaker Heights home last April until Alexander told him where he hid the cocaine.

Ansari is being investigated by the Cleveland police Internal Affairs unit, the U.S. Justice Department and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

Alexander testified in a federal court hearing in November that Ansari repeatedly punched him in the face, kicked him in the chest and slammed his head into walls with enough force to break drywall, federal court records say. Alexander suffered cuts and bruises on his chest, and doctors gave him an electrocardiogram, according to court records.

Ansari testified that he hit Alexander 15 to 25 times to gain control of him even though he was handcuffed. But U.S. District Judge James Gwin did not believe Ansari.

"This testimony is not credible," Gwin wrote in a ruling last month.

Cleveland police Lt. Thomas Stacho said the city began an investigation last month after learning of Gwin's ruling. The judge's decision is disturbing, he said.

"It's one of the focuses of our investigation," he said. "We take these allegations seriously."

Ansari did not report using force against any suspect between 2003 and Sept. 9, 2006, according to two Cleveland Police Department databases obtained by The Plain Dealer last fall.

A Cleveland police policy requires officers to report any use of force regardless of where it occurred, Stacho said. No investigation by Ansari's supervisor could be found for the incident, he said.

Alexander filed a complaint with the U.S. Justice Department and has passed a polygraph test, court records show. He pleaded guilty in December to intent to distribute cocaine and a weapons charge. He is waiting to be sentenced.

A DEA task force went to Alexander's home after a K-9 officer found a suspicious envelope at an air-mail center containing 5.5 pounds of cocaine, records show.

The Postal Service delivered the package to Alexander's house on April 6. The task force was assisted by postal inspectors and Shaker Heights detectives, who went inside the home after a beeper signaled the package had been opened.

Alexander hid the package in a basement ceiling, but officers could not find it, records said.

Edward Bryan, an assistant federal public defender, said Ansari should be punished for his actions. "It was thuggery at its worst," he said. "They cannot break the law to enforce the law."

Female Former Agent Testifies In Case Against FBI (MINNST)

By Dan Browning, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 25, 2007

Jane Turner said she had never had an unsatisfactory job review before she filed her harassment complaint.

Ex-FBI agent Jane Turner spent more than five years fighting to get her case against her former employer into federal court, and on Wednesday she told a jury in Minneapolis about what she said was a plot to wreck her career as retribution for a sexual discrimination complaint she filed against her boss in 1998.

But the government described a far different end to a storied career that included investigating child-sex crimes and violent crimes on North Dakota Indian reservations.

By 1999, "she was seriously burned out," Martha Fagg, an assistant U.S. attorney from Iowa, told jurors Wednesday in her opening statement. "She just stopped working."

FBI supervisors didn't try to sideline Turner, Fagg said. To salvage her career, she said, they transferred her from an outpost in Minot, N.D., to Minneapolis, where they tried to help her get back on track.

Fagg said Turner, 55, of St. Paul, has literally made a federal case out of the fact that she was rated "superior" rather than "outstanding" in a routine review of her work.

However Turner, who joined the FBI in 1978, testified in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis that she had never had an unsatisfactory job review until after she filed a sexual harassment complaint against her supervisor, Senior Supervisory Agent Craig Welkin.

That's when Welkin stopped giving her full credit for the job she was doing, Turner said. She said she put up with the slights because she had so many "statistics," or favorable performance points, in her files.

Among her trophies was a personal letter from then-U.S. Attorney General William French Smith for her help in apprehending Christopher Boyce, a Soviet spy made famous in the movie "The Falcon and the Snowman."

However, in the summer of 1998, Welkin tried to block her from working on a case involving an infamous child pornographer who came to be known nationally as "The Internet Killer." Turner testified that the U.S. attorney in North Dakota at the time, John Schneider, tipped her off to Welkin's interference. Welkin only relented and assigned her to the case after Schneider wrote to him, she said.

Turner quickly developed a rapport with the family of the suspect, Larry Froistad, and eventually developed evidence that persuaded him to confess to molesting and killing his 5-year-old daughter, Amanda.

Schneider thanked her in an October 1998 e-mail. "Quite simply, that case and plea was your product," he said.

But Turner said that Welkin did not give her full credit for the case in her annual review, a detail that might hamper her efforts to get promotions or raises. She said he accused her of "poaching cases" and complained that she "sandbagged" him by getting Schneider to ask for her in the Froistad case.

Turner denied doing so, and reported Welkin's comments to his boss in Minneapolis. The FBI launched a formal re-evaluation of Turner's job performance.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Clare Hochhalter testified that he never saw Turner "stop working," as Fagg alleged in her opening remarks. He said Turner pushed hard on cases.

Hochhalter offered strong praise for Turner's investigative and interrogation skills. "I learned from her," he said.

But the formal FBI review in June 1999 found her work "minimally acceptable" in 1999, and she was ordered to transfer to a desk job in Minneapolis in December of that year. She reported to Minneapolis in May 2000 and filed suit Aug. 3, 2001.

Turner later sparked furor in the FBI when she accused a colleague of stealing artifacts from the ruins of the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11 attacks. She retired in the fall of 2003 in the face of possible termination proceedings, allegedly for hurting the bureau's image.

Port Chester Attacks Federal Lawsuit On Election System (NYJN)

By Liz Sadler, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, January 25, 2007

PORT CHESTER - The village filed court papers yesterday that pick apart the federal lawsuit that accuses its election system of illegally suppressing the Hispanic vote.

In the papers, the village asked U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson to deny the government's request to block the March 20 election for two seats on the Board of Trustees.

"There will be irreparable harm if the election does not go forward," the papers say. The village contends that the move could disenfranchise voters in the March mayoral election and that "government may come to an effective standstill due to the expiring terms of current members."

The papers were filed in response to a lawsuit filed by the Justice Department in December claiming that the village's "at-large" method of electing its six trustees violates the federal Voting Rights Act.

Though nearly half of the village's 28,000 residents and 22 percent of its eligible voters are Hispanic, no Hispanic has ever been elected to village office.

The Justice Department is asking the judge to replace Port Chester's at-large system with one in which trustees are elected from six districts.

But the village is questioning the validity of the proposed Hispanic district because the estimated number of Hispanic residents is only eight higher than the number of non-Hispanic residents, fewer than the margin of error, it claims.

In the court papers, the village also argues that there is no past or present discrimination in Port Chester and that Hispanic voters are free to participate in the political process.

The village's response includes 21 statements from longtime village residents, officials and business owners, including people of Dominican, Cuban and Uruguayan descent.

"These individuals have not experienced a history of discrimination in Port Chester," according to the response. "In fact, their experience has been just the opposite."

Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, took his criticism of the lawsuit a step further yesterday in a press release, accusing the Justice Department of fact-twisting and sneaky behavior in an effort to "desperately bolster their bad case."

Piscionere said he had deposed two Justice Department witnesses since the lawsuit was filed and was to interview a third today.

"Before the Department of Justice brought this lawsuit, we told the federal government that their data was bad," Piscionere said. "Now, only after preliminary depositions of the government's experts, do we absolutely confirm the profound weakness of their case."

Yusil Scribner, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, declined to comment on the response, saying it is the department's policy not to speak about pending cases.

Mayor Gerald Logan assailed the lawsuit, saying the federal government does not understand the village election process or the significance of Port Chester's 139-year-old charter.

"Port Chester is a model of inclusion and diversity," he said in a statement. "The lack of evidence in this case is astounding."

NAACP Presses U.S. On Heart Drug (WSJ)

By Keith J. Winstein

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

An NAACP official condemned Medicare for declining to promote insurance coverage of a cardiac medication for African-Americans, in a letter that blamed government policy for disparity in the treatment of blacks with heart failure.

The sharply worded letter, addressed to the Boston regional office of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, or CMS, detailed tension between the local arm of the civil-rights organization and the agency over BiDil, the only drug approved for use by a single race. The NAACP has received a $1.5 million grant from the drug's maker, NitroMed Inc., to improve health care for blacks.

BiDil has been shown to reduce deaths in blacks with congestive heart failure by about 40% a year, but NitroMed says it is used by only about 2% of the 750,000 African-Americans who have the condition.

Many groups, including the American Heart Association and the American College of Cardiology, say there is no evidence that the medication, which costs insurers roughly $1,400 to $2,800 a year to offer to a customer, works any better than its two generic parts -- isosorbide dinitrate and hydralazine -- taken separately. CMS requires insurers offering Medicare Part D plans to cover either BiDil or the generics. Some insurers have been slow to cover BiDil, since the two generic ingredients can cost less than $100 a year. Usage of the generics has also been scant.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People wants CMS to require all of the privately run Medicare Part D plans for the elderly to cover BiDil. The separate generics are no substitute, the letter argues, since a patient would have to take many more pills and even split some pills in half to get the correct dose.

Medicare's stance "is so contrary to evidence-based medicine and so extraordinary that it arouses suspicions of institutional racism," said the letter, from Juan M. Cofield, president of the NAACP's New England council. If BiDil "were not a medication for blacks, their response might be different," Mr. Cofield added in an interview. Until a clinical trial shows that generics work as well as BiDil, the letter argues that Medicare should require all of the Part D drug plans to cover the drug.

Jeffrey Kelman, a senior doctor at CMS in Washington, said NitroMed would have to continue to plead its case with the individual Part D plans. "We've been working with minority groups for two years about this and similar issues," he said, and there's no evidence that BiDil works any better than its separate, much cheaper, ingredients.

NitroMed has been trying to get insurers to put BiDil on their "preferred brand" tiers, which generally require a monthly co-pay of $25 to $30. Even without a requirement from the government, many Medicare Part D insurers cover BiDil, including some plans from AARP, Humana Inc., UnitedHealth Group Inc., Aetna Inc., and the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association.

NitroMed says that with some recent additions of coverage, 57% of elderly African-Americans with health insurance now have coverage for BiDil, up from 20% six months ago. The company, which has no other products, has been struggling because of BiDil's disappointing sales.

Delta Supporters Pack Senate Hearing In DC Grinstein, Parker Both Testify On US Airways Takeover Bid (AJC)

By Marilyn Geewax

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 25, 2007

Washington-Appearing At a Packed hearing before the Senate Commerce Commitee Wednesday, Delta AirLines CEO Gerald Grinstein said both workers and consumers will suffer if US Airways' takeover bid for Delta succeeds.

"Delta does not need to be acquired to be saved," Grinstein declared in an overstuffed hearing room ringed by Delta pilots, standing ramrod straight in their black uniforms.

"The US Airways deal would reverse the hard work and remarkable progress Delta people have made restructuring our airline," Grinstein said. "Delta is poised to emerge from bankruptcy this spring as a strong, fiercely competitive, standalone airline."

Hundreds of Delta employees and supporters lined up outside the hearing, filling a stairwell for two long flights and spilling into basement corridors in the Senate Russell Office Building.

The takeover "must be rejected and opposed because it is blatantly anti-competitive," Grinstein said.

Sen. Johnny Isakson, R-Ga., introduced Grinstein, whom he said has done "great things" for Delta.

Andrew Steinberg, assistant secretary for the the Transportation Department, said he could not comment on any particular proposed takeover, but felt that in general, consolidation is the "natural consequence of a deregulated industry." When weighing whether to approved a merger, "we have to keep an open mind," he said.

US Airways CEO Douglas Parker urged the government to "let the market work" so that airlines can become more profitable and avoid the need for government bailouts.

Parker, who led America West Airlines' 2005 merger with US Airways, argued that the merger would lead to lower prices for consumers because the company would be in a better position to compete with low-cost carriers such as Jet Blue Airways and Southwest Airlines. The growth of those competitors he said, shows the "tendency of the marketplace to respond."

"New carriers can come in and lower prices," Parker said.

Both airline executives said the industry has made important strides toward rebounding from the financial troubles that they incurred as result of the 2001 terrorist attacks and soaring fuel prices.

The prospect of a US Airways-Delta merger has sparked talk of other possible link-ups among big airlines — and concerns among labor and consumer groups about the fallout. That prompted the Senate hearing.

Several senators said their constituents are concerned that a merger would result in cutbacks to service in small communities, where the per-unit costs of running an airline tend to be more expensive than in big cities with lots of passenger traffic.

"You're an aggressive suitor, but the lady from the South doesn't want to be forced into this shotgun wedding," said Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss, a reference to Delta's Atlanta headquarters.

The hearing occurred amid indications the US Airways bid for Delta may be faltering on its own.

DOJ_NMG_0121356

In an interview Tuesday, Parker said US Airways' recently sweetened bid for Delta has generated little response from the Atlanta carrier's bankruptcy creditors, and that time is running out on the offer.

"We have not had any give-and-take negotiations (with the creditors), which you might expect," said Parker, who on Jan. 10 raised the bid nearly 20 percent to about $10.3 billion.

Parker said he still hopes the deal will get done, joining the two carriers under the Delta banner.

But he sounded less optimistic than in the past. "If the creditors don't want to do it, that's their perogative," Parker said by phone from Washington.

US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., has set a Feb. 1 deadline for Delta's official creditors committee to tell management to take initial steps toward a deal.

Its offer is "absolutely, positively retracted" if the creditors don't do so, said Parker. "If they choose to do that, they should know that we're not coming back," he said.

Delta's creditors continue to study the competing plans and have given themselves until Jan. 31 to decide whether to agree to US Airways' conditions, a person familiar with Delta's bankruptcy reorganization told The Atlanta Journal-Constitution.

That person said creditors are considering various aspects of Delta's standalone reorganization plan, such as compensation for Delta's management. They're also weighing the risks of a delay in Delta's Chapter 11 exit that might result while federal regulators consider the deal, and the risk that regulators might not approve it at all.

Delta spokeswoman Gina Laughlin declined to comment on creditors' deliberations.

Meanwhile, Grinstein, in a question-and-answer session with an employee group, said Delta has sought financial information from Northwest Airlines at the request of the creditors. But he added the move was "a far cry from negotiating a merger with them."

Reports earlier this month suggested Delta and Minnesota-based Northwest, which is also in Chapter 11, were feeling each other out about a merger after both leave court.

Grinstein characterized the Northwest overture as intelligence-gathering to update "potential responses to our industry's changing marketplace." He said he felt it was important to "debunk the Northwest rumor."

Grinstein said he is "not anti-merger" — noting that Delta itself has had four — but considers the US Airways proposal "the worst kind of deal" because it joins carriers with largely overlapping routes.

While the creditors' decision on the US Airways bid is largely financial, the airline, employee groups and political allies have waged a high-profile public effort to defeat it. Part of their aim is to show that a merger would be both unpopular with consumers and workers, as well as unlikely to survive regulatory review at the Department of Justice.

Senators Worry Airline Deals Hurt Competition, Consumers (WSJ)

By Melanie Trottman And Corey Dade

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Members of a Senate committee expressed strong skepticism that sweeping consolidation in the U.S. airline industry would be good for consumers and were particularly unenthused about US Airways Group Inc.'s $9.8 billion hostile bid for Delta Air Lines Inc.

A three-hour hearing was punctuated by testiness as US Airways Chairman and Chief Executive Doug Parker defended the Tempe, Ariz., carrier's takeover offer, which was condemned by Gerald Grinstein, Delta's CEO, who insisted that the Atlanta airline would be best to emerge from bankruptcy on its own later this year.

Despite a grilling from lawmakers on the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation, the hearing was somewhat anticlimactic because in recent days the official committee of Delta creditors appears to have been shying away from the US Airways bid, according to people familiar with the situation.

One of the biggest concerns by committee members is that a merger could force Delta to remain in bankruptcy while a deal is ironed out and that resistance by Delta executives could derail the process.

Separately, a group of Delta bondholders yesterday urged that negotiations begin on the US Airways bid. The ad hoc committee of unsecured creditors, an informal group formed in November largely in support of the proposed deal, believes opening talks with US Airways could yield a more lucrative offer and thus fatten the payout to all Delta creditors.

Meanwhile, talks about a possible merger between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. have been put on hold, further deflating speculation that a frenzy of deal-making among U.S. airlines is imminent.

While Congress can't block proposed mergers, yesterday's hearing made it clear that even the prospect of consolidation faces resistance from many lawmakers, especially those worried that mergers would reduce or even eliminate air service to smaller communities.

"I am not a fan of mergers," said North Dakota Democratic Sen. Byron Dorgan. "Inevitably what's going to happen is the other network carriers are going to decide they're going to merge. I think it gives consumers fewer choices, less competition."

Other concerns included the possibility of higher fares and additional impact on airline employees who have suffered steep pay cuts, layoffs and the loss of pension benefits during the industry's latest downturn.

Mr. Parker reiterated his assurance that a takeover of Delta wouldn't result in job cuts of any front-line, or nonmanagement, employees, though he acknowledged the combined work forces would be reduced through attrition.

"You're making a big leap here," said Sen. Trent Lott, a Republican from Mississippi, who complimented Mr. Parker on the merger he engineered two years ago between America West Airlines and US Airways. "I'm not opposed to the [Delta] merger. It does bother me when it's a hostile effort," he said. Another lawmaker recalled that AMR Corp.'s American Airlines pledged to take care of TWA workers when American acquired assets of the carrier in 2001, then eventually left most of them jobless.

The packed hearing room included dozens of uniformed Delta pilots, who stood against the walls wearing "Keep Delta My Delta" buttons.

Mr. Grinstein said Delta was financially strong enough to maintain its independence after exiting bankruptcy, and he disputed Mr. Parker's stance that acquiring Delta would lead to lower fares while maintaining adequate service levels.

By Marilyn Adams

WASHINGTON — Skeptical members of the Senate Commerce Committee questioned Wednesday whether US Airways' hostile takeover of Delta Air Lines would cut service to small cities.

Congress has no official role in the pending takeover bid, but lawmakers can wield considerable influence and possibly decide to change laws dealing with airline mergers.

At issue was US Airways' $10.2 billion hostile bid for Atlanta-based Delta, which has been in Chapter 11 bankruptcy for 16 months. Such a large merger, which would create the nation's largest airline, would have to be reviewed by antitrust regulators at the Justice Department.

From the start, the tone of the hearing was critical. Many of the committee members hail from largely rural states — Alaska, Minnesota, Maine, West Virginia, North Dakota — and worried aloud that consolidation would reduce service to cities in their states.

About 50 uniformed members of Delta's pilots union, which opposes the deal, lined the standing-room-only chamber wearing "Keep Delta My Delta" lapel buttons.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., echoed colleagues when he questioned whether the merger might result in less air service to small cities now served by Delta or US Airways.

US Airways CEO Doug Parker, the only witness to support the deal, said it would strengthen both carriers. He testified that strong network airlines "are the best hope for small communities" because discounters such as Southwest Airlines generally don't serve those airports.

He said US Airways — itself the product of the 2005 merger between America West and the old US Airways — is now the most profitable network carrier, a category that also includes American, United, Delta, Continental and Northwest.

"That merger has been a tremendous success," he said.

Delta CEO Jerry Grinstein, who is fighting the takeover of his company, predicted a Delta-US Airways merger would bring sharp service cutbacks where the two carriers overlap along the East Coast.

Responding to concerns raised by Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., Grinstein said it would usher in more mergers among the rest of the USA's six network airlines. They'd have to merge to compete, he said.

"If you approve this," Grinstein said, "the industry will devolve into three carriers."

Union leader Robert Roach Jr., representing the International Association of Machinists, criticized US Airways for trying to buy another airline before it has negotiated new labor contracts covering mechanics from the old US Airways and America West.

"You have to finish transaction No. 1 before starting transaction No. 2," he said.

Delta says it's prepared to exit bankruptcy this spring as an independent carrier worth between $9.4 billion and $12 billion. Delta's bankruptcy creditors' committee met in New York on Wednesday, but it still had no official response to US Airways' 2-month-old offer. The creditors must decide whether to back Delta's stand-alone plan, accept US Airways' offer or ask US Airways for more.

Parker has said he will withdraw the offer Feb. 1 unless the creditors signal their support and press Delta to open its books.

US Airways Defends Its Plan To Buy Delta (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

With a critical deadline looming in his hostile takeover bid for Delta Air Lines, the chief executive of US Airways faced tough questions yesterday from senators worried that a combined carrier would reduce service to rural areas and increase fares.

The concerns emerged during a lengthy Senate hearing on the proposed merger of Delta and US Airways, and the potential impact of future airline consolidation. The hearing also put the chief executives of the two airlines, who have been slugging it out in news releases, within arm's length of each other in public for the first time since the merger bid was announced in November.

Democratic and Republican senators expressed fears that a merger would force other carriers to combine. Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), chairman of the Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation's subcommittee on aviation, said such consolidation could harm small towns and other "end-of-the-food chain markets and their prices and their service."

US Airways chief executive W. Douglas Parker repeatedly defended his bid for Atlanta-based Delta, which is operating under Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, by saying that a combined carrier would provide better service to rural areas.

"In general, I would say that healthy network carriers that earn adequate profits are actually good for smaller communities and good for consumers because they can afford the breadth and scope of service that we want to deliver," Parker said.

Two weeks ago, Parker increased his bid for Delta by 20 percent to a total of $9.8 billion in stock and cash. He has set a Feb. 1 deadline for Delta's creditors to accept his offer.

Despite Parker's assurances on preserving service to small communities, senators from Maine to Mississippi expressed skepticism.

"The inevitable will happen, which is to say that we're going to, you know, lose service and also, I think, [the outcome will] result in higher prices," said Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine).

Sens. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) and Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said they did not think the merger would help their residents and were not pleased by the hostile nature of the bid.

"It's one network carrier saying 'I'm going to take over the other network carrier,' " Dorgan said. "I'm not a big fan of that because inevitably what is going to happen is the other network carriers are going to decide we've got to merge. . . . I don't think that gives consumers more choices. I think that gives them fewer choices."

Lott added: "Now, I must say you are an aggressive suitor. But the lady from the South -- Atlanta -- doesn't seem to want to be forced into this shotgun wedding."

Grinstein agreed with the senators that service to rural areas could be lost. He also questioned the viability of a combined company because it would have about $24 billion of debt.

"If you believe that with the kind of debt that this is going to have, that you're not going to reduce your hubs, you're not going to reduce frequencies, you're not going to consolidate flights and reduce planes, you believe in Tinker Bell," Grinstein said.

Grinstein also denied media reports that Delta and Northwest have been negotiating a possible merger. "Let me be very clear about that: We are not negotiating any such deal with Northwest," Grinstein testified.

Some of the senators also pressed the executives on whether they thought it would be a good idea to re-regulate the industry to promote service to small towns and rural areas. Grinstein and Parker said they would work with the Transportation Department and Senate staff members to study such proposals.

Although the executives were cordial, the high stakes of the fight were not lost on those attending the hearing. The room was packed with Delta pilots and other employees, who burst into applause at one point and wore buttons supporting the carrier's efforts to avoid a takeover.

When Rockefeller called a break so senators could attend a vote, he asked Andrew B. Steinberg, a top official at the Transportation Department, to "maintain your position between those two CEOs."

Senators Wary Of Hostile Bid For Delta (FT)

Washington lawmakers on both sides of the aisle on Wednesday expressed deep scepticism about US Airways' $9.8bn hostile bid for Delta.

The poor reception for the deal in Congress raises significant questions about the future of the proposed transaction. The airline merger would lead to a wave of consolidation that would cut sharply the number of national carriers in the US, the lawmakers said.

In a small, packed hearing room to discuss the prospects of the deal, some Democratic and Republican senators appeared unconvinced by promises from Doug Parker, chief executive of US Airways, that the proposed deal, which would create the largest US carrier, would not lead to cuts in service, large-scale redundancies or increased fares.

While Congress does not have a formal say in deciding whether the deal could move forward, lawmakers – particularly those representing rural states – could put political pressure on both the airline industry and the Justice Department, which would review the deal on antitrust grounds. Although the White House has been largely hands-off on merger reviews, the Justice Department blocked a proposed merger between United and US Airways in 2001.

Andrew Steinberg, assistant secretary for aviation at the Department of Transportation, which would likely confer with antitrust authorities on the deal, declined to comment on the US Airways case, but presented mixed signals on where the Bush administration might stand on the issue.

While mergers were "not a panacea" for the airline industry's long-term problems, the government should not assume that having fewer carriers "necessarily translates into detriment to consumers", said Mr Steinberg.

However, even some Republican lawmakers who traditionally do not oppose mergers on competition grounds, such as Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, said they were concerned the deal would lead to the closure of some routes.

"You're an aggressive suitor," Mr Lott told Mr Parker. "But the lady from the South doesn't want to be forced into this shotgun wedding," he said, referring to Georgia-based Delta.

Gerald Grinstein, Delta's chief executive, whose testimony was backed up by the presence of 32 uniformed Delta pilots around the hearing room wearing "Keep Delta My Delta" pins, said the combination would trigger further deals and lead the industry "to devolve into three network carriers". He also testified that Delta was not negotiating a separate deal with Northwest Airlines.

He said: "Approve this [deal] and you will be setting a very low threshold." Mr Grinstein added that, given the roughly $22bn in debt the deal would amass on the combined company's balance sheet, one might sooner believe in Tinkerbell than Mr Parker's notion that the merger would not lead to a disruption in service.

The tone of some legislators' remarks revealed underlying frustration at the airline industry and US Airways in particular for pursuing the merger even though it and other companies have in recent years dumped their pension liabilities on to the federal government.

Lawmakers in the House of Representatives are due to take on the same issue next week at another hearing.

US Airways has said it will withdraw its bid if Delta creditors do not push the carrier to the negotiating table by February 1, allowing it to start seeking regulatory approval. Delta's board is reviewing the revised bid to create the largest US carrier, a move that has triggered talks about potential combinations. However, the final decision will rest with its creditors.

Rumors Of Delta Merger With Northwest Are False, Airline CEO Tells Congress (DEN)

By David Shepardson, Detroit News Washington Bureau

Detroit News, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Delta Air Lines CEO Gerald Grinstein told Congress Wednesday the airline isn't interested in merging with US Airways or with Northwest Airlines, the largest carrier at Detroit Metropolitan Airport.

"One such rumor is that Delta is negotiating a merger or similar deal with Northwest. One point we want to make very clear: We are not negotiating any such deal with Northwest," Grinstein said in prepared testimony before the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation committee.

The hearing was called to discuss the potential impact of airline mergers and industry consolidation.

"In the face of US Airways' hostile takeover bid, our Official Creditors Committee asked us to help gather information about potential strategic alternatives from other airlines, including Northwest."

Grinstein said that to fulfill that request, the airline "recently retained an investment banker to obtain that information, a far cry from negotiating a merger. We are compiling this information, but there has not been any negotiation regarding a merger or similar deal with Northwest or any other airline."

Grinstein heavily criticized US Airways' $10 billion-plus hostile takeover bid, saying it would never be approved by the Justice Department. Analysts have noted that there is a great deal of overlap between the two carriers' route structure, and that a merger could result in the elimination of many duplicative flights.

Grinstein said a US Airways takeover would result in the "likely loss of an estimated 10,000 Delta jobs."

"US Airways principle goal in its hostile takeover attempt is to eliminate its key competitor," Grinstein said. "This merger is being proposed to cut service, shrink hubs and increase prices."

A combined Delta and US Airways would operate 52 percent of slots and 40 percent of gates at major East Coast airports.

US Airways -- which was purchased by America West out of bankruptcy -- defended a takeover of Delta, saying it wouldn't cut service and would reduce ticket prices in dozens of cities.

US Airways Chairman Doug Parker said aggressive cost-management and consumer friendly policies and pricing allowed America West to return to profitability.

He told Congress a combined Delta-US Airways wouldn't drop any cities.

"With the ability to lower costs, gain efficiencies and adjust flying to better align demand and capacity, we believe we can lower fares in dozens of new markets and communities, just as we are doing at US Airways today," Parker said. "Moreover, passengers will benefit from the ability to get to more destinations via more routings; it is far more likely that thanks to the new Delta more passengers will be able to get to their destination at a time convenient for them and at a price that is reasonable, than would be possible under either stand-alone Delta or US Airways."

Parker also said "We will not furlough any frontline employees of Delta or US Airways as part of this merger," but didn't directly address job cuts. "We have put forth a fair and equitable proposal… Our industry stands at a crossroads. We can continue down the current path of boom and bust uncertainty, or we can chart a new course," he said. "We have to break with the failed policies of the past in order to provide a more sustainable future for all stakeholders."

Delta said the merger between America West and US Airways saw employment drop from 43,000 at the time of the merger to 35,000 today.

CME To Dominate Management Of CME-CBOT (AP)

By Stephen Wisnefski And Howard Packowitz, Dow Jones Newswires

AP, January 25, 2007

CHICAGO (AP) -- Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc. Wednesday named those who will be on their post-merger management team, with CME executives dominating the leadership roster.

The exchanges also said they "believe they are on track" to complete the merger by mid-2007, noting that "significant milestones" have been reached recently. The two largest U.S. futures exchanges cited, as examples, the filing in December of a registration statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission, and decisions made regarding a high-level organizational structure and a senior leadership team.

As previously announced, CME Chief Executive Craig Donohue will be CEO of the merged company, to be known as CME Group. CME Executive Chairman Terry Duffy will retain that role in the merged group, and CBOT Chairman Charles Carey will serve as CME Group vice chairman. Also as previously disclosed, CBOT CEO Bernard Dan will serve as a special advisor to the combined company for one year after the merger closes.

The only current CBOT executive who will be on the CME Group's management team is Bryan Durkin, who will serve as chief operating officer. Durkin, who currently serves as CBOT's chief operating officer and has been with the exchange since 1982, will be responsible for overseeing the transition of CBOT's electronically traded products to CME's Globex platform and the transition of CME trading floor operations to the CBOT facility.

Last October, CME announced that it would acquire CBOT for about $8 billion, representing one of the more significant deals in a spate of consolidation activity among exchanges around the globe. CME Group will have dominant positions in trading of futures on products tied to interest rates, stock indexes, currencies and several commodities.

CME and CBOT have seen significant growth in trading volume in recent years as investor grew increasingly interested in the types of derivatives contracts traded at the Chicago exchanges. CME's growth, however, has been more robust, in large part owing to the success of its Globex platform.

Each of the 10 members of CME's current management team will be on the CME Group's leadership team, for the most part holding the same titles and responsibilities they now have.

Phupinder Gill, who has been with CME since 1988, will continue as president of CME Group, though he will relinquish the role of chief operating officer once Durkin takes on that responsibility. Durkin will report to Gill, who will serve in the office of the CEO with Donohue.

With the naming of the new management team, the exchanges said a handful of CBOT executives -- including Chief Financial Officer Glen Johnson, Chief Administrative Officer Kevin O'Hara, Chief Information Officer William Farrow and head of marketing and business development, Christopher Malo -- would stay in their current roles until the close of the merger.

Representatives from both exchanges declined to comment on whether the CBOT executives would remain with CME Group in some capacity after completion of the merger. CBOT spokeswoman Melissa Jarmel said "those decisions haven't been made yet."

The representatives said CME and CBOT are still in the early stages of defining strategy for the merged group and laying out personnel plans. They also declined to comment on when further personnel announcements would be made.

Meanwhile, the exchanges are awaiting results of an antitrust review by the U.S. Department of Justice to determine whether the merged group would create a monopoly.

Contacted earlier this week, a Justice Department spokeswoman provided no timetable for completion of the investigation.

Shares of CME and CBOT, which have been gaining steadily since the start of the year, both hit record highs Wednesday. On the New York Stock Exchange, CME closed up $7.19 at $591.54, after moving as high as $596.30. CBOT shares closed up $2.27 at $175.72, after reaching $176.89 earlier.

TRADE WINDS In Call To Deregulate Business, A Global Twist (WSJ)

By Greg Ip, Kara Scannell And Deborah Solomon

Prominent figures in the U.S. are warning that the nation's financial markets have been handicapped by post-Enron regulatory overreach. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has made addressing the problem a signature political issue. A blue-ribbon committee chaired by former Bush economist Glenn Hubbard has echoed this sentiment, as does a report commissioned by Sen. Charles Schumer of New York and New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

Their key evidence is data suggesting that U.S. stock markets are increasingly unattractive places for companies to list shares. Mr. Hubbard, now dean of Columbia University's business school, says this is the "canary in the coal mine," an early warning of the increasing costs to U.S. companies of raising money, which in turn threatens investment and growth. Their solution: a lighter touch in regulating corporate behavior.

• The Stakes: If critics are right, U.S. companies are paying more to raise capital, which will limit investment and growth.

Yet this position, which has gone largely unchallenged, downplays a different explanation for why U.S. exchanges are under pressure -- the changing nature of global finance. Stock markets around the world have become better and deeper, encouraging companies to seek IPOs in their home market. Trading across borders has become simpler, cutting the prestige and usefulness of a big-country listing everywhere. And private-equity buyouts are a global phenomenon, not a uniquely American one.

Andrew Karolyi, an Ohio State University economist who specializes in international stock-exchange listings, agrees with Mr. Hubbard that some new regulations, especially parts of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act, impose burdens that outweigh the benefits. But Mr. Karolyi is skeptical of the stock-exchange evidence, which he links instead to transitory global trends.

MARKET SLIDE

See more charts on the competitiveness of U.S. exchanges1. Plus, read reports and speeches on the topic by Henry Paulson and others: • Speech by Henry Paulson on the Competitiveness of U.S. Capital Markets2

• The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation (Scott-Hubbard-Thornton committee) interim report3

• The McKinsey Report commissioned by Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-NY) and NYC Mayor Michael Bloomberg4

• Study by Ernst & Young on Global Capital Markets Trends5

Regulations "should be judged on their own merits and not on any evidence of a supposed decline in the attractiveness for prospective listings from overseas," Mr. Karolyi says.

Mr. Paulson acknowledged in a speech last November that foreign markets have improved, which he called "unequivocally...a positive." But he devoted most of his attention to the costs of U.S. accounting and governance rules and the legal climate. Mr. Hubbard's Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, consisting of academics and finance executives and endorsed by Mr. Paulson, spent 148 pages discussing the harm done by U.S. regulatory and legal risks.

Among the charges: Suing corporations for fraud is too easy, resulting in a ninefold increase in the number of shareholder lawsuit settlements between 1997 and 2005. Civil and criminal prosecutors are overzealous, producing civil enforcement penalties more than 100 times higher in the U.S. than the U.K. in 2004. Auditing standards are unreasonably onerous for small companies.

As this criticism has increased in volume, regulators have eased some Sarbanes-Oxley standards for companies' internal financial controls. In addition, they have made it easier for foreign companies to stop adhering to U.S. rules, and the Department of Justice has imposed more conditions on prosecutors seeking evidence when investigating executives.

In an interview, Mr. Hubbard concedes there's "no smoking gun" that proves whether global or U.S.-specific forces are behind the smaller number of foreign companies listing in the U.S. "Both factors are important," he says.

He also cites a complex piece of evidence in favor of the domestic theory. Historically, overseas companies received a boost in their stock price when they listed in the U.S., an indication of how meeting U.S. requirements inspires investor trust. But recently the premium earned by companies from advanced countries has shrunk faster than that for shares in emerging-market companies. For companies already meeting stringent governance standards at home, Mr. Hubbard argues, the costs of meeting U.S. requirements therefore exceeds the benefits.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Paulson said he was unavailable to comment for this article. In a written statement, she said Mr. Paulson sees the global changes as "unquestionably a factor to consider" alongside regulatory and legal burdens. The Treasury is holding a conference this spring to discuss these topics.

There's little doubt U.S. exchanges are facing increasing competition. They're losing out to overseas exchanges for initial public offerings. Many overseas companies are deciding they don't need an American listing. And in the U.S. itself, many companies have decided they're better off private.

Taken alone, the cost of regulation can't explain what's happening to U.S. financial markets, and paring regulations might not alter the outcome, except to give a helping hand to Wall Street.

"Well-functioning capital markets are central to the success of the economy," says former Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers, now a Harvard University economist and managing director at a hedge fund. "What fraction of capital markets transactions runs through New York is of much less broad-based significance."

The IPO Challenge

One piece of evidence Mr. Paulson and others cite is the falling U.S. share of IPOs. At the peak of the U.S. IPO boom in 1999, the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq Stock Market notched 57% of world-wide IPO proceeds, up from 39% in 1990, according to Thomson Financial, a financial-data provider. By last year, that share had fallen to 18%.

Regulatory costs may be one factor. Another big one is the shrinking quality gap between U.S. and overseas capital markets and an explosion in IPOs from the developing world. The world's largest IPO, the $22 billion offering from Industrial & Commercial Bank of China, listed in October in both Hong Kong and Shanghai. The biggest gainer in IPO business has been Hong Kong, which snagged 16% of world IPO proceeds in 2006 compared with zero in 1990.

"The Hong Kong market is deep enough and liquid enough that there's really no need to list elsewhere," says Paul Calello, Asia chief executive for Credit Suisse, one of the managers of ICBC's IPO.

Another gainer is the London Stock Exchange's Alternative Investment Market, set up in the 1990s to cater to small companies with little operating history. AIM has far less government oversight of governance, accounting and disclosure than the LSE's better-known Main Market or U.S. markets. Its foreign listings -- not all of which are IPOs -- have skyrocketed to 306 from 31 in 2000, and include some U.S. companies.

AIM's success is seen by some as evidence that some companies have sought a haven from U.S. rules. Protonex Technology Corp., Southborough, Mass., a maker of fuel-cell power systems, went public on AIM in 2006. Scott Pearson, its chief executive officer, says it would have cost three times as much to list in the U.S., in large part due to legal and auditing costs related to Sarbanes-Oxley.

But many of AIM's companies probably couldn't have listed in the U.S. even before 2002, either because they didn't meet U.S. requirements or were too small to attract interest from U.S. underwriters and investors. "Many of the companies listed on AIM today wouldn't come anywhere close to meeting an NYSE listing standard," says Noreen Culhane, executive vice-president of listings at the NYSE.

A Global Affliction

In addition to IPO share, listings of foreign companies on U.S. markets have fallen. Since their peak in 2002, foreign listings on the NYSE have fallen 4% to 451 by the end of 2006, although that's up slightly from 2000. Since 2000, foreign listing have fallen 34% to 321 on Nasdaq.

It's hardly an American disease. Excluding AIM, the London Stock Exchange's blue-chip Main Market has seen foreign listings decline 23% since 2000. The Deutsche Börse is down 58%; Tokyo down 39%.

The world has changed for all big-country stock exchanges. For years, says Mr. Karolyi, investors "were trapped in their local markets" because foreign stock exchanges had differing standards, for example over how to finalize payments. Over time, those standards have been strengthened and harmonized, increasing "global investors' appetite for going directly into those markets." Shanghai, for example, has 842 listed companies, up from 188 in 1995.

Furthermore, says Mr. Karolyi, a U.S. listing may have had particular appeal to foreign companies in the late 1990s because of the buoyant stock market, which faded with the market's downward turn after the tech bubble burst. Most of the delisted companies had little trading volume, and trading in those that remain is generally healthy.

Cellphone maker Nokia Corp., based in Finland, shows how companies make decisions in light of these changed circumstances. Nokia sought a London listing in 1987 to raise its profile, and listed on the NYSE in 1994. In 1995, about 45% of trading in Nokia stock occurred in New York, 31% in London and 24% in Helsinki.

Then, as a condition of joining the European Union in the mid-1990s, Finland began permitting brokers in other EU countries to trade on Helsinki's stock exchange. In the late 1990s, Helsinki launched an electronic trading system and Finland adopted the euro as its currency. By 2003 Helsinki had captured 60% of Nokia's trading volume, leaving the LSE with less than 1%. Nokia delisted from London and Paris, where its shares were also traded.

"People still could trade Nokia, but we did not have to pay annual listing costs to the London and Paris stock exchanges," says spokeswoman Arja Suominen. Today, 91% of Nokia's shares are held outside Finland, but 68% of the trading occurs in Helsinki and about a quarter in the U.S.

Meanwhile, U.S. investors are less insistent that foreign companies list in the U.S. before they'll buy shares. Mitchells & Butlers PLC, a British operator of taverns, delisted from the NYSE in 2005. It says the low volume of trading -- less than 1% of the total -- didn't merit the annual $1 million cost, which included filing SEC statements and auditor fees related to Sarbanes-Oxley.

This makes little difference to Ray Mills, who owns about $10 million in Mitchells & Butlers shares for the $2.4 billion stock fund he manages for T. Rowe Price Group Inc., a Baltimore mutual-fund house. He bought the shares in London even though they were listed on the NYSE at the time, and isn't bothered that they no longer are.

"We want to go where the liquidity is," Mr. Mills says. Mitchells's stock was more liquid -- that is, easier to trade -- in its home market than in New York. "We have trading desks not just in the U.S. but Hong Kong and London [so] we have 24-hour coverage of the markets."

Private-Equity Rules

In his November speech, Mr. Paulson suggested many publicly traded companies are selling to private-equity firms -- removing themselves from public trading and SEC scrutiny -- because of the "regulatory requirements" of being a public company in the U.S. But the buyout boom, too, is not merely a U.S. trend but a global one.

Between 1996 and 2002, private-equity buyouts represented 2% of all mergers and acquisitions in the U.S. and 3% in the rest of the world. Between 2002 and 2006, the fraction has increased to 11% in the U.S. and 10% in the rest of the world, according to Thomson Financial.

David Rubenstein, managing director of Carlyle Group, Washington, D.C., one of the world's largest private-equity firms, attributes much of the boom to the simple fact that firms such as Carlyle have so much cash -- from investors eager to share in the sector's impressive returns and from banks, hedge funds and others ready to lend on easy terms.

Regulations have also been blamed for the growing number of venture- and private-equity backed companies being sold privately. "The costs and regulatory hurdles to go public in the U.S. today are driving venture-backed companies away from our capital markets system," Keith Crandell, managing director of Chicago's Arch Venture Partners, told Congress last year.

Carlyle's Mr. Rubenstein cites another reason. It's easier for private-equity firms to recoup their entire investment by selling to another private-equity firm, rather than the small portion they typically sell in an IPO.

Early last year, Carlyle filed to sell a stake in industrial manufacturer Rexnord Corp., through an IPO, for up to $400 million. A few months later, Carlyle instead sold the entire company to Apollo Management LP, another private-equity firm, for $1.8 billion.

The importance of Sarbanes-Oxley in the decision of many public companies to go private "has probably been overstated," Mr. Rubenstein says. More important, he says, is "not just the quarterly but hourly" pressure from Wall Street for stock and earnings performance.

Differential Equations

Mr. Hubbard's committee worried about how the U.S. regulatory burden has risen relative to that of other countries. The bigger the differential, the greater the potential competitive disadvantage.

Yet even as the U.S. debates whether it has gone too far, other countries are tightening their rules. The EU, Canada, Mexico, Australia, Hong Kong, Brazil, the U.K. and Germany have to varying degrees beefed up standards for audit committees. This means many companies won't escape tighter regulation by avoiding the U.S.

Major provisions of Sarbanes-Oxley "have not competitively disadvantaged U.S. markets, simply by virtue of the fact that they have been widely adopted elsewhere," says a 2006 study by Ethiopis Tafara, director of the Securities and Exchange Commission's office of international affairs.

The Netherlands' ABN AMRO Bank NV dropped its London listing last year because of low trading volume, and now trades only on the NYSE and Euronext, two exchanges in the process of merging. Spokesman Jochem van de Laarschot says while the U.S. regulatory burden has risen, the same is true of most countries where it operates.

In 2004, Hong Kong's then-chief securities regulator, Andrew Sheng, told a Senate panel that Sarbanes-Oxley brought global attention to corporate governance. Hong Kong, he said, has moved "closer to the U.S. SEC regulatory model," though without as much detail and prescription. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said yesterday at a conference that his agency's recent guidance on Sarbanes-Oxley, relaxing its implementation, "benefited greatly" from other countries' experience with similar rules.

Europe is moving, too. "Pretty soon the vast majority of Sarbanes-Oxley will be applicable either at the European level or at the national levels," says Andrew Bernstein, a Cleary Gottlieb partner in Paris who advises many French corporations. "The regulatory costs are in the process of converging."

The dismissal leaves 11 jurors to review allegations that Microsoft used anticompetitive practices that caused thousands of Iowans to pay more for the company's software than they would have otherwise.

Judge Scott Rosenberg said he considered the dismissal a personal matter and would not say why the juror was dismissed.

Plaintiffs attorneys Roxanne Conlin and Richard Hagstrom said juror dismissals are not unusual in lengthy trials.

"It will not affect our case," they said in a statement Wednesday.

Rich Wallis, a Microsoft lawyer, said he does not anticipate any other dismissals, though he expects the remaining jurors will be in court longer than the six months initially predicted.

Seven men and five women were seated Nov. 21 to hear the case in Polk County District Court. They began hearing opening statements Dec. 1.

Conlin and Hagstrom said experts will place damages in excess of $300 million.

Microsoft, which denies any overpricing, says its products have been widely accepted by consumers because of their low cost and high quality.

More than 80 prospective jurors were questioned before 12 were chosen for the civil trial, which would normally have eight jurors. The lawyers and Rosenberg agreed in this case to allow 12 in case some had to be dismissed or leave.

Both sides agreed to allow all jurors remaining at the end of the case to deliberate. They also agreed to permit the jury to fall to as few as six jurors.

ERG Denies Conspiring To Fix Fuel Prices (AP)

ROME (AP) -- ERG SpA, Italy's biggest independent refiner, denied on Wednesday it had conspired to fix retail fuel prices, in a statement released one day after the country's antitrust regulator started an investigation.

The Italian Competition Authority opened an inquiry into whether nine of the biggest oil companies agreed gasoline prices in the country's service station network, limiting competition and keeping prices at the pump at one of the highest levels in the European Union.

The companies being investigated are Eni SpA, the Italian units of Royal Dutch Shell PLC, Total SA and ExxonMobil Corp., as well as Kuwait Petroleum Italia SpA, Tamoil SpA, local firms ERG SpA, Anonima Petroli Italiana SpA, or API, and IP SpA. Privately-held API bought IP from Eni in 2005.

ERG said it had a "total lack of involvement" with the alleged price fixing of gasoline and diesel. Eni declined to comment.

The antitrust regulator has said it would conclude its probe by March 31, 2008.

AFP, January 25, 2007

BRUSSELS (AFP) - EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes stepped up her anti-cartel crusade, hitting 11 companies with a record fine for fixing prices and carving up the market in electrical generation equipment.

After bumper fines in 2006, the EU competition watchdog demanded ABB, Alstom, Areva, Fuji, Hitachi Japan AE Power Systems, Mitsubishi Electric Corporation, Schneider, Siemens, Toshiba and VA Tech pay 750 million euros (972 million dollars) for running a cartel.

The total fine was the second biggest EU regulators have imposed in a cartel case after slapping 855 million euros in penalties on eight vitamin makers in 2001. That fine was later reduced to 790 million euros by an EU court.

Siemens was told to pay 418 million euros (543 million dollars) for its leading role, the biggest fine EU regulators have ever slapped on a single company for participating in a cartel.

"The Commission has put an end to a cartel which has cheated public utility companies and consumers for more than 16 years," EU Competition Commissioner Kroes said.

She has made cracking down on cartels a top priority and last year imposed fines totalling 1.8 billion euros against the illegal clubs, a new annual record for regulators at the European Commission.

ADVERTISEMENT

"The Commission has once more shown that it will not tolerate cartels in Europe and the damage that they do in any area of business," Kroes said.

"The case also demonstrates that the Commission can and will bring down such cartels even if the companies concerned use sophisticated technology to cover their tracks," she added.

EU regulators found that between 1988 and 2004 the companies rigged bids for procurement contracts, fixed prices, divided up projects among themselves and shared sensitive information in the market for gas insulated switchgear.

Acting on a tip-off from ABB, regulators conducted raids on the groups' premises in May 2004. Two years later, the EU competition watch-dog took the final step before official sanctions against them by issuing statements of objections.

The fine of 215 million euros on ABB was waived because the company revealed the cartel to regulators.

Contesting the charges lodged against it, Siemens said it was shocked by what it described as the "completely exaggerated" fines and vowed to appeal at the European Court of Justice.

"We consider the fines to be completely exaggerated and cannot understand them at all," the chairman of Siemens Power Transmissions and Distribution unit, Udo Niehage, said in a statement.

Of the 418 million euro total imposed on Siemens, 396 million was slapped on the German parent company and 22 million euros on Siemens Austria. Siemens bought Austrian group VA Tech in 2005.

Toshiba denied breaking EU law and said that it would appeal while Hitachi and Mitsubishi Electric said they would consider challenging the ruling.

Although the Japanese firms play a negligible role in the European market, EU regulators accused them of agreeing with their European rivals to stay off each other's turf.

Mitsubishi Electric was fined 119 million euros, Toshiba 91 million euros, Hitachi 52 million euros, Alstom 65 million euros and Areva 53 million euros, Schneider 8.1 million euros, Fuji 3.7 million euros and Japan AE Power Systems 1.35 million euros.

Commission officials said that some of the individual fines could vary slightly because of joint ventures between some firms, but that it expected the total to be 750 million euros.

Norway Declares Apple's ITunes Illegal (FT)

By David Ibison In Stockholm, Emiko Terazono In London And Richard Waters In San Francisco

Apple was dealt a blow in Europe on Wednesday when Norway's powerful consumer ombudsman ruled that its iTunes online music store was illegal because it did not allow downloaded songs to be played on rival technology companies' devices.

The decision is the first time any jurisdiction has concluded iTunes breaks its consumer protection laws and could prompt other European countries to review the situation.

The ombudsman has set a deadline of October 1 for the Apple to make its codes available to other technology companies so that it abides by Norwegian law. If it fails to do so, it will be taken to court, fined and eventually closed down.

Apple, whose iTunes dominates the legal download market, has its proprietory system Fairplay. Songs and tunes downloaded through iTunes are designed to work with Apple's MP3 player iPod, but cannot be played on rival devices.

Torgeir Waterhouse, senior adviser to the Norwegian Consumer Council, who originally launched the complaint, told the Financial Times he was in negotiations with pan-European consumer groups to present a unified position on iTunes' legality.

Sweden and Finland have already backed Norway's stance, but have yet to take action, and Mr Waterhouse said the campaign was joined on Wednesday by Germany and France.

"We are satisfied the Federation of German Consumer Organisations and the French UFC Que Choisir are addressing this important issue. It means that iTunes is now being told by more than 100m European consumers to offer them a fair deal," he said.

Apple signalled that it would fight efforts in Norway and elsewhere in Europe to prise open the iTunes service, though it struck a more conciliatory tone than early last year when it attacked a proposed French law as "state-sponsored piracy".

"Apple is aware of the concerns we've heard from several agencies in Europe, and we're looking forward to resolving these issues as quickly as possible," it said in a statement. "Apple hopes that European governments will encourage a competitive environment that lets innovation thrive, protects intellectual property and allows consumers to decide which products are successful."

The development comes as competition in the multi-billion dollar global market for digital music is intensifying.

Nokia, the world's largest mobile phone maker, has set up a rival to iTunes, while Microsoft, the US technology company, has also launched its own digital music player called Zune to compete with the iPod.

However, the lack of interoperability has been blamed by some consumers and technology companies for hampering the growth of the legal digital music download market.

Record companies insist that the issue of interoperability is one for technology companies, and stress the importance of digital rights management in order to prevent piracy.

The IFPI, which represents record groups around the world, said that it "thoroughly supported interoperability, but wanted a market solution rather than one imposed by authorities".

Siemens Plans To Buy UGS For $3.5bn (FT)

By Lina Saigol In London, Richard Milne In Munich, Tobias Buck In Brussels And James Politi In New York

Siemens, Europe's largest engineering group, is set to strengthen its core automation division by paying about $3.5bn to buy private equity-owned UGS as it seeks to show it has not been paralysed by bribery allegations.

Details of the plan emerged as Siemens suffered a fresh blow to its reputation and finances on Wednesday, when the European Commission ordered the German engineering group to pay a record €397m fine for its "leadership role" in a long-running price-fixing cartel.

In addition to the UGS deal, the German conglomerate was last night also considering whether to float its VDO division, one of the world's largest car parts suppliers with annual sales of about €10bn, according to people close to the situation. Both measures were discussed last night at a supervisory board meeting but because of worker sensitivities on disposals, it is possible the plans could be disrupted. The approach on VDO was "undecided", one person familiar with the discussions said.

The moves highlight the determination of Klaus Kleinfeld, Siemens' chief executive, to push ahead with strengthening and restructuring his businesses despite being enmeshed in harmful corruption allegations. UGS, a US company specialising in product lifecycle management, is currently owned by US private equity groups Silver Lake, Bain Capital and Warburg Pincus.

The private equity consortium bought UGS from Electronic Data Systems in a $2.1bn deal in March 2004. This marks one of the first exits from the latest cycle of software investments by private equity firms. Before agreeing to a sale, Warburg, Bain and Silver Lake had been considering an IPO of UGS.

The news is likely to be overshadowed on Thursday by a torrent of criticism from investors over a €420m corruption scandal and under-performing businesses at the conglomerate's annual meeting.

Siemens intends to appeal the European Commission fines, calling them "totally exaggerated". The Munich-based group denied the Commission's "blanket accusation", saying in a statement that price-fixing only took place in a "few projects" and only between October 2002 and April 2004.

The 11 groups involved in the cartel were fined a total €751m, the largest fine for a single cartel.

In addition to Siemens, the groups fined included Mitsubishi Electric, which was told to pay €119m; Toshiba, €91m; and Hitachi, €52m. Alstom was fined €65m but may escape part of the penalty because it sold the subsidiary involved in the price-fixing to Areva in 2004. The French nuclear power group was jointly liable for €54m of Alstom's fine, the Commission said.

ABB, the Swedish/Swiss group, was part of the cartel but escaped punishment because it blew the whistle.

By Mike Esterl In Munich, Jason Singer In London And Dennis K. Berman In New York

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Accelerating a restructuring drive, Siemens AG said it would acquire software maker UGS Corp. of Texas for $3.5 billion, including debt, and sell a minority stake in its automotive-electronics unit through an initial public offering.

The steps follow a flurry of moves in the past 18 months by Germany's largest conglomerate, which is overhauling far-flung industrial holdings that manufacture items including steam turbines, medical scanners, high-speed trains and light bulbs.

A share listing of Siemens VDO Automotive could generate significant cash for the Munich-based company. The unit booked €10 billion ($13 billion) in revenue and €669 million in operating profit in the most recent fiscal year ended Sept. 30. Siemens didn't say how big a minority stake it would float.

Management said last year it would narrow its focus to three fast-growing areas: energy and environment; automation, and public and private infrastructure; and health-care.

While the automotive division doesn't fit neatly into that blueprint, UGS does. UGS makes software that helps companies manage products from inception to production. Siemens plans to fold the business -- which had just under $1.2 billion in revenue and $241 million in operating profit in fiscal 2005 -- into its factory-automation unit, one of the company's largest and most profitable divisions.

The UGS acquisition marks Siemens's largest purchase since last June, when it agreed to pay €4.2 billion for the medical-diagnostics division of Bayer AG. Europe's largest engineering company by sales, Siemens also has been investing heavily in areas such as wind power and water treatment.

Management at Siemens is pushing ahead with the restructuring drive even as it grapples with a widening fraud investigation. Siemens said last month it had uncovered €420 million in suspicious transactions stretching back seven years. Authorities suspect employees set up slush funds to pay bribes to potential customers.

Prosecutors are focusing on alleged corruption at the unprofitable telecommunications-equipment division that Siemens is trying to dismantle. A plan to transfer the bulk of that business into a joint venture with Nokia Corp. of Finland was put on hold last month until a compliance review can be completed.

Siemens today will publish its earnings report for the most recent fiscal quarter.

Dispute Threatens CSN's Bid For Corus (FT)

By Jonathan Wheatley In Brasília And Peter Marsh In London

The bid by Companhia Siderurgica Nacional, the Brazilian steelmaker, to acquire the Anglo-Dutch group Corus for £5.7bn ($11.2bn) could be blown off course by a legal dispute in Brazil, it has emerged.

The dispute, over CSN's rights to an iron-ore supply that would be crucial to a merged business, could lend fresh impetus to rival bidder Tata Steel of India. Tata is expected in the next few days to raise its £5.5bn bid above CSN's offer. Both bidders are due to finalise their offers for the world's eighth biggest steelmaker by next Tuesday.

The tussle arose after Companhia Vale do Rio Doce, the Brazilian mining group, said it would challenge CSN's ability to supply iron ore to Corus should its bid succeed. A big part of the rationale behind CSN's offer is that it would be able to supply cheap iron ore from its Casa de Pedra mine in Brazil to Corus's European plants. Tata has limited supplies of iron ore and, under Indian export regulations, is unlikely to be allowed in the next few years to ship it overseas.

But José Martins, CVRD's director for ferrous operations, told the Financial Times that CVRD would question CSN's ability to ship iron ore under the terms of a contract signed between the companies in 2001.

One interpretation of this accord is that CVRD has the first rights to any extra iron ore from Casa de Pedra. Mr Martins said the idea CSN could take iron from the mine to send to Corus "cannot be affirmed in advance".

"If CSN buys Corus, we will look closely at how the deal is done to see if our right [to the ore] remains in force," he said.

Juarez Salipa, CSN's mining director, said: "This is pure malevolence by CVRD. They will answer in court for any damage they cause by this type of statement."

Bush Makes Sales Pitch For Proposal On Energy (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

New York Times, January 25, 2007

WILMINGTON, Del., Jan. 24 — President Bush made a big deal about ethanol, the fuel derived from plants, in his State of the Union address Tuesday night. Wednesday morning, he got up close and personal with it, poking his head through stalks of corn and wheat while scientists for DuPont gave him a crash course in ethanol production in a tour of their research greenhouse here.

The presidential visit to the DuPont Experimental Station, which conducts federally financed research into the development of alternative fuels, amounted to a sales pitch for Mr. Bush's plan to reduce projected gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years.

After hearing a minilecture on how plants are converted into sugars, and the sugars then distilled into fuel, Mr. Bush, a former Texas oilman who has proclaimed Americans "addicted to oil," lifted up a glass beaker of switchgrass, a perennial grass that looks like hay, and stared into a bank of television cameras to drive his point home.

"What our citizens need to know," Mr. Bush said, with a microbiologist, Armando Byrne, by his side, "is that because of the research you're doing here, with some of their taxpayer dollars, that switchgrass, that can be grown all across America, can end up being made into fuel that powers their automobiles."

Mr. Byrne nodded in agreement.

"That's important," the president declared.

Later, in a speech to DuPont employees, Mr. Bush said he had ordered the federal government to buy more hybrid vehicles that use ethanol or alternative fuels, and to buy hybrid plug-in cars "as soon as they hit the market."

Most federal agencies already have alternative-fuel vehicles. Of the more than 586,000 vehicles in the federal fleet, 866 are hybrids and 106,869 are alternative-fuel vehicles, White House officials said.

"We set the goal," Mr. Bush told the DuPont employees. "It doesn't make much sense for the federal government to set the goal and not participate."

The trip itself, however, was hardly energy efficient. Mr. Bush made the short jaunt to Wilmington aboard Air Force One, spending a mere 30 minutes in the air on the way up and 20 minutes on the way back. On the ground, he traveled in the usual motorcade of about two dozen vehicles, including sport utility vehicles carrying gun-toting Secret Service agents, and vans carrying camera-toting members of the press.

There was nary a hybrid among them.

President Travels To Promote Emphasis On Alternative Fuels (USAT)

By David Jackson

WILMINGTON, Del. — President Bush went on the road Wednesday to begin making his case for more alternative fuel sources.

A day after highlighting energy and other domestic issues in his State of the Union address, Bush toured a plant that develops biofuels from corn, switch grass and wood chips. He also touted his plan to reduce the use of gasoline over the next decade to an audience of more than 1,000, most of whom were DuPont employees.

In Washington, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee debated and passed a resolution opposing Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop levels in Iraq. In Tuesday's speech, Bush appealed to Congress to give his strategy "a chance to work."

Focusing his remarks on energy and never mentioning the Iraq war Wednesday, Bush said alternatives to imported oil are not only essential to the economy and the environment, they are important to protecting national security. "If you're dependent on oil overseas … and a regime hostile to the United States produces that oil, you become vulnerable," he said.

Bush noted that in a global economy, dependence on oil imports has a pocketbook effect: "The more dependent we are … the more likely it is that somebody else's demand is going to affect what you pay at the pump for gasoline."

Bush continues his campaign to sell his State of the Union ideas today in Lee's Summit, Mo., where he will discuss his plan for granting tax deductions for health insurance. Bush also plans a speech on the economy next week in advance of releasing his 2008 budget plan Feb. 5.

"The American people remain concerned about the situation in Iraq, as is the president," White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said. "But issues like health care, education and driving your car touch the lives of every American."

"We got a lot of wind — particularly in Washington," Bush said jokingly.

Michele Riley, a human resources coordinator at DuPont, said she supports Bush's domestic agenda but noted he faces combative Democrats and an unpopular war.

"It makes it difficult," Riley said. She said she didn't sense much "warmth" from congressional Democrats toward Bush.

Vivian Adams of Wilmington, who owns a swimming school, said she agrees with Bush on energy and immigration, but "I'm not sure about the Iraq war."

She agreed cooperation from Democrats would be essential to Bush's success.

Bush's speech Tuesday was watched by more people than his address in 2006: 45,486,000 viewers vs. 41,699,000, according to preliminary figures from Nielsen Media Research.

The president returned to the White House in the afternoon to meet with Army Gen. Dan McNeil, the incoming commander for the NATO-led forces in Afghanistan. Bush also hosted his annual meeting with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the leaders of the military's combat commands.

Bush Calls For Cleaner Federal Vehicles (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Janet Wilson

WILMINGTON, DEL. — President Bush ordered the federal government Wednesday to move toward purchasing hybrid-powered vehicles and reducing the federal fleet's petroleum consumption by 2% each year, part of an effort to boost alternatives to gasoline.

Bush announced the executive order during a morning devoted to promoting new-technology fuels. In his State of the Union address Tuesday night, he set a goal of reducing the nation's gasoline consumption by 20% over 10 years, mainly by boosting ethanol production and toughening mileage standards for cars and light trucks.

In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's senior environment and energy advisors said they had major concerns about Bush's strategy — saying his proposals to increase the use of alternative fuels could sharply increase greenhouse gas emissions by opening the door to heavily polluting oil shale, tar sands and coal.

They also worried about California's low-carbon fuel policy being preempted by federal proposals.

While emphasizing that they were still studying Bush's plans, California Environmental Protection Agency Secretary Linda S. Adams, California Air Resources Board Chairman Robert F. Sawyer and other officials said that the state's program for reducing the use of traditional fuels does not call for increased use of any particular alternative fuel, such as ethanol. Instead, they said, it lets the market decide if ethanol, plug-in or hybrid vehicles or other biofuels should be used to reach the state's goals.

Sawyer said that, depending on how it's produced, ethanol can have either a negligible or a very substantial effect on greenhouse gas emissions. Other fuels could be even worse, he said.

"We're concerned some of the alternatives, such as tar sands, coal and oil shale — these sources of alternative fuels can increase [greenhouse gas] emissions as much as a factor of two over petroleum. So, we view that as a very negative direction to go in," Sawyer said.

Adams and Dan Skopec, undersecretary of the state EPA, expressed concern that existing federal renewable fuels mandates on refineries, combined with Bush's new policies, could be implemented in ways that would preempt California's landmark greenhouse gas law, which requires a 25% reduction of greenhouse gas emissions by 2020.

"It will potentially be problematic, and of course it depends on what the president proposes, and what Congress chooses to act on. So, the devil will be in the details on this issue of renewable fuels," Skopec said.

In Delaware, Bush toured a research center at DuPont, the international chemical company. Scientists there are working to develop cellulosic ethanol, a fuel brewed from various forms of vegetative growth — woodchips, weed-like switch grass and corn stalks, for example, rather than the corn kernels that are now used to produce ethanol.

Bush said he was directing the government to purchase plug-in hybrid vehicles, if they become commercially available, and to purchase other hybrid and flexible-fuel vehicles that can use ethanol.

Bush also urged pressing ahead with the revitalization of the nation's nuclear power industry, and with offshore drilling for deep pockets of gas, which he said could be conducted in an "environmentally friendly way." Nuclear energy, he said, is "going to be good for your children. It's going to make us less dependent on natural gas from overseas, and it's going to make us better stewards of the environment."

Bush Calls Biofuels "An Opportunity" (DELNJ)

By Jeff Montgomery

Delaware News Journal, January 25, 2007

President Bush followed his State of the Union call for expanded use of biofuels with a speech today at the Hotel DuPont in Wilmington on what he described as "an interesting opportunity for our country"

Dependence on oil, Bush said, creates both a national security problem for the country and environmental concerns.

"We can get beyond the pre-Kyoto era with a post-Kyoto strategy, the center of which is new technologies," Bush said during the first minutes of his speech, referring to the international push to reduce emissions of heat-trapping greenhouse gases linked to global climate change. The treaty was never endorsed by the White House.

Bush thanked DuPont workers, saying they are "really putting this country on the leading edge of technological change."

"At this company you've got 2,500 scientists, some of the smartest people in the country working here, all trying to develop new technology to help us solve this problem."

More than 1,200 DuPont employees and other guests piled into the hotel's auditorium for the address, some arriving hours ahead of his arrival. The President was flanked by about 50 DuPont scientists and researchers seated on two bleachers, and standing in front of a projected banner that read: "Strengthening America's Future."

The remarks came hours after Bush called for a rapid increase in the use of alternative fuels, including the type of ethanol fuels that DuPont hopes to commercialize. Bush said that the nation should replace about 20 percent during the next 10 years.

Earlier today, in a tour at the Experimental Station greenhouse in Alapocas with DuPont CEO Charles O. Holliday and U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, Bush was shown jars of bio-butanol and cellulosic ethanol, two alternative fuels that DuPont is working on producing for the mass market.

Unlike the ethanol currently available on the market which is produced from corn kernels, cellulosic ethanol can be derived from corn stover, wood chips and switchgrass, among other things.

Bush spent the first 15 minutes of his address focusing on other energy sources, and made a call for increased use of nuclear power," a source that he described as clean and essential for the country's development of energy independence.

"This is a reality, this is something we can live by," Bush said after touring DuPont's Experimental Station and viewing biofuels research work. "I was incredibly encouraged by what I saw."

Battle Lines Drawn On Fuel Economy (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Transportation Secretary Mary Peters said yesterday that Bush would oppose attempts by Congress to raise fuel-efficiency standards if its approach differs from the administration's. On Tuesday, Bush called for changing standards to reach a goal of saving 8.5 billion gallons of gasoline in 2017. Scientists say Bush's plan would require automakers to lift overall fuel efficiency to 34 miles per gallon, from 24 mpg today.

Lawmakers from both parties are beginning to push for stronger action, including Sens. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii) and Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.). Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) has introduced legislation to increase the passenger-car standard to 40 mpg. The government's average fuel-economy standard for passenger cars has been 27.5 mpg since the 1980s.

Peters said Bush wants to change how the government regulates fuel economy for passenger cars. Currently, Congress sets standards for cars while the administration sets them for trucks and sport-utility vehicles. Peters said Bush wants the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration to have power over passenger-car fuel standards.

NHTSA updated the fuel-efficiency standard for trucks last year, setting in motion an increase to 24 mpg in 2011 from 22.2 mpg this year. Environmentalists have complained that the increase was too small.

At the Washington Auto Show yesterday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) expressed hope that Congress and the administration would work out their differences. Asked whether there could be bipartisan legislation on fuel economy, she said "absolutely."

Auto executives are pressing the federal government for financial support for costly fuel-saving technologies.

In the Bush plan, Peters said, regulators would require that automakers improve fuel economy by 4 percent a year starting in 2010 for passenger cars and 4 percent a year for trucks and SUVs beginning in 2012. The plan would also give automakers the ability to buy and sell fuel-efficiency credits among themselves, though the details have not been worked out.

Sharp changes in fuel standards have encountered stiff opposition from the auto industry, which fears that they would cut into profits. The companies have outlined approaches similar to the Bush plan, which Peters called "the most friendly to Detroit."

U.S. automakers are trying to pull out of a deep slump after consumers fled to more-fuel-efficient vehicles when gasoline prices rose significantly. Some observers think the industry would benefit from making cars with better mileage -- even if that is forced upon it and increases costs.

"Raising fuel-economy standards will save auto jobs in the U.S.," said David Freidman, research director for the clean vehicles program at the Union of Concerned Scientists. "One of the biggest threats to auto-industry jobs besides poor management decisions is high gas prices."

Ethanol Industry Gets A Boost From Bush (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 25, 2007

At the State of the Union address Tuesday night, Don Endres relished the strange applause rituals, the pomp and ceremony, and even the dinner in the Capitol beforehand at which he rubbed elbows with leading lawmakers.

But most of all, Endres, the chief executive of the nation's second-largest ethanol maker, relished President Bush's message: that the government should sharply raise the mandate for ethanol use in motor fuels, setting a floor for alternative and renewable fuel use in 2017 that is equal to seven times the current ethanol output.

That is good news for Endres's company, VeraSun Energy, which will nearly triple its capacity by the end of 2008, to 670 million gallons a year from 230 million. VeraSun's shares soared this week. Even after profit-taking by investors yesterday, VeraSun closed at $17.49 a share, up 5 percent since Friday's close.

Endres owns 41.7 percent of the company, which went public in June and has a market capitalization of $1.35 billion. He raised seed money by building and selling companies in the debit card, electronic equipment and Internet payment businesses. Only Archer Daniels Midland, with more than 1 billion gallons a year of ethanol capacity and half again as much on the way, is bigger than VeraSun.

Not everyone thinks Bush's speech is good news. Oil refiners complain about mandates telling them how to blend fuels. Critics of Bush's proposal say it will be impossible to hit the proposed requirement of 35 billion gallons a year by 2017 because the main renewable fuel used now, ethanol made from corn, is already driving up corn prices and will use much or all of the U.S. corn harvest. And technology for producing "cellulosic" ethanol from other feedstocks, such as switch grass, has not been proved on a commercial scale yet.

Ethanol boosters are not counting on available technology, however. They are counting on new advances for making ethanol and continued government subsidies. A tax credit to refiners amounts to 51 cents per gallon of ethanol; without that credit, ethanol makers such as VeraSun, which earned about $1 a gallon in the second and third quarters last year, would have to slash prices to make their product economical.

"My grandfather grew 40 bushels of corn per acre," said Endres, who grew up on that farm in Watertown, S.D. "My father grew 80 bushels per acre. My brothers are getting 160 bushels an acre. Every generation, we double corn production per acre."

Endres says that in addition, more farmland could be devoted to growing corn, including a quarter of the land now used to grow soybeans.

Critics see this as ethanol in the sky, but the VeraSun chief executive also preaches another gospel: that technological advances will make ethanol manufacturing more efficient. "The industry is still in its infancy," Endres said, adding that refineries now get 20 to 30 percent more ethanol from the same amount of feedstock than five years ago.

The prospect of technological advances was promoted yesterday by Bush. After touring a DuPont research facility in Wilmington, Del., where scientists are developing methods for mass-producing ethanol made from cornstalks, switch grass and wood chips, Bush said he was confident that the technology was in place to meet his goals.

"I came wondering whether or not cellulosic ethanol was one of these things down the road that may be happening, may not, could end up being science or science fiction," Bush said. "It's going to be science." DuPont plans to open its first pilot plant to manufacture cellulosic ethanol by next year, and officials say they are confident that the fuel could hit the market two years after that, said Stephanie Jacobson, a public affairs official with DuPont.

Earlier in the day, Bush signed an executive order to reduce the federal government's use of gasoline, increase its use of alternative fuels and buy more flex-fuel vehicles.

Despite criticism from economists and oil refiners, Endres says government support for the ethanol industry is justified because of the need to reduce oil imports. "Why do we subsidize oil with double depreciation and royalty relief?" he said. Subsidies, he said, are a "proven practice, especially when dealing with matters that are strategic to the country."

With Bush's commitment to a new mandate for alternative motor fuels, companies like VeraSun are counting on continuing strong demand for corn ethanol. Endres says the industry will have to grow at the current breakneck pace for the next decade to meet Bush's goal.

"We think that once some of the laws are formulated it gets rid of some of the oversupply risk," said Jacques Rousseau, an energy analyst at Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group. "That was one of the things that had spooked some investors."

Investor enthusiasm for ethanol stocks is cooler than it was last summer, when VeraSun hit a high of $30.75 a share. As oil prices went down from peak levels and as corn prices skyrocketed to $4 a bushel, ethanol companies got squeezed. In November, Rousseau raised his estimate of 2007 corn prices and slashed his estimates of VeraSun earnings, though he still recommends the stock. "If we're going to need this much ethanol, we're going to need a lot of corn," he said.

Rousseau, who also follows major oil companies, noted that for all the hullabaloo about ethanol, "the whole ethanol industry is the size of one big oil refinery: It's still very small in the grand scheme of things." But he said that if oil prices drop and corn prices continue to rise, then some distilleries might get left on the drawing board.

"We built our business on $35 to $40 oil," Endres said. Crude oil yesterday closed at $55.37 a barrel. Endres said that even if oil prices sink, "we're convinced that we'll weather the storm."

Deck's Stacked Against Ethanol These Days (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

Even as President Bush called for new investment in corn-based ethanol in his State of the Union address, many investors trying to cash in on the gold rush in ethanol are coming away with husks.

Rising corn prices, aggressive building of new plants and falling gasoline prices have so far thwarted the easy money investors expected. The disappointment continued Wednesday, even after Bush's positive mention Tuesday night, when shares of all the major publicly traded ethanol companies sold off.

Shares of Aventine Renewable Energy, Pacific Ethanol, VeraSun and Archer Daniels Midland suffered losses ranging from 2% to more than 7% as traders who had jumped into the stocks ahead of the president's speech bailed out. And that's added more pain to some brutal dot-com style losses the stocks have suffered since last year.

Investors and traders have lost their enthusiasm for ethanol due to:

•Economic reality. The beauty of ethanol was that cheap corn could be turned into expensive gasoline. But prices of corn, the biggest raw material of ethanol, have been soaring, says Francis Gaskins of IPOdesktop.com. "Corn is not a free commodity," he says. "It's not as economical as people think."

Meanwhile, oil prices have been plummeting. The price of a barrel of crude is down 9.3% this year and 28.1% off its high.

When oil prices fall, it makes the push for ethanol and other alternative energy less urgent. "Cheap oil could certainly slow things. At some point it's not economical to build the plants," says Jonathan Lichter of Sidoti. Oil must be above $40 a barrel for ethanol to make economic sense, says Jason Henderson of the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City.

•Surge of competition. There's a race to produce ethanol, and it's unclear if that'll drive corn prices even higher. There are currently 111 refineries generating a total of 5.4 billion gallons of ethanol a year, says Renewable Fuels Association. That capacity will double to 11.7 billion gallons once the 75 new plants and eight expansions now in construction are completed. That's just the start: Bush on Tuesday called for the production of 35 billion gallons of alternative fuel a year by 2017.

There's simply not enough corn to meet that goal, Lichter says. That'll force ethanol producers to try turning corn waste or grass into ethanol, a process that's even more difficult than using corn.

Such worries have made ethanol investing stomach-churning. Shares of the major ethanol stocks are down 49%, on average, from their 52-week highs.

But there's a kernel of truth in the ethanol boom. Despite short-term issues, the nation will seek new energy sources, and ethanol is the leading candidate, says Paul Resnik, analyst at Dutton Associates.

"There's still room for growth for ethanol," he says. "These companies will do well over the long haul."

By John D. McKinnon, Mike Spector

DOJ_NMG_0121373

President Bush's broad new proposals to change the nation's health-care and energy policies have an important but little-noticed common thread: White House aides hope they will boost the ailing American auto industry, whose pleas for help have largely been ignored by Washington in recent years.

The question now is how much chance those hopes have of becoming reality, particularly with the Democratic majority in Congress controlling the fate of Mr. Bush's agenda.

The energy proposals -- crafted in a way that would erase some of the advantages enjoyed by the U.S. industry's Japanese competitors -- appear to have a shot at becoming law. The health program, which critics say could help auto companies but hurt auto workers, seems unlikely to gain traction anytime soon.

One thing is certain, however. No industry would be directly affected more than the auto sector by the domestic program the president laid out in Tuesday night's State of the Union address. "The president obviously recognizes some of the challenges the domestic auto makers have been facing," Joel Kaplan, a White House deputy chief of staff, told reporters in advance of the speech.

Still, industry executives, whose calls for aid have been spurned repeatedly by the Bush administration, cautioned that any benefit Detroit derived from the proposals would depend on how the final rules were drafted and how they were implemented.

"We agree with the president in that there's a clear need to cut America's dependence on foreign oil. However, it's our belief the decision should be one of customer choice," said David Elshoff, a spokesman for DaimlerChrysler AG. The president's health-care proposal, Mr. Elshoff added, "clearly addresses the uninsured and the underinsured. But it doesn't address the need to level the playing field for companies who have made the commitment to provide health care for their employees."

While Mr. Bush used Tuesday night's speech to tout the overall health of the economy, Democrats were quick to point out Americans' widespread anxiety about the security of their jobs and benefits, fears heightened by the struggles of many U.S. manufacturers, particularly auto makers.

With their U.S. operations in the red, General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. have eliminated a total of more than 70,000 jobs during the past year -- largely through employee buyouts -- and plan to close more than two dozen North American factories between them as they shrink to adapt to declining U.S. sales.

Japan's Toyota Motor Corp., meanwhile, is on track to overtake Ford as the No. 2 auto maker in the U.S., perhaps as early as this year, and is gunning to replace GM as the world's leading auto maker shortly thereafter. DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group, which previously appeared healthier than its two Detroit rivals, is now in the red, too. Next month it is expected to roll out a restructuring plan calling for plant closings and job cuts.

Though many factors have contributed to the industry's woes, soaring health-care costs are a big part of the problem. The Detroit giants are paying the price for years of buying labor peace by agreeing to provide rich health-care and other benefits to their unionized workers. GM, for example, has said its health-care costs average as much as $1,200 for each car it sells in the U.S.

At a White House meeting with Mr. Bush in mid-November, chief executives of the Big Three auto makers made a special plea for help controlling runaway health-care costs. White House officials said this week that Mr. Bush's proposal would do that.

"In general, anything that can reduce the cost of health care is positive for the industry," said David Cole, head of the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, Mich.

Mr. Bush's chosen method for promoting wider health coverage, however, could hurt some employees -- like auto workers -- who get especially generous health benefits from their employers. And that reduces the chance of Congress enacting his proposal.

The Bush proposal would tax the value of employer-provided health benefits in excess of $15,000, and give tax breaks to people with less-generous plans. The administration says most workers would get a tax break under the plan. But because some union policies are worth more than $15,000, those workers would face a tax increase.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow, a Michigan Democrat re-elected in November with strong backing from the United Auto Workers, said in an interview that the Bush plan would "tax health-care benefits for middle-class families....It's absolutely the wrong direction for them to go."

Alan Reuther, legislative director for the UAW, said the plan also could encourage younger workers to desert employer-provided plans, leaving them with older and sicker people to cover.

In addition to the toll taken by health-care costs, the Big Three have lost ground to Japanese rivals, especially as demand for more-fuel-efficient cars has grown in recent years. The Bush energy proposals could tip the balance more in Detroit's favor.

One way is through the proposed reform of fuel-economy rules. Under the current Corporate Average Fuel Economy, or CAFE, system, auto makers need to meet a fleetwide minimum average requirement of 22.2 miles per gallon for light trucks and 27.5 miles per gallon for passenger cars sold in the U.S. That means that companies selling larger, less fuel-efficient cars need to sell more small, fuel-efficient cars to bring up their average.

Detroit auto makers, whose big cars are more profitable and competitive than their small cars, say the current system handicaps them against Toyota and Honda Motor Co., which have sold more-fuel-efficient fleets in the past and can use credits amassed under the system to offset less efficient, larger vehicles.

The president's plan would make a significant change in the way passenger-car fuel economy is regulated, and one much desired by the Big Three. The new system would assign fuel-economy targets to car models based on their size, instead of mandating a fleetwide average. A car like the full-size Chevrolet Impala, for example, would be required to meet the standard for its size class. Such a change has already been adopted for light trucks. Depending on how the rules were written, the change could give Detroit more freedom to sell its more-profitable lower-mileage cars without having to rev up sales of smaller less-profitable models.

The UAW may oppose that change, however. Union leaders argue that the current laws encourage Detroit to make small cars in the U.S. Absent the fleetwide rule, they fear those small-car factories would close.

One uncertainty for auto makers is how much the administration might increase fuel-efficiency standards as it overhauls them. "The key for us is we're going to have to see the details and how it all flushes out," said Paul Ballew, GM's top market analyst. "It's one thing to go to categories. It's another thing to go to categories and change the standard."

Another White House priority -- a huge increase in federally mandated use of alternative fuels like ethanol -- could also be a boost for American auto companies. While Japanese companies dominate the market for fuel-efficient hybrids, the Big Three think they would gain an advantage if broader ethanol use became the preferred approach to reducing the nation's gasoline consumption. American companies, unlike their Japanese rivals, have long experience with building ethanol-burning engines in places like Brazil, and already sell more ethanol-capable "flex fuel" vehicles in the U.S.

In response to Mr. Bush's address, Ford's group vice president for corporate affairs, Ziad Ojakli, said in a statement: "Ford supports reducing gasoline usage through an increase in alternative fuels such as ethanol. We have produced almost two million flex-fuel vehicles, with ethanol capability. In addition, we have announced plans to make half our annual vehicle production flexible fuel vehicle capable by 2012."

Boosting ethanol is politically popular with both Democrats and Republicans, particularly in farm states. But technical hurdles remain to mass distribution. "One key component that needs to be considered is infrastructure," a GM spokesman said. "What are the incentives to increase both storage and availability of pumps?"

At an appearance at a DuPont Co. research facility in Delaware yesterday, Mr. Bush also appeared to promise more federal funds for research to improve another technology -- the batteries that help power hybrid vehicles, a top priority of U.S. auto makers, who lag behind their Japanese rivals in that area.

Bush Welcomed To Climate Debate (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

It was overlooked by Beltway pundits and ignored in the Democratic rebuttal, but President Bush's brief State of the Union comments on "the serious challenge of global climate change" sparked sharp interest, comment and criticism around the globe.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, United Nations global-warming chief Yvo de Boer and senior business leaders at the posh annual gathering in Davos, Switzerland, all seized on Mr. Bush's Tuesday night remarks on energy, oil and the environment as a sign that the United States has a new appreciation for the problem.

"I do believe that this whole debate is now moving in a completely different and more positive direction," Mr. Blair told the House of Commons yesterday. Mr. Blair has pushed a reluctant Washington to move the issues of climate change, global warming and greenhouse gases to the center of its foreign-policy agenda.

Mr. de Boer, speaking to reporters on a trip to Tokyo, called the energy-conservation measures outlined by Mr. Bush in his address "very encouraging," saying it was significant that the president linked his policies for the first time to the climate-change issue.

Mr. Bush "has put the actions he intends to take in the context of confronting the serious -- and he used the word 'serious' -- global challenge of climate changes," Mr. de Boer said.

Advance word Tuesday of the president's plan to double the size of the U.S. strategic petroleum reserve -- to be tapped in times of crisis -- sparked the sharpest one-day increase in world oil prices since mid-2005, up nearly 5 percent to $55.

Mr. Bush devoted the largest single portion of his address to the war in Iraq.

There is virtually no expectation the U.S. government will reverse course and embrace the binding caps on greenhouse-gas emissions contained in the Kyoto Protocol. One of Mr. Bush's first actions as president in 2001 was to pull out of the Kyoto pact, citing its harmful impact on the economy and the lack of caps for developing countries such as China.

But on the day when former Vice President Al Gore, Mr. Bush's opponent in the 2000 presidential race, picked up two Oscar nominations for his documentary on global warming, Mr. Bush announced steps to cut U.S. energy use, slow the production of greenhouse gases and reduce U.S. dependence of foreign oil suppliers.

James Cameron is chief executive of London-based Climate Change Capital, an investment bank that invests in environmental projects and technologies. He told the World Economic Forum in Davos that Mr. Bush's remarks could be a major turning point in the debate on global warming.

"If the U.S. is moving in that direction, it's a tremendous realignment with the rest of the world and should make it easier to get international agreement on climate change following the end of the Kyoto Protocol," he said, according to the Associated Press.

Mr. de Boer, executive secretary of the U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change, also said that U.S. participation is critical if a new global-warming pact is to succeed.

"I think it makes no sense whatsoever trying to address the question of climate change without the active participation from the United States," he said. "The United States accounts for about 25 percent of global emissions."

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change will release a new study early next month that reportedly includes its gloomiest forecast to date. The U.N. study asserts that greenhouse gases are at their highest levels in 650,000 years, with soaring risks over the next century of droughts, floods and other climate-related disasters.

Foreign environmental groups criticized Mr. Bush's proposals as inadequate, even as they credited him with raising the issue of climate change at all.

"He is diluting the issue by talking in terms of cutting the United States' oil dependency, rather than in terms of the serious environmental consequences," said K. Srinivas, a global-warming activist for Greenpeace India, at the Davos gathering.

Merkel Calls For Challenging Emissions Controls (FT)

By Chris Giles And Gillian Tett

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

The twin demands of action to prevent climate change and enhance energy security requires Europe to commit to challenging mandatory controls on greenhouse gasses after 2012, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, said on Wednesday. VIDEO: Davos

Lord Levene warns that weather-related catastrophes could cause up to $100bn losses

In a marked contrast to George Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday, when he set an ambition to reduce gasoline usage in the US by 20 per cent over the next 10 years, Ms Merkel said she welcomed the opportunity for the European Union to "offer a [greenhouse gas] reduction target of 30 per cent, but we expect other large emitters to participate in that".

With the US still refusing to set a mandatory limit on its emissions, the transatlantic differences remain wide, even though Ms Merkel welcomed the moves made by President Bush.

Climate change is at the top of the agenda for business leaders at the world economic forum at Davos. In rhetoric at least, business leaders in the Swiss ski resort were far closer to the German chancellor's position, wanting certainty and expecting stronger action on climate change than that of Mr Bush.

Alain Belda, chief executive of Alcoa, the aluminium company, for example, said it was untenable for the US climate change agenda to be set by individual states. "I think the country needs one rule," he said.

In another interactive session, 71 per cent of delegates voted against a proposal that markets and voluntary actions were superior in reducing carbon emissions and insisted the motivation for action had to come from government.

Separately, both Lord Levene, chairman of the Lloyd's insurance syndicate, and Jacques Aigrain, chief executive officer of Swiss Re, welcomed the comments by President Bush about climate change but called for more action.

"The fact that there is a recognition that the concern [about climate change] is valid... and a debate about solutions is extremely encouraging," said Mr Aigrain.

"Climate change is the big theme that everyone is talking about here in Davos and that is welcome," said Lord Levene.

Climate change is already forcing the insurance industry to prepare itself for rising losses as a result of increasingly costly natural disasters, Lord Levene warned.

Indeed, in recent months Lloyd's has started conducting behind-the-scenes scenario planning for weather-related catastrophes that could cause up to $100bn losses - such as a major hurricane hitting the wealthiest parts of the American East Coast.

This would be significantly bigger than the record $80bn losses that the industry suffered in 2005, as a result of storms such as Hurricane Katrina.

"People ask who might bear the cost of climate change but the fact is that insurance sector is already bearing real costs," Lord Levene said. "The real problem is that we just don't know what is happening anymore," he added, pointing out that the biggest challenge for the industry was the rising volatility of weather patterns.

In an effort to protect itself, the insurance industry has already started raising premiums for customers in potentially vulnerable sectors, such as housing on the US East Coast.

However, this move is now triggering rising protests from consumers – particularly given the benign conditions last year – and concerns about the issue this week prompted the state of Florida to create an additional fund for catastrophe reinsurance using taxpayers money, in the first such move seen in the US.

Whitman: Bush Missed Chance (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 25, 2007

Former Environmental Protection Agency chief Christine Todd Whitman said President Bush missed the "perfect opening" to call for a cap on greenhouse gas emissions in his State of the Union address Tuesday night.

While such a move would have represented a major policy shift for the administration, Whitman said she had hoped the fact that 10 major American companies called for a cap earlier this week would have provided sufficient political cover.

Those companies, which include General Electric, DuPont and Alcoa, joined four non-profit groups that have advocated for limits on emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases to form the U.S. Climate Action Partnership. The group backs government-imposed limits on greenhouse gas emissions, but is not backing a specific policy proposal.

In the days preceding the State of the Union, a rumor circulated that Bush might change course, but Press Secretary Tony Snow denied that would happen.

While Bush did not call for a carbon cap, Whitman, who as EPA director often butted heads with White House officials over the need to address global warming, credited her former boss for acknowledging the climate was changing in his State of the Union address Tuesday night. The president called global climate change a "serious challenge."

"That's not insignificant," Whitman said, given how carefully the speech is vetted.

The slight concession in Bush's speech, along with recent comments from the Council on Environment Quality Chairman James Connaughton, seem to suggest the White House is willing to work with Capitol Hill on global-warming bills and leaves Whitman "more and more hopeful" that a greenhouse gas emissions measure could be passed.

Support from big business and some evangelical groups may put the White House in a "position to accept a cap on carbon," if not actively push for one, Whitman said.

Whitman, who was governor of New Jersey prior to joining the Bush administration, now heads a coalition with a Greenpeace founder, Patrick Moore, that is pushing for further development of nuclear power. The group is called Clean and Safe Energy, or CASEnergy.

Nuclear power plants do not produce greenhouse gases, and any carbon cap likely would benefit the nuclear-power industry. The process of using nuclear power to produce electricity does leave radioactive spent fuel rods. A permanent repository in Yucca Mountain in Nevada is still in development.

Environmental groups such as the Natural Resources Defense Council, a member of the U.S. Climate Partnership, continue to resist governmental policies that encourage development of nuclear power, which could complicate efforts to pass a greenhouse gas emissions cap.

But Whitman said she has noticed a shift here, too. More environmental groups, while not yet accepting of nuclear power, seem more amenable to compromise.

"They are willing to talk. They haven't been in the past," she said.

Energy Rhetoric, And Reality (NYT)

New York Times, January 25, 2007

For six years, off and on, President Bush has been talking about the need for alternative fuels and conservation to make the country less beholden to unreliable sources of foreign oil. Yet all he has to show for it is a growing dependence on foreign oil, a growing climate problem and an increasingly cynical public. Mr. Bush talked the same game on Tuesday night, offering several impressively specific goals. But whether these new pledges turn out to be as empty as the old ones depends on his capacity for follow-through, and history is not encouraging.

Mr. Bush was true to form on one subject. The White House had promised nothing on global warming, and he delivered nothing. He mentioned “global climate change” but showed no sense of urgency on the issue. Nor was there any sign that he had even heard the ever-louder entreaties from Congress — and from many of his friends in the business community — that he support a national program of mandatory reductions in greenhouse gases.

At one point, he did suggest that his proposals for alternative fuels and more efficient automobiles could also help reduce greenhouse gases. But these gains would be marginal — passenger vehicles account for only one-fifth of these gases. And even these gains will greatly depend on what alternative fuels are chosen.

Mr. Bush’s enthusiasms mainly involved energy independence. He called for replacing 35 billion gallons of gasoline with renewable or alternative fuels by 2017, and for modest but steady improvements in the efficiency of cars and light trucks, a category that includes S.U.V.’s.

But he offered no specifics on where these 35 billion gallons in alternative fuels are going to come from. Corn ethanol, a favorite of farm state politicians, cannot be expected to provide more than 15 billion gallons without driving up food prices. Cellulosic ethanol, made from grasses and woody material, shows great promise. But there is no commercial refinery in operation today, and there is not expected to be one for several years. Hydrogen, a longtime Bush favorite, is even further down the road.

That leaves gasoline derived from coal, a method now being championed by governors and senators from coal-producing states. The technology is well established. But refining and then burning a gallon of gasoline derived from coal would send nearly twice as much carbon dioxide into the atmosphere as a conventional gallon of gasoline and would thus be a disaster for global warming. Trying to sequester the carbon dioxide underground during the refining process would be hugely expensive.

Which raises the next question about the Bush plan: Where’s the money coming from? Despite growing interest among venture capitalists in environmentally friendly technologies, it seems unrealistic to depend on the private sector alone. Washington must help. But federal research and development spending on energy has been in free fall for more than 20 years. And even after Mr. Bush made a big deal about cellulosic ethanol in last year’s address, he came up with only about $30 million in new money to help move the technology forward.

Once again, we have heard this president make big promises about energy independence. Once again, we fear that very little will change. It would be nice, for once, to be surprised.

IT DOESN'T TAKE MUCH to get a standing ovation during the State of the Union address. One of President Bush's crowd-pleasers on Tuesday was a new energy policy designed to show his environmental side. It deserved no more than a golf clap. Nice putt, Mr. President. Too bad it took you 10 strokes to reach the green.

Bush's rigid attitude toward climate change is beginning to thaw, though not quite as fast as the polar ice caps. His ideas for reducing oil consumption were tougher than anything he's offered before, and his mandate for 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels by 2017 was a nice gesture. But his plan does much too little to make a dent in the carbon emissions that are fueling global warming.

Beyond the politically painless ritual of calling for more production of ethanol and other alternative fuels, it was mostly a rehash of past half-measures. And for the president to say he wants to step up oil production in "environmentally sensitive ways" by drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge indicates that he still doesn't understand the meaning of the phrase.

What's worrisome about the president's embrace of alternative fuels is that his policy fails to mention their comparative cleanliness. It's worth noting that "alternative" fuels are not the same as "renewable" ones; the former includes coal, which from a carbon-emissions standpoint is disastrous. Focusing on reducing oil consumption while ignoring emissions could do more environmental harm than good.

Another key Bush proposal is tightening vehicle fuel standards, a marvelous idea considering they haven't been improved in 20 years. But the president's approach is misguided. Currently, the average fuel economy of an automaker's entire passenger-car fleet has to be at least 27.5 miles per gallon. Rather than boost that standard, Bush wants to tie fuel economy improvements to a vehicle's weight class.

The Senate has a better solution. A bill introduced Monday would increase the average fuel economy standard by 10 mpg by the 2019 model year, setting the kind of target that will require prompt and significant change in Detroit.

Meanwhile, California's two Democratic senators, Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein, are backing competing bills aimed at reducing greenhouse gases. Feinstein's could stand to be tougher; it might let California power generators emit more than they could under state law. And Boxer should reconsider her unrealistic call for a whopping 80% reduction in greenhouse gas emissions from 1990 levels by 2050.

Still, in general the senators' approaches make more sense, environmentally and politically, than anything the president described Tuesday night. Somewhere in between their two bills — and outside the president's initiatives — lies a policy that can help the U.S. become both more efficient and independent.

Environmentalists Angry As Navy Gets OK To Use Sonar (FINDLAW/AP)

By Audrey Mcavoy, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2007

(AP) - HONOLULU-Angering environmentalists, the U.S. Defense Department exempted the Navy from complying with the Marine Mammal Protection Act for the next two years so sailors can practice tracking submarines with sonar.

Environmentalists on Tuesday said the Navy was not doing enough to protect whales, dolphins and other marine mammals from the harmful effects of the underwater sound technology.

Navy officials said they need the exemption, allowed for under the 2004 National Defense Authorization Act, to give them enough time to conduct environmental impact statements for sonar use at major underwater training ranges off Hawaii, southern California and the East Coast.

"We cannot stop training for the next two years," Don Schregardus, deputy assistant secretary of the Navy for the environment, told reporters. "That would put our sailors in the Navy at considerable risk."

Sailors use active sonar by pumping sound waves through the ocean and listening to the echo as it bounces off objects. Navy leaders have made practicing sonar techniques a top priority as other nations have bought more advanced diesel submarines, which are quieter than earlier models and harder to find.

But environmentalists cite incidents of marine mammals that have died or been stranded en masse on beaches after being exposed to sonar.

The Natural Resources Defense Council is suing the Navy in an attempt to force it to adopt more aggressive protection measures for marine mammals.

"The Navy has more than enough room in the oceans to train effectively without injuring or killing endangered whales and other marine species," Joel Reynolds, the organization's senior attorney, said in a statement. "Because the Navy trains with this dangerous technology in some of the richest underwater habitat on earth, it is legally obligated to take simple, commonsense steps to protect marine life."

The Navy says the new exemption will allow sailors to go ahead with 40 separate exercises over the next two years.

Cara Horowitz, another lawyer for the Natural Resources Defense Council, said the Navy could adopt a larger safety zone around its ships, reduce the power of sonar at night when marine mammal are harder to see, and avoid training in rich marine mammal habitats.

The Navy has argued there is not enough scientific evidence to mandate all the measures the council and other groups are demanding.

Court Rejects Senator's Bid To Eliminate Fish Agency (WP)

By Blaine Harden

SEATTLE, Jan. 24 -- In a slap at the power of a single U.S. senator to change federal policy, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit struck down today an attempt by Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) to eliminate a small agency that counts endangered salmon in the Columbia River.

Craig tried to eliminate all funding in 2005 for the Fish Passage Center, which is based in Portland, Ore., and has 12 employees, because he said its data were "cloaked in advocacy."

The Fish Passage Center has documented how the federal Columbia-Snake River hydroelectric system has killed salmon and pushed several species to the brink of extinction. It is a primary source of information for the federal judge who oversees the protection of endangered salmon in the Columbia, as well as for fish agencies in Oregon, Washington and Idaho.

Craig, who has received large campaign donations from the hydroelectric industry, has long regarded the center and its findings as suspect. He inserted a sentence in a spending bill that directed the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA), which sells power generated by federal dams, to stop funding the center, which has a $1.3 million budget.

The San Francisco-based appeals court said that the BPA "acted contrary to law in concluding that the congressional committee report language carried the force of law." It ordered the BPA to honor its contractual agreements to provide money to the center.

Through a spokesman, Craig said he was "disappointed" with the decision. He added that the implication that report language in a spending bill carries no weight with funded agencies "completely disrupts decades of congressional oversight and direction."

19 Arrested In Federal 'Ragdoll' Investigation (FRHN)

By By:John Moss, Herald News Staff Reporter

Fall River Herald News, January 25, 2007

FALL RIVER - Nineteen people have been charged in a multi-state drug trafficking ring in which the lead target of the federal investigation ran a drug distribution operation based in this city.

Seized in the investigation, in which four others from this city were charged, were several kilograms of cocaine allegedly sent through U.S. Mail.

Kevin J. O'Connor, U.S. Attorney for the District of Connecticut, announced Wednesday that a federal grand jury, sitting in Hartford, returned an eight-count indictment, charging the suspects with various narcotics offenses, involving the large-scale distribution of cocaine and heroin in Hartford, Bridgeport, Conn., Fall River, and other northeastern cities.

The indictment was returned June 29, 2006, and remained sealed to allow for the arrests. The case was subsequently unsealed, and, earlier this month, two of the remaining three fugitives were arrested. To date, 18 of the 19 charged have been arrested. Two of them have pleaded guilty.

The charges stem from an Organized Crime and Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation, dubbed "Operation Ragdoll," which was spearheaded by the Drug Enforcement Administration in Hartford.

As alleged in the indictment, from January 2006 to June 20, 2006, the lead target of the investigation, Luis Joel Soto-Solivan, also known as "The 27," ran a drug trafficking operation based in Fall River, which supplied narcotics to various distributors in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania.

Alleged distributors include co-defendants, Samuel Martinez, also known as "Muelo" and "Sammy," in Hartford; Jimmy Valentin in Brockton; Andres Hernandez, also known as "El Pelu" and "Andy," in Rochester, N.Y., and Domingo Guzman, also known as "Mingo," in Bridgeport, Conn.

Also, Guzman allegedly operated his own drug trafficking network based in Bridgeport that supplied narcotics to various wholesale distributors in Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Pennsylvania, including co-defendants Soto-Solivan in Fall River; Banger Vergara, also known as "Valdil" and "Bangel," in Holyoke, and Marcos Rivas, also known as "El Negro," in Pennsylvania.

According to the indictment, Carmelo Rondon Feliciano, also known as "Panzon," of Puerto Rico, supplied Soto-Solivan and Domingo Guzman with quantities of heroin and cocaine. One method that Rondon Feliciano allegedly used to ship narcotics was to send them from Puerto Rico to the continental United States, using U.S. Postal Service Express Mail. The indictment alleges that, from February 2006 through June 20, 2006, Feliciano and other suppliers sent at least 15 Express Mail packages believed to contain controlled substances to Soto-Solivan and Domingo Guzman.

On June 1 and 15, law enforcement officers with the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service intercepted and seized two of the express mail packages. The June 1 package was sent to Soto-Solivan at 25B Pleasant View, and contained two separately-wrapped kilograms of cocaine, and about 250 grams of a non-narcotic, cutting agent commonly used as a dilutant with cocaine. The June 15 package was sent to Domingo Guzman in Bridgeport, and contained two separately-wrapped kilograms of cocaine.

The investigation involved the use of wiretaps on cellular telephones used by Soto-Solivan and Domingo Guzman, as well as the controlled purchase of various quantities of heroin and crack cocaine from both individuals.

The indictment charges the following defendants with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and distribution of, cocaine:

Soto-Solivan, 34, of 275 Old Colony St.; Guzman, 30, of Bridgeport; Aurea Casiano, 53, of Chicago; Edgardo Diaz, also known as "Galdy" and "Orejas," 33, of Puerto Rico; Rondon Feliciano of Puerto Rico; Moises Figueroa, also known as "Indio," of

Puerto Rico; Joel Guzman, 32, of Bridgeport; Andres Hernandez, also known as "El Pelu" and "Andy," 31, of Rochester, New York; Samuel Martinez, 30, of Hartford; Marcos Rivas, also known as "El Negro," Shirley Rivera, also known as "Sheila," 29, of Bridgeport, Conn.; Angel Santiago, also known as "Mambru," 34, of Pleasant View; Hector Santiago, also known as "Pito," 32, of Hartford; Joso Santiago, also known as "Neylom," 31, of Brockton; Angel Soto, 30, of 275 County St.; Wilmary Torres, 30, of 25B Pleasant View; Windy Torres, 27, of 7D Pleasant View; Jimmy Valentin, 29, of Brockton, and Vergara, 31, of Holyoke.

Also, a criminal forfeiture count seeks forfeiture of narcotics proceeds and items used to facilitate narcotics trafficking, including more than $100,000 in cash, and four motor vehicles with a collective value of more than $100,000.

The DEA in Connecticut arrested several suspects in June and July, and the DEA in Puerto Rico apprehended several in September and October. The DEA in Connecticut arrested Vergara in Massachusetts on Jan. 9, as he was appearing in state court to face trial on unrelated drug charges. Vergara was arraigned on the charge on Jan. 16 before U.S. Magistrate Judge Donna F. Martinez. After a detention hearing, Martinez entered an order detaining Vergara until trial.

On Jan 12, law enforcement officers in Chicago, served Casiano with the federal arrest warrant. She was arraigned on the charge Tuesday in New Haven, Conn., federal court. Casiano was released on bond pending trial.

Marcos Rivas is currently being sought by law enforcement.

As to Soto-Solivan, Domingo Guzman and Rondon Feliciano, the indictment charges that the conspiracy involved five kilograms or more of cocaine. If convicted, each faces a maximum term of life imprisonment, a mandatory minimum term of 10 years and a maximum fine of $4 million.

As to Hernandez, Martinez, Angel Santiago, Valentin, Diaz, Joel Guzman, Rivas and Vergara, the indictment charges that the conspiracy involved 500 grams or more of cocaine. If convicted, each faces a maximum of 40 years in prison, a mandatory minimum term of five years and a maximum fine of $2 million. As to Figuero, Jose Santiago, Soto, Wilmary Torres, Windy Torres, Casiano and Rivera, the indictment charges that the conspiracy involved a quantity of cocaine. If convicted, each defendant faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $1 million.

The indictment also charges Soto-Solivan, Domingo Guzman, Rondon Feliciano, Martinez, Hector Santiago and Vergara with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and distribution of, 100 grams or more of heroin. If convicted, each faces a maximum of 40 years in prison, a mandatory minimum term of five years and a maximum fine of $2 million.

In most cases, the filing of a second offender notice under the federal statute would double penalties.

The indictment also charges Soto-Solivan with three counts of distribution of heroin, which each carry a maximum of 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $1 million; and one count of distribution of 100 grams or more of heroin, which carries a maximum of 40 years imprisonment, a mandatory minimum term of five years and a maximum fine of $2 million.

Finally, the indictment charges Domingo Guzman with distribution of 50 grams or more of cocaine base ("crack cocaine"), which carries a maximum term of life in prison, a mandatory minimum term of 10 years, and a maximum fine of $4 million.

Last week, Jose Santiago pleaded guilty to a Substitute Information that charged him with using a communications facility to aid the conspiracy to distribute heroin. He is to be sentenced April 9, at which time Santiago faces a maximum of four years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

On Tuesday, Valentin pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute 500 grams or more of cocaine. Dorsey has set sentencing for April 12, at which time Valentin faces a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of five years, a maximum term of 40 years and a fine of up to $2 million.

As to the remaining defendants, O'Connor stressed that an indictment is only a charge and is not evidence of guilt. Each defendant is entitled to a fair trial.

O'Connor commended law enforcement agents and officers who conducted the investigation and praised their "devoted efforts to identify, disrupt and dismantle this substantial narcotics trafficking operation."

NFL Toughens Drug-testing Rules (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

After four months of negotiations, the league and union announces more extensive testing for performance-enhancing drugs and the addition of the blood-boosting substance EPO to its list of banned substances.

NEW YORK — The NFL is going deeper into the wallets of players who get caught using steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs.

After four months of sometimes intense negotiations, the league and union announced Wednesday more extensive testing for performance-enhancing drugs and the addition of the blood-boosting substance EPO to its list of banned substances.

The union also agreed that players suspended after testing positive will, for the first time, forfeit a portion of their signing bonuses in addition to the salary they will lose during their time away. That is significant because the signing bonuses often are the only guaranteed portion of a player's salary and can be larger than salaries, which sometimes are kept artificially low to keep the team under the salary cap.

"It is important that the NFL and its players continue to be leaders on the issue of illegal and dangerous performance-enhancing drugs in sports," NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell said. "These latest improvements will help ensure that we continue to have a strong and effective program. As we have done in the past, we will review and modify the policy on an ongoing basis."

In addition to the new test for EPO, the agreement includes an increase from seven to 10 of the number of players on each team randomly tested each week during the season for steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. That means there will be 12,000 tests each season, up from the current 10,000.

The new policy will make the NFL the only North American sports league to regularly test for EPO. Urine will be tested, not blood, for EPO. Baseball did a round of urine testing for EPO in 2005. Rob Manfred, MLB's executive vice president for labor relations, said Wednesday there were no positives among the 500 samples tested.

Baseball conducts urine tests of major and minor league players for performance-enhancing drugs and stimulants, with each player tested at least twice randomly per year. Baseball does not conduct blood tests and does not test for EPO or human growth hormone. Baseball and its players union have agreed they will test for HGH if a urine test for that drug is validated.

A baseball player who tests positive for steroids is banned for 50 games for a first violation. A player who tests positive for stimulants is required to undergo counseling for a first violation and is subject to at least six additional tests over the next year.

The NBA randomly tests players four times a season. Players who test positive for steroids or performance-enhancing drugs get a 10-game suspension for a first offense, a 25-game ban for a second offense, a one-year suspension for a third offense and disqualification if they're caught a fourth time.

In the NHL, every player is subject to up to two random tests a year. A first-time offender gets a 20-game suspension without pay and mandatory referral to the league's substance abuse program. A second positive test carries a 60-game suspension.

The NFL policy mandates a four-game suspension for a first steroids offense and a year for a second. Unlike its policy for street drugs such as marijuana or cocaine, for which there is no suspension until a second violation, a player who tests positive for steroids or a supplement is suspended for the first positive test.

The enhancements to the drug policy have been pending for almost six months — from about the time Goodell succeeded Paul Tagliabue as commissioner. The league and union began negotiating on additional tests and substances in September, but didn't reach agreement until this week.

"These changes show what sports leagues and their players' associations can accomplish when they set their minds to eradicating steroids from their sports," said Davis, who, as chairman of the Government Reform Committee in the last Congress led three hearings on steroid use among pro athletes.

"I especially want to commend the NFL which, out of all the sports leagues, has been the most consistent in its approach to testing and taking other steps to end steroid use among its athletes."

One provision of the new agreement increases the unpredictability of random testing during the season and off-season, making it harder for players using performance-enhancing substances to regulate their usage because they won't know when they might be tested.

EPO, which provides users more stamina by increasing their number of red blood cells, is used primarily by long-distance runners and cyclists. That testing will begin this summer when teams go to training camp.

The program also includes additional use of carbon isotope ratio testing on a random basis to detect for doses of testosterone. All players now will be subject to those tests, previously used only to confirm positive tests.

N.F.L. And Union To Strengthen Steroid Testing (NYT)

By Judy Battista

DOJ_NMG_0121382

The National Football League and its players union said yesterday that they had agreed to strengthen the league's testing program for performance-enhancing drugs, including increasing the number of tests and adding endurance-boosting EPO to the list of banned substances.

The new policy also adds financial penalties, with players who are suspended for drug use forfeiting part of their signing bonuses. Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the National Football League Players Association, said in an interview that as soon as next season, players who tested positive could also be barred from consideration for postseason awards. Such recognition became an issue during the regular season that ended last month when Shawne Merriman, a San Diego Chargers linebacker, was suspended for four games after a positive steroids test, but was named to the Pro Bowl.

The N.F.L. is considered to have the most stringent testing policy among the major American sports leagues. But loopholes in its program drew increasing scrutiny after The Charlotte Observer reported last summer that Carolina Panthers players had received prescriptions for steroids — including two players just days before the team played in the 2004 Super Bowl — yet none tested positive during that time period. The league and the union had been negotiating since September to strengthen the policy.

"These latest improvements will help ensure that we continue to have a strong and effective program," Roger Goodell, the N.F.L. commissioner, said in a statement. "As we have done in the past, we will review and modify the policy on an ongoing basis."

Under the policy changes announced yesterday, the number of players randomly tested each week during the preseason, regular season and postseason would increase to 10 from 7 per team. Last year, the N.F.L. increased the maximum number of times a player could be tested in the off-season to six times from two. Combined, those changes should amount to more than 12,000 drug tests administered to about 1,800 players next season, an increase of about 2,000 tests. Upshaw said that off-season testing would begin more quickly after the end of the regular season. That testing used to start in late March but will now begin in February to decrease the time period when players are not subjected to random testing.

The N.F.L. policy already mandates a four-game suspension for a first offense and a year suspension for a second, penalties that will remain in effect.

But the league will use the sophisticated carbon isotope test with greater frequency, it said. The use of that test has been limited in most drug-testing programs by its high price. It was previously used by the N.F.L. only to confirm positive tests. Now, the league will use it randomly on all samples. The test examines the atomic makeup of testosterone in the urine and can determine if it is natural or synthetic. It is the same test that found synthetic testosterone in a urine sample from Floyd Landis after his victory last summer in the Tour de France.

The N.F.L.'s decision to include EPO on its banned list adds a substance more common to cycling and long-distance running. EPO, or erythropoietin, is a synthetic hormone used to improve stamina by increasing the body's production of oxygen-rich red blood cells. No other professional sports league in the United States tests regularly for EPO.

The policy changes were praised yesterday by Dr. Gary I. Wadler, an associate professor of medicine at New York University who is a member of the World Anti-Doping Agency. But Wadler said in a telephone interview that the league still needed to include testing for human growth hormone, or HGH.

There is no reliable test for HGH. The N.F.L., pledged a minimum of $500,000 for the development of an HGH test yesterday. Wadler said that amount is a fraction of the millions of dollars the antidoping agency spent on research each year. Wadler said the league should have a provision in its collective-bargaining agreement that allowed for blood samples to be collected and frozen until a reliable drug test came to fruition. Blood collection, he said, would at least provide a deterrent to the use of HGH until a test was developed.

"They should at least have paved the way by saying that blood testing is an acceptable means of obtaining bodily fluid specimens," Wadler said. "They've made some moves in the right direction, but I don't think we should be in a position of incrementalism."

Upshaw remains adamant that blood testing is not open for discussion because there is no reliable HGH test. "I'm still not willing to have our players stuck like a pin cushion," Upshaw said. "What use would it be for you to find something out two or three years from now and we've already played games? We have 25 percent turnover each year. What good is that? It's almost like changing the speed-limit sign after you've passed."

NFL, Union Beef Up Drug Program (WP)

By Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The NFL and the players' union completed an agreement to strengthen the sport's steroid-testing program, they announced yesterday.

The modifications, which had been under discussion for months between Commissioner Roger Goodell and NFL Players Association chief Gene Upshaw, include an increase in the number of random tests to which players are subjected during the season, more extensive use of the sophisticated carbon isotope ratio test and the addition of the blood-boosting drug erythropoietin (EPO) to the list of banned substances.

"It is important that the NFL and its players continue to be leaders on the issue of illegal and dangerous performance-enhancing drugs in sports," Goodell said in a written statement released by the league. "These latest improvements will help ensure that we continue to have a strong and effective program. As we have done in the past, we will review and modify the policy on an ongoing basis."

The changes come near the end of a season in which one of the top defensive players, San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman, served a four-game suspension for testing positive for a performance-enhancing drug. Merriman and his representatives said he ingested the drug, nandrolone, unwittingly because it was in a supplement he was taking.

Saying the new policy had a number of flaws, anti-doping expert Gary Wadler criticized the NFL for continuing to "sidestep" a major issue: that it oversees and carries out its own program instead of turning the business over to an independent agency such as the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency.

"I think it moves a little bit in the right direction, but you need to go the full way," said Wadler, a member of the World Anti-Doping Agency's prohibited substances committee. "The NFL was a pacesetter in anti-doping before 1999, when the landscape changed. . . . They should be a pacesetter again.

"They cannot keep up with the science. That's not their business. Their business is putting on great championships like we had last weekend."

In this round of modifications, the two sides agreed to increase the number of random tests from seven players per team to 10 players per team each week during the preseason, regular season and playoffs. Under the existing terms of the policy, every player is tested during training camp and a player can be tested as many as six times during the offseason. A first positive test results in the player being suspended four games without pay. A second positive test results in an eight-game suspension and a third positive test brings a one-year suspension.

According to the league, all tests now will be subject to random carbon isotope ratio testing to detect low levels of testosterone. Previously, such testing was used only to confirm positive tests for testosterone. Testing for EPO, a drug used to stimulate the production of red blood cells and more commonly associated with endurance sports, is to begin this year in the spring or summer, the league announced.

The league also announced that it was forming a working group to study issues related to human growth hormone; that it had awarded a grant of at least $500,000 to the UCLA Olympic testing laboratory and other researchers working to develop new methods to test for growth hormone; that it would take unspecified steps to enhance "the unpredictability of the year-round testing schedule"; and that, under the terms of the sport's labor agreement approved in March, it would make players automatically refund portions of their signing bonuses for violations of the steroid policy.

Growth hormone is on the NFL's list of banned substances, but league officials have said they don't test for it because there is no test they deem reliable. Upshaw has said he would not agree to allow players to be subjected to blood-testing for growth hormone.

NFL Notes: Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones interviewed Jason Garrett yesterday for the team's offensive coordinator job. Garrett, a former backup quarterback for the Cowboys, is the Miami Dolphins' quarterbacks coach. The Dolphins, according to an NFL source, granted the Cowboys' request to interview Garrett only after Jones agreed to make a decision by today as to whether he'd hire Garrett.

People around the league say they believe that if Jones hires Garrett, he's likely to hire Chargers defensive coordinator Wade Phillips as his head coach to replace Bill Parcells, who announced his retirement Monday. San Francisco 49ers offensive coordinator Norv Turner, the former head coach of the Washington Redskins and Oakland Raiders, also appears to be a possibility. He was the Cowboys' offensive coordinator before being hired by the Redskins and remains close to Jones. . . .

NFL, Union Agree On Tougher Testing For Performance Enhancers (USAT)

By Skip Wood, Usa Today

DOJ_NMG_0121384

The NFL and its union announced new standards and penalties for the use of banned substances Wednesday that include testing for EPO, believed to improve stamina.

POLICY PRAISED: Reaction positive

The league also will increase the number of randomly tested players on every 53-man team from seven to 10 each week, totaling 12,000 tests a season. First-time offenders will be suspended four games, and a second positive test results in a year-long suspension without pay. Under the new policy, suspended players will lose a prorated portion of their signing bonus.

"It is important that the NFL and its players continue to be leaders on the issue of illegal and dangerous performance-enhancing drugs in sports," NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell said in a written release. "These latest improvements will help ensure that we continue to have a strong and effective program."

That program does not include HGH, or human growth hormone, but the commissioner said he is "investing money for doing that." Blood tests are the reliable measure for HGH, and the players union has balked at taking blood from players.

Indianapolis Colts defensive end Dwight Freeney, who said he was randomly tested Wednesday, supports the new tests: "I'm a clean guy, so whenever you can catch some cheaters, it makes my job easier. ... Anything you can do for the integrity of this game is good, especially for the young people to know they have to do things the right way."

"As we have done in the past," he said, "we will review and modify the policy on an ongoing basis."

Before the BALCO investigation, conventional thinking was that only endurance athletes benefited from EPO. But sprinters were also revealed to be taking the popular drug.

Column: NFL Steps Up With Drug Testing (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

Filed at 10:37 p.m. ET

Those more cynical about these things might question the timing. What better way to kick off Super Bowl hype, after all, than with a feel-good announcement about the NFL's new and improved drug testing program.

Take a closer look, though, and there's some real meat on the bone that the NFL served up during the traditionally slow media time leading up to Super Bowl week.

Sure, it may have taken a bit of prodding from some Washington politicians to get everyone moving. But give some credit to the league for twisting the arm of its always-wary players' association and coming to terms on a tougher plan.

Players will be tested more often, and it will be harder for them to cheat. When they are caught, they will fork over some of their lucrative signing bonuses as well as their weekly paychecks.

For the first time, players in a major professional sports league in the United States will be tested for EPO. And, also for the first time, the league is at least beginning to study how to deal with human growth hormone, which many say is the drug du jour among NFL players.

It's far from perfect, but it's the furthest any league has gone to make sure the playing field is level and that the people who pay the salaries aren't taken in by a bunch of cheaters.

Whether fans really care is another story.

They seem to care about baseball, where the revelations about Barry Bonds have made him such a pariah that even the San Francisco Giants seem to be having second thoughts about re-signing him. And neither Mark McGwire nor Rafael Palmeiro likely will ever be in the Hall of Fame.

Contrast that to the way the citizens of San Diego acted when their quarterback-busting linebacker, Shawne Merriman, was himself busted for steroid use and forced to sit out four games of the regular season.

Merriman returned to a hero's welcome, and a stadium filled with people wearing his jersey. So much for former commissioner Paul Tagliabue's theory that the risk of public humiliation would help stop some players from cheating.

Of course, Merriman didn't really cheat. He merely ingested a tainted supplement. That's his story and he's sticking to it, though he's been strangely quiet about just what supplement it might have been or how he got it.

Whatever happened, it cost Merriman four games and, quite possibly, the award as the league's best defensive player. You will still see him at the Pro Bowl, though, where his conversations with Miami defensive end Jason Taylor should be interesting.

"You really shouldn't be able to fail a test like that and play in this league, to begin with," Taylor said last month. "To make the Pro Bowl and all the other awards, I think you're walking a fine line of sending the wrong message."

Taylor's reaction aside, the 60 or so active players who have tested positive for steroids since the NFL first began testing have largely escaped the kind of wrath that engulfed the likes of McGwire, Bonds and Palmeiro.

That may be because football players are more anonymous on the field, one of 53 on a team and identified only by their numbers. Or it may be because it's harder to relate steroid use to statistics in football.

Common sense tells you that home run totals skyrocketed for some reason. But just because a linebacker is juiced doesn't mean he'll necessarily get more sacks.

Still, the NFL deserves credit for being the first U.S. major sports league to begin testing for steroids in 1989, about the same time Jose Canseco was shooting up himself and who knows who else in the Oakland A's clubhouse and baseball was pretending performance-enhancing drugs didn't exist.

But the NFL system has always been a frail one, with players subjected to random testing on such an infrequent basis that many presumably were able to work their way around it. That became evident when the Charlotte Observer detailed how a doctor gave steroid prescriptions to players on the city's 2003 Super Bowl team.

The key to the NFL's upgraded program may be just how random the random tests are. Assuming they are truly random, every player in the NFL can be expected to be tested an average of four times during the season and up to six times during the offseason.

Add to that the EPO testing and the threat of forfeiting a percentage of signing bonuses -- which are often far larger than yearly salaries -- and it's hard to find a lot of fault with the league's new plan.

Sure, the suspensions could be tougher, and more substances could be tested. There could also be more of an urgency about HGH.

Prosecutor Stepping Down: Kevin Ryan Confident He Did Job (USAT)

By Bob Nightengale

Outgoing U.S. attorney trailed BALCO and Bonds

This is the site of his past. His future. In many ways, the origin of his crusade against steroids.

This is where he was a star high school running back three decades ago, hurling his body into the line 25 times a game. There was nothing fancy about his style, leading the West Catholic Athletic League in rushing. Oh, he was fast, captain of the track team, but at 5-11, 175, it was Ivy League Dartmouth recruiting him to play football. The football powers such as Southern California and Ohio State weren't interested.

"Kevin could have been a star," says Greg Suhr, the San Francisco deputy police chief and Ryan's childhood friend. "If he had used steroids or something like that, you're talking about another 25 pounds of muscle, more speed and a whole lot more recruiters. But he … played by the rules. You do the best with what you got. That's what he's always believed in.

"What he's doing now with BALCO, and Barry Bonds, and all of these guys who cheat, he's striking a blow for the good guys."

Ryan, the outgoing U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, has been lead prosecutor since the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative case broke in 2002. He and his staff have brought seven indictments and five convictions. He's not done yet.

"I think we have galvanized the national debate on this," says Ryan, 49, a San Francisco native. "We've engaged the public and Congress and the policymakers into addressing it, as well. It has had huge ramifications beyond the criminal sphere that we normally involve ourselves (with) … from the health effects, to talk of kids contemplating suicide, to the issue of cheating in sports, and that's a good thing.

"I think we've done our job."

It just might forever change the way the American public will view sports, too. "How can it not?" Ryan says. "People are better educated now about this issue, and whether you're a sports fan or not, I think people generally have the opinion that steroids should not have a place in sports."

Baseball, with a strong union that had adamantly opposed drug testing, now has what Commissioner Bud Selig says is the "most stringent steroid testing program in sports." A player is suspended 50 games for a first positive test. The NFL has toughened its drug-testing policies, including stricter guidelines announced Wednesday. Several track stars, believing their designer-drugs were undetectable, have been disgraced.

BALCO has been the case of a lifetime, says Ryan, who in the next few weeks likely will head off to private practice. He's one of 11 top federal prosecutors who have resigned or announced their resignations since a provision in the USA Patriot Act reauthorization last year enabled the U.S. Attorney General to appoint replacements without Senate confirmation.

"I think to ask U.S. attorneys to resign in the middle of a case is the wrong thing to do," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D.-Calif., said through a spokesperson.

Ryan doesn't acknowledge whether he was asked to resign, but he says he considered stepping down last July. He has one son who's a senior at St. Ignatius and another who's a sophomore. Yet he wanted to stay in office long enough, he says, to oversee several breaking cases outside sports, and, of course, BALCO.

"When I leave, this (investigation) won't just fall off the map," Ryan says. "If the opportunity presents itself in the future that I can still be involved in it, I'll avail myself to it. I'm not going to walk away from something that I feel strongly about."

Criticism and responses

Ryan continues to investigate Bonds for perjury and tax evasion, and the slugger's attorney, Mike Rains, will be happy to see Ryan leave. He accuses Ryan of being "an autocrat" who had a dysfunctional office because of his management style.

"I think he was a disaster as a U.S. Attorney," Rains says. "I have had dealings with him, none of them good, which probably puts me in the majority. Probably his greatest claim to fame is the BALCO thing. I think he screwed it up.

"If they somehow, some way, get a hold of Barry and indict him, they went about it in one of the most irresponsible manners I can imagine. … By all accounts, the Ryan-led BALCO team has been heavy-handed, overzealous and almost acted independently of the law."

Ryan's office also was accused by Rains and other lawyers of leaking grand-jury testimony, with transcripts appearing in the San Francisco Chronicle. Ryan denies any responsibility.

"I know we weren't the source," he says. "It bothers me when people point the finger at individuals without any evidence."

Despite charges of Ryan running a dysfunctional office that led to the departure of several attorneys, Rains acknowledges the lead prosecutor can take some pride in baseball's three-year-old steroid testing policy.

"Baseball probably did need to step up to the plate more than they had," Rains says, "and maybe he can take credit for that. But the media can enlighten people and change the attitude. You don't have to send overzealous prosecutors out to do that.

"In the pure prosecution sense, you wonder just how much has this man and his army spent so far just to get Barry."

Ryan says he doesn't know the cost of the case, but the argument is, he has done exactly what had to be done.

"Not everyone agrees with me," Ryan says. "But on a personal level, this was the right thing and it had the right impact. We're not conducting a poll here before we make a decision. We're doing our job under the guidelines of our department and we will continue to do so."

Roger Wirth, IRS special agent in charge of the Oakland field office which investigated BALCO, agrees with Ryan. "This case, and what Kevin Ryan has helped accomplish … has had a worldwide beneficial effect in the world of sports. He has helped get steroids out of sports. I haven't always agreed with every step of this investigation, and I'm not going to say we made every right move, but we've made an impact. A major impact."

Says Suhr: "Everybody sure seems to have gotten a whole lot smaller, haven't they?"

Baseball under scrutiny

Although NFL players, Olympic sprinters and even a world-class cyclist have been snared in the BACLO case, it's baseball, and the steroid probe centering on Bonds, that has grabbed everyone's attention, Ryan says.

"There's something about baseball and the American experience," he says. "I remember Field of Dreams, one of my favorite movies, and you take away just how important baseball is to our pastime and to our country and to many Americans. It has been there in good times and bad.

"Everyone recognizes that it's a business, and breaking records is good for business. But it's also a sport played under rules. Fans have a right to believe that things we see in this game are real and not a trick."

Last month, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Ryan's office can use the 104 positive steroid results that came out of Major League Baseball's survey testing in 2003. The results could lead to much more troubling evidence, ruining the legacy of plenty others.

The Major League Baseball Players Association has said the seizure of results violates players' Fourth Amendment rights. It has requested a full court review and said it might appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"The court has turned over evidence to us," Ryan says, "that we think is relevant to an ongoing investigation. It certainly opens up new avenues. … If the 9th Circuit allows us to keep it, it can be very helpful.

"Look, someone testing positive for drugs, no matter what it is, they got drugs from someone. Well, we'd like to know where they got it from. That's what we do. We follow the evidence."

Don't get Ryan started on the debate that everything was perfectly legal in baseball before its drug-testing program. Those who used steroids before 2003, he says, are just as guilty as the players caught today.

"Those people are forgetting the fact that possession of controlled substances without a prescription is illegal," Ryan says. "The use of such substances by athletes — whether high school, college or on the professional level — is wrong. It violates the integrity of sports."

Remembers Alzado

Ryan, who grew up a die-hard San Francisco Giants and 49ers fan, still attends games and roots unabashedly for the Giants. Yet when asked if he hopes Bonds breaks Hank Aaron's all-time home run record, he smiles and politely declines to comment: "I'm not going to touch that one."

Ryan is careful not to speak directly about Bonds or BALCO. It's an ongoing case. Bonds' personal trainer, Greg Anderson, remains imprisoned for refusing to testify about Bonds. Ryan won't say whether they have evidence to indict Bonds without Anderson's testimony.

His first recollection of athletes possibly using steroids, he says, occurred in the 1980s when former Oakland Raiders defensive lineman Lyle Alzado was diagnosed with brain cancer.

"There was a lot of speculation at the time that it was related to steroid use," Ryan says. "We all remember the East German teams when the Olympics came around, but this was the first time I associated a big-name athlete with performance-enhancing drugs and the potential dangerous side effects."

Cheaters vs. regulators

Ryan, the son of Irish immigrants, became a naturalized citizen in 1969. He loves to hike with his wife, Anne, and go skiing in Aspen (where Bonds owns a home) with his two boys. He says one day he'll write a book. But he hopes there will be enough evidence in the coming months and years that will lead to further indictments and convictions, telling the story in court.

Ryan wonders if drug testing will catch up with the cheaters. The latest Victor Conte, founder of BALCO, could be around the corner. Surely, Ryan believes, there were plenty of other steroid labs that went undetected.

"How can you help but not wonder?" Ryan says. "If you listen to some of the chemists and folks that work on the medical side of this, there's a great concern that the basement chemists will continue to design steroids that are undetectable. The cheaters, if they want, will always be one step ahead of the regulators."

In the meantime, Ryan, Wirth and the hundreds of investigators and attorneys will be watching. They don't expect to catch everyone. Yet with the help of congressional leaders, Ryan says, cheating no longer will be tolerated.

"There's an honor system in sports, and people in sports have to abide by this honor system," Ryan says. "The parameters are in place now. The public is now expecting every sport to regulate itself.

"We've done our job. We should be proud."

Key dates in various investigations of BALCO and athletes linked to the lab or punished for using THG and modafinil, two drugs that play a key role in the BALCO investigations. Does not include track and field doping cases not related to BALCO, THG or modafinil.

Jan. 18, 2007: House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich., and Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., ask the Attorney General to drop his subpoena against reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams.

Jan. 17, 2007: U.S. attorney Kevin Ryan, who is resigning, tells USA TODAY that the BALCO probe will continue. "When I leave, this (investigation) won't just fall off the map. The infrastructure is in place. We have good prosecutors on it. A good review process. Good institutional knowledge. So when I move on, there are those that can carry forward with it without a problem."

Dec. 27, 2006: Government investigators may keep evidence seized in 2004, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals rules.

Dec. 23, 2006: Prosecutors argue for a contempt-of-court sentence of up to 18 months for reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams.

Dec. 21, 2006: Yahoo! Sports says Troy Ellerman, a defense attorney who had worked for Victor Conte and James Valente, is under investigation in the FBI's probe of leaked grand jury evidence.

Dec. 14, 2006: Cyclist Tammy Thomas is indicted on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. Thomas, a former World Championship medalist banned for life in 2002 after a positive test for the steroid norbolethone, is accused of telling a grand jury she had not used steroids.

Sept. 21, 2006: Judge Jeffrey White tells San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams he will order them jailed for up to 18 months if they do not comply with his order to reveal their sources.

Sept. 6, 2006: A doping case against Marion Jones collapses when her "B" sample tests negative for EPO. Bother the "A" and "B" samples must test positive to incur a doping penalty.

June 29, 2006: Olympic and world champion Justin Gatlin reveals that he has tested positive for testosterone. His coach is Trevor Graham.

June 22, 2006: E-mails seized by federal authorities identify Victor Conte, the convicted founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, as a source in the San Francisco Chronicle's reporting on the steroids scandal, according to an online court filing that accidentally revealed confidential information.

March 16, 2006: BALCO founder Victor Conte says he " never gave" steroids to Barry Bonds. Speaking to USA TODAY by phone from a California prison where his four-month sentence is about to end, Conte also does not directly address whether the San Francisco Giants slugger could have gotten steroids that someone else received from BALCO.

"My relationship with Barry Bonds was 100% about his nutrition," Conte says.

Conte also releases a statement to USA TODAY denying he gave Bonds steroids and denying statements attributed to him by federal investigator Jeff Novitzky on the day BALCO was raided, Sept. 3, 2003.

Oct. 18, 2005: BALCO founder Victor Conte is officially sentenced to four months in prison and four months of house arrest as part of a plea deal for his role as mastermind behind a scheme to provide professional athletes with undetectable performance-enhancing drugs.

James Valente, BALCO's vice president, received probation after pleading guilty to reduced charges of steroid distribution. Greg Anderson, Barry Bonds' trainer, was sentenced to six months after pleading guilty to money laundering and a steroid distribution charge. He will spend three months behind bars and three months in home confinement.

Anderson and Conte remain free on bond and are scheduled to surrender to prison authorities Dec. 1.

Oct. 16, 2005: 60 Minutes broadcasts an interview in which former football player Bill Romanowski says he used steroids and human growth hormone. He names Victor Conte as the source of the drugs.

Aug. 1, 2005: Baseball player Rafael Palmeiro, who emphatically denied steroid use before a House panel in March, is suspended for a positive test he later blames on a vitamin B-12 shot.

July 29, 2005: Track coach Remi Korchemny pleads guilty to reduced charges, a move that likely will keep him out of prison. The plea agreement, the fourth and final one in the case, ends a drug prosecution that prompted tighter testing rules in professional sports.

July 21, 2005: The Court of Arbitration for Sport rules Alvin and Calvin Harrison, along with Michael Johnson, Antonio Pettigrew and Jerome Taylor, may keep their gold medals from the 4x400 relay in the 2000 Olympics despite the previous decision to strip Jerome Young of his gold. Young, who ran in the first two rounds of the relay but not the final, had a positive test in 1999 in a case not known to be linked to BALCO. Young was later banned for life after a second drug offense. The Harrison twins have been punished for BALCO-related drug offenses, but these were not part of the investigation into the 2000 Olympic case.

July 15, 2005: Victor Conte pleads guilty to steroid distribution and money laundering in a deal with federal prosecutors. Conte will spend four months in prison and four months under house arrest. Greg Anderson, Barry Bonds' longtime friend and personal trainer, pleaded guilty to the same charges in exchange for a six-month prison sentence.

May 19, 2005: Michelle Collins' ban is reduced to four years as part of an agreement in which she drops her appeal.

March 17, 2005: Several current and former major league baseball players testifiy in front of the House Government Reform Committee on steroids in baseball. Mark McGwire, Jose Canseco, Curt Schilling, Sammy Sosa and Rafael Palmeiro were in attendance, while Frank Thomas testified via satellite. Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi were not required to attend due to their involvement in the ongoing BALCO case.

March 16, 2005: A USA TODAY survey shows that baseball players think steroids have had a substantial impact on the game.

Dec. 15, 2004: Marion Jones files a $25 million defamation lawsuit against BALCO founder Victor Conte, claiming damages from potentially lost endorsement deals after Conte claimed in two interviews that he saw Jones use several drugs before and during the 2000 Olympics. Jones later challenges Conte to take a polygraph test, something her defense team claims she has taken and passed.

Dec. 10, 2004: Michelle Collins gets an eight-year ban, later reduced to four, from a panel of members of American Arbitration Association and the North American Court of Arbitration for Sport. Collins never tested positive but was found to have used EPO, THG and a testosterone cream. She is the first athlete without a positive test to argue her case before arbitrators. Collins also forfeits all results since Feb. 1, 2002, including her 200-meter world indoor championship in 2003. Lawyer Michael Coffield says he will appeal on Collins' behalf to the international Court of Arbitration for Sport before the end of the year.

Dec. 7, 2004: The International Olympic Committee says it will investigate Victor Conte's doping allegations against Marion Jones. IOC and WADA officials suggest that the three-year statute of limitations on challenging Olympic decisions may not apply.

Dec. 3, 2004: The San Francisco Chroniclereports more grand jury testimony, this time from San Francisco Giants star Barry Bonds. The Chronicle says Bonds admitted to unknowingly using steroids known as "the clear" and "the cream" during the 2003 season. Bonds said his personal trainer provided the steroids. The Chronicle also reported that prosecutors showed Bonds documents from 2001-03 alleging that he used various drugs, including human growth hormone and Depo-Testosterone. Bonds repeatedly has denied using performance-enhancing drugs. The report also says Bonds' former teammates Armando Rios, Benito Santiago and Bobby Estallella admitted to the grand jury that they used performance-enhancing drugs.

Also, BALCO founder Victor Conte appears on ABC's 20/20, claiming that he gave drugs to several athletes: track stars Marion Jones, Tim Montgomery and Kelli White; football players Bill Romanowski, Barret Robbins, Chris Cooper, and Dana Stubblefield. In ESPN The Magazine, Conte describes how he started in his business of legal supplements and gradually turned to steroids. Conte says he gave a steroid to Chryste Gaines, Alvin Harrison and Calvin Harrison in 1999, then started to provide Jones with various drugs a few weeks before the 2000 Olympics. He says he also started a doping program for Montgomery at the Olympics but later severed ties with Jones and Montgomery, only to get back into the doping business with White and Dwain Chambers. Conte says in the ESPN interview that he knew little about the baseball end of the business, which he says was in the hands of James Valente, but he says he gave drugs to Greg Anderson without knowing the purpose.

Dec. 2, 2004: The San Francisco Chroniclereports that in grand jury testimony, New York Yankees slugger Jason Giambi admitted injecting himself with human growth hormone in 2003 and using steroids that he obtained from Barry Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson, for at least three seasons. Giambi played only 80 games in 2004 because of a tumor, which the New York Daily News reported was in his pituitary gland; medical experts told the Chronicle that one of the drugs Giambi said he thought he had taken can exacerbate a tumor of the pituitary gland. The report also says Giambi's brother, Jeremy, used many of the same drugs.

Nov. 28, 2004: The United States is stripped of its 4x400-meter relay gold medal from the 2003 World Championships due to Calvin Harrison's second doping violation (see Aug. 2, 2004). One of Harrison's teammates was Jerome Young, who had received a lifetime ban earlier in the month for doping violations that had no known relation to BALCO, THG or modafinil. Harrison's other teammates to lose their world title are Tyree Washington and Derrick Brew, who are not linked to BALCO and are not facing doping charges.

Oct. 19, 2004: USADA announces that sprinter Alvin Harrison has accepted a four-year suspension for drug violations. Harrison admitted to the use of testosterone, THG, HGH and erythropoietin (EPO).

Oct. 11, 2004: Gary Sheffield tells Sports Illustrated that he was introduced to BALCO by Barry Bonds, with whom he has since severed ties. According to the magazine report, officials at the lab gave Sheffield a testosterone-based steroid known as "the cream" to be applied to a scar on his right knee. Sheffield says he didn't realize the "cream" was a steroid. Baseball officials say they will not punish the Yankees outfielder. Because of his association with BALCO, Sheffield was one of several high-profile athletes called to testify before the grand jury in 2003.

Sept. 24, 2004: Barry Bonds undergoes a random steroid test, which each major league is required to do under baseball's new collective bargaining agreement. "I'm glad this is finally happening," Bonds tells MLB.com. "They'll get the results and it will clear my name. It'll show that there's nothing behind what I've been doing (on the field) all year." Bonds goes on to lead the National League in batting average, slugging and on-base percentage on his way to winning a record seventh league MVP award.

Sept. 14, 2004: The NFL fines Chris Cooper, Barret Robbins and Dana Stubblefield three game checks each after the three current and former Oakland Raiders tested positive for THG. A fourth player, Bill Romanowski, is reported to have tested positive but has retired. The four are the only positive tests in the league. The three active players are also warned that any subsequent positive test will result in an eight-game suspension.

August 2004: Athens Olympics take place. No athletes test positive for THG or modafinil. Marion Jones, the only athlete under BALCO-related scrutiny to take part in the Games, finishes fifth in the long jump. Greek athletes Kostas Kenteris and Katerina Thanou miss drug tests under mysterious circumstances, miss the Games and are later linked to BALCO.

Aug. 2, 2004: USADA hands Calvin Harrison a two-year suspension for his positive modafinil test. Harrison's punishment is more severe than that given to other modafinil offenders because his is considered a second offense. As a junior sprinter in 1993, he tested positive for pseudoephedrine. The punishment also means the U.S. loses its 4x400-meter relay gold medal from the 2003 World Championships (see Nov. 28, 2004).

July 17, 2004: Regina Jacobs accepts a four-year ban and is stripped of her 2003 U.S. title at 1,500 meters. Jacobs says she wanted "to avoid being subjected to what I believe would be an unfair hearing."

July 9-18, 2004: Most athletes linked to the BALCO scandal fail to qualify for the Olympic team, sparing the U.S. difficult decisions on whether to proceed with athletes who might later be banned. Michelle Collins withdraws injured. Alvin Harrison finishes far behind in the 400-meter semifinals. Tim Montgomery reaches the 100-meter final but finishes seventh. Chryste Gaines is convincingly beaten in the 100-meter semifinals. Regina Jacobs retires. Calvin Harrison finishes fifth in the 400 and is named to the relay pool, but his suspension Aug. 2 renders the decision moot. Marion Jones, not officially charged with any doping offense, is the only BALCO-connected athlete to make the team, though she only makes the team in the long jump.

June 24, 2004: The San Francisco Chronicle reports Tim Montgomery told the grand jury that Victor Conte gave him weekly doses of THG in 2001. He testified that he used the banned substance for eight months before splitting with Conte in a money dispute. Montgomery also gave secondhand testimony in which Conte told him he had given Barry Bonds the steroid Winstrol. Attorneys for Montgomery and Bonds question the validity of the Chronicle report.

June 16, 2004: Marion Jones calls for a public hearing in an effort to clear her name and prevent drug allegations from keeping her out of the Athens Olympics. "I am not going to engage in the United States Anti-Doping Agency's secret kangaroo court. I will answer questions in a public forum that will be open for the entire world to see, hear and evaluate," Jones said. USADA says it is required to treat matters in confidentiality but that athletes are not bound by that requirement.

June 8, 2004: USADA confirms that it has sent letters to several track and field athletes notifying them of potential drug violations. The athletes are reported to be Tim Montgomery, Chryste Gaines, Michelle Collins and Alvin Harrison.

May 24, 2004: Marion Jones and her attorneys meet with USADA. Afterward, Jones' attorneys show the media some portions of evidence they say USADA contends links Jones to BALCO. The attorneys dispute that the documents pertain to Jones.

May 19, 2004: Kelli White accepts a two-year ban for use of undetectable steroids and EPO. She is eventually stripped of all results since Dec. 15, 2000, including her world titles in the 100 and 200 meters. White never tested positive for a substance other than modafinil; USADA cites evidence obtained from the BALCO investigation in announcing her ban.

May 17, 2004: A New York judge dismisses a suit brought by Regina Jacobs against USADA and USATF. Jacobs had sought to go outside the usual arbitration process.

May 15, 2004: Marion Jones reasserts that she is drug-free and threatens to sue if USADA imposes a sanction that's based on anything other than a failed drug test.

May 6, 2004: The Senate Commerce Committee turns over evidence from the BALCO investigation to USADA.

May 4, 2004: Kevin Toth receives a two-year ban for THG and modafinil use, USADA announces. The shot putter loses his 2003 U.S. championship and fourth-place finish at the World Championships.

April 29, 2004: Melissa Price and John McEwen receive two-year bans for THG use, USADA announces.

April 25, 2004: The San Jose Mercury News reports that a government memorandum from September claims Conte admitted providing steroids to 27 athletes. Conte's lawyer acknowledges the existence of the memorandum but denies that his client made the comments. The athletes listed include five baseball players (Barry Bonds, Gary Sheffield, Jason Giambi, Jeremy Giambi, Armando Rios), seven football players (Bill Romanowski, Dana Stubblefield, Josh Taves, Barret Robbins, Chris Cooper, Johnnie Morton, Daryl Gardener) and 15 track and field athletes (Marion Jones, Tim Montgomery, Regina Jacobs, Kevin Toth, Alvin Harrison, Calvin Harrison, Kelli White, Chryste Gaines, Eric Thomas, Michelle Collins, Ramon Clay, Dwain Chambers, John McEwen, Zhanna Block, Olga Vasdeki).

April 20, 2004: Chryste Gaines, Sandra Glover, Eric Thomas and Christopher Phillips are sanctioned for modafinil use. All receive public warnings and are stripped of results, including Thomas' U.S. championship in the 400-meter hurdles and Phillips' fifth-place finish in the 110-meter hurdles at the World Championships.

Feb. 24, 2004: British sprinter Dwain Chambers, who trained with Remi Korchemny, receives a two-year ban for taking THG.

Feb. 16, 2004: The USOC says Kevin Toth has tested positive for THG. All four U.S. athletes who had positive tests in 2003 are now officially named. Toth says he has retired, though he intends to fight to clear his name.

Feb. 13, 2004: Four men plead innocent to federal drug possession and distribution charges detailed in a 42-count indictment.

Feb. 12, 2004: Attorney General John Ashcroft announces a 42-count indictment against four men — Victor Conte, BALCO executive James Valente, track coach Remi Korchemny and trainer Greg Anderson, who has worked with baseball player Barry Bonds. Among the charges: conspiracy to distribute and possess with intent to distribute anabolic steroids, conspiracy to defraud through misbranded drugs, and money laundering.

Jan. 13-16, 2004: The USOC announces three more positive tests: Melissa Price (THG), Regina Jacobs (THG) and Calvin Harrison (modafinil). Though modafinil would be a lesser offense under the rules at the time, Harrison would face a two-year ban as a second offender.

Dec. 30, 2003: The USOC, following its protocol for releasing names 30 days after USADA's board says it will proceed in a doping case, announces seven positive tests. Six are track and field athletes linked to positive tests for modafinil: Kelli White, Chryste Gaines, John McEwen, Chris Phillips, Sandra Glover and Eric Thomas. McEwen also is reported to have tested positive for THG. All six athletes dispute the findings.

Dec. 7, 2003: The USATF approves a new "zero tolerance" policy that would include lifetime bans for first offenses on steroids, if such a ban is legal. The IAAF considers strengthening its first-offense penalty from two years to four, but legal questions arise for that move as well.

Fall 2003: Many athletes testify before the BALCO grand jury. Among those testifying: track and field athletes Marion Jones, Kevin Toth, Regina Jacobs, Chryste Gaines and Tim Montgomery; baseball players Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi, Gary Sheffield and Benito Santiago; football players Bill Romanowski and Barret Robbins; swimmer Amy Van Dyken; and boxer Shane Mosley.

Nov. 7, 2003: British sprinter Dwain Chambers is suspended pending a hearing after U.K. Athletics announces a positive B-sample for THG. Chambers is later banned for two years. Under British rules, he also faces a lifetime ban from the Olympics.

Oct. 22, 2003: USA Track & Field CEO Craig Masback says four U.S. athletes have turned up positive A-samples (the first of two samples examined in a given test) for THG. The number had been thought to be significantly higher. The athletes are eventually revealed to be shot putter Kevin Toth, middle distance runner Regina Jacobs, hammer thrower John McEwen and hammer thrower Melissa Price.

Oct. 21, 2003: The IAAF says it will re-examine all samples from the World Championships using the new THG test. By the time re-testing is complete, no new names are added to the list of positive tests. Samples from swimming's World Championships and the 2002 Winter Olympics also are re-tested, with no positive results reported.

Oct. 16, 2003: USADA releases a statement detailing its knowledge of THG. The agency says an anonymous coach provided the agency with a used syringe containing the substance, which was previously unknown. A lab at UCLA found that the substance was a steroid and quickly developed a test.

The coach pointed to BALCO's Conte as the source of the drug, the USADA statement said. USADA says it then contacted the Justice Department.

Sept. 3, 2003: Local and federal authorities raid BALCO offices.

Aug. 30, 2003: The IAAF announces that Kelli White, who won the world title in the 100 and 200 meters earlier in the week, has had an initial positive test for modafinil. The substance isn't specifically banned, but IAAF regulations allow for "related substances" to be added. Modafinil is eventually classified as a stimulant punishable by forfeiture of results and a public warning on a first offense, though several independent physicians dispute whether it is a performance-enhancing drug. WADA later takes steps to make modafinil punishable by a two-year ban, though that punishment will not be enforced for those who tested positive in 2003.

White claims that the drug was prescribed to treat narcolepsy and that she checked its legality with proper authorities. The doctor who prescribed the drug is Brian Goldman, a former medical director at BALCO.

Oct. 1, 2000: The U.S. Anti-Doping Agency begins operation. It assumes responsibility for drug testing that had previously been done by U.S. sports federations.

Sept. 26, 2000: The IOC and IAAF announce shot putter C.J. Hunter, Marion Jones' husband at the time, has tested positive on four separate occasions for the steroid nandrolone. Victor Conte appears at the news conference and said it's the result of a mislabeled nutritional supplement. Conte also said Jones was not taking the supplement. Conte accused of the IOC and IAAF of withholding information that could have helped Hunter avoid a doping offense, according to a BBC report.

1988-1996: BALCO claims that many successful Olympic athletes from this period took its legal supplement ZMA, which contains zinc and magnesium.

1984: Victor Conte, a former bassist for Tower of Power and other bands, forms BALCO. He does chemical analysis on athletes using an ICP spectrometer, which is used in a variety of fields.

Coalition Meeting In Oakland Vows To Focus Gang Crime (SFC)

By Jason B. Johnson, Chronicle Staff Writer

OAKLAND -- A coalition of law enforcement, educators and civic leaders from 13 California cities meeting in Oakland today pledged to fight crime statewide by working together to address the root causes of street gangs.

Participants in the first California Cities Gang Prevention Network, which includes San Francisco, Oakland, Richmond and Los Angeles, said during a press conference at the Waterfront Plaza Hotel that the two-day conference would produce a blueprint that could be used nationwide by cities struggling with rising crime rates.

Oakland Deputy Police Chief Howard Jordan said he's looking for new ways to combat a surge in violence last year that resulted in 148 homicides, compared to 94 in 2005. About 38 percent of those murders were attributed to gang members.

Oakland had about 150 known gang members 10 years ago, compared to 1,500 today, Jordan said.

"We didn't spend nearly enough time on intervention as we did on enforcement. As a result of that we're changing our focus," he said.

San Jose Police Chief Robert Davis said he wants local law enforcement to do a better job of sharing information on different gangs and successful programs.

"We still don't have collaboration with other cities, and I think that's the piece that's missing," Davis said. "If we don't do that, then shame on us as a Bay Area community."

Davis said the increase in gangs now taking place in Oakland is similar to a surge in San Jose gang activity more than 10 years ago.

"If we see some of the problems in Oakland occurring that we saw in the South Bay 10 years ago, then shame on us for not helping," said Davis.

Teams of delegates will meet to outline procedures for sharing crime data and information on successful anti-gang programs. Cities represented at the conference also include Santa Rosa, San Diego, Stockton and Fresno. The main sponsors are the National League of Cities and the Oakland-based National Council on Crime and Delinquency.

Violent crime rose 3.7 percent nationally and 4.1 percent in California in the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period in 2005, according to FBI statistics.

And, 2005 saw approximately 30,607 more violent crimes than 2004, the largest single-year increase in violent crimes in 14 years, according to the FBI's 2005 Uniform Crime Report.

Gangs were involved in 56 percent of all crimes in the Western region of the country in 2005, according to the federal Justice Department's National Gang Threat Assessment.

"After years in which it looked like the crime problem was abating, it's starting to kick up again, especially in regard to homicides," said Barry Krisberg, president of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency in Oakland. "While this is a challenging development, it's also an opportunity to get things right."

Ex-ATF Agent Says She Feared Corrupt Cop (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 25, 2007

A former federal agent who alleges the Chicago Police Department protected corrupt officers and destroyed her career testified Wednesday that she feared for her life after confronting notorious former Officer Joseph Miedzianowski.

Diane Klipfel, a former agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, has sued the city and Miedzianowski, charging that Miedzianowski turned investigators against her after she tried to report that he had stolen from a drug dealer.

Miedzianowski eventually was arrested in 1998 for running a massive drug ring and was convicted of drug conspiracy and racketeering charges in federal court.

Klipfel's husband, ATF agent Michael Casali, also contends he was retaliated against by Miedzianowski.

Lawyers for the city and Miedzianowski have denied the accusations and promised to show that the Police Department was not notified in a timely fashion that Miedzianowski might be corrupt.

Klipfel told jurors hearing the federal civil trial that she began to suspect Miedzianowski six years earlier, when he was working an ATF detail that targeted gangs and drugs. Agents and officers conducted a search at the home of a drug dealer, she said, and she saw Miedzianowski going through the dealer's pants and wallet.

"He was looking over to see if I was watching him," Klipfel said.

She told jurors the drug dealer later confided in her that Miedzianowski and some of his fellow officers were systematically stealing from him. She confronted Miedzianowski, she said, who became irate when she met up with him to discuss the allegation.

He cussed her out and kicked her car door, she said.

"It was beyond rage," she said. "He was like in a froth."

Later in an impromptu meeting at a convenience store with other officers to discuss the allegations further, Miedzianowski made more threats, she said.

"He said, 'Bitch, you're stupid,'" Klipfel said. "He said, 'There's four of us who will say you stole off this warrant'" and other warrants.

She said Miedzianowski went on to threaten to get her fired, and to say: "Think about your darling kids. We could light up your house."

Klipfel said in the coming months, Miedzianowski proceeded to make allegations against her that started a police internal affairs investigation and an internal probe at ATF. She was demoted and sent out of Chicago, she said, while Miedzianowski harassed her by paging her to call sex hot lines and the zoo.

She said she feared for the lives of her three children and had them sleep in a closet away from the windows, even moving them out of state for a time.

Klipfel could be cross-examined as soon as Thursday.

Berwick Woman Sentenced In Federal Firearms Case (FDD)

By Jennifer Keefe, Democrat Staff Writer

Foster's (NH) Daily Democrat, January 25, 2007

Bolduc was charged with making a false statement in the purchase of a firearm in New Hampshire in May 2006 as she showed a New Hampshire address on her ATF form, a document required by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives at the time of a firearms purchase.

It is a violation of federal law to make a material false statement in connection with the purchase of a firearm.

The .22-caliber revolver Bolduc purchased from Renaissance Firearms in Gonic, N.H., was later recovered in Somersworth, N.H., by police in connection with the May 2006 arrests of a 19-year-old Rochester man, a 20-year old Philadelphia, Pa., man and a 19-year-old Bronx, N.Y., man on charges of possession of 43 grams of crack cocaine and the .22-caliber handgun with ammunition.

Bolduc was sentenced Monday in U.S. District Court in Concord to six months of home confinement and two years probation.

Agents from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, together with the Somersworth Police Department, conducted the investigations leading to Bolduc's prosecution.

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Renews "Amnesty" Defiance (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

House Republicans opposed to amnesty vowed yesterday to fight President Bush's proposal to legalize millions of illegal aliens as outlined in his State of the Union address on Tuesday.

"The president worked hard to get a Congress that agrees with him on this and now he's got it," said Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, in reference to the Democratic takeover of both chambers of Congress in the November elections. "But we're still going to fight him on it."

Mr. Bush on Tuesday reissued his call to welcome foreigners with a guest-worker plan, and he called for a path to citizenship for millions of those here illegally.

"We need to uphold the great tradition of the melting pot that welcomes and assimilates new arrivals," Mr. Bush said in his speech to uneven applause. "We need to resolve the status of the illegal immigrants who are already in our country, without animosity and without amnesty."

More Democrats than Republicans rose in applause.

"It's the same thing we've been hearing from the president for a long time," he said.

"I'm sensing a real lack of commitment to combating illegal immigration," he said.

Mr. Johnson said he has seen little evidence in Texas that the administration's efforts to stop illegal entry are working.

"Our borders are out of control," he said yesterday. "Illegal immigrants are running free across the borders."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, welcomed "the president's renewed commitment" to comprehensive immigration reform.

"The president has been a leader on this issue and I am hopeful that he will continue his efforts with members of his party so that we can pass legislation that will solve the problem once and for all," he said after Tuesday's address.

For House Republicans, Mr. Kennedy's stamp of approval was proof that Mr. Bush does not share their concerns.

"Once again, we see the president is pushing amnesty," said Rep. Ed Royce, California Republican. "The president claims this is not amnesty, but the very definition of amnesty is changing someone's status from illegal to legal. As a matter of national security, we need an immigration system that is sound, and this one is not."

As evidence of its stand against illegal entry, the administration has announced raids on businesses that hired illegal aliens.

"I think they were just for the purposes of rhetoric so the president could say he was doing something," Mr. Tancredo said, adding that he has followed up with those employers and learned that the illegals have been almost entirely replaced with, presumably, legal citizens who had been looking for work.

"If these raids prove anything, it's that we do not need a guest-worker program," he said.

Mr. Tancredo said farmers are hiring illegals despite a federal guest-worker program already in place because of the cumbersome requirements to pay certain rates and provide certain living conditions.

"Why shouldn't they ignore it?" Mr. Tancredo said. "Their own government ignores it."

He said House Republicans have "lost a lot of momentum" since pushing through a bill last year to construct about 800 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"It's back to playing defense, I suppose, but that's a role I've played for six or seven years," he said.

Mr. Tancredo has announced the formation of a presidential exploratory committee, which he considers a good vehicle to continue his crusade while in the minority party.

He hopes to pull off a surprise victory on the presidential campaign trail and perhaps with an amnesty bill in the House.

"There are enough [conservative Democrats] to create a pretty significant problem for the new majority," he said with a broad smile. "A lot of them campaigned on our side of this issue and would have a lot of explaining to do back home."

Tax Preparation Firm Banned From Practice (BUFFNEWS)

Buffalo News, January 25, 2007

Duffek, O'Connor & Associates of Hamburg can no longer legally prepare returns because an investigation showed that the firm prepared tax returns for clients that included deductions for "fictitious and inflated charitable contributions," the U.S. Justice Department said.

According to the Internal Revenue Service, the firm understated tax liabilities of its customers by more than $2 million.

"[The] government alleged that the returns prepared by the defendants claimed fictitious and inflated employee expenses for such items as work clothes, teaching and coaching supplies, student and athlete rewards and cellular telephone expenses," the Justice Department said in a news release issued Tuesday.

According to the release, U.S. District Judge William M. Skretny issued a permanent injunction barring the firm, Brian Duffek and Patrick O'Connor from preparing federal returns.

The firm is no longer listed in telephone books and could not be reached to comment.

Rich States, Poor States (WSJ)

If you're searching for the next big thing in American politics, it's wise to keep an eye on the states. Here's one possibility: the abolition of state income taxes.

In Georgia, Missouri and South Carolina, Governors and state legislatures are drafting serious proposals to repeal their income taxes to promote economic development. St. Louis, one of America's most distressed cities, may overturn its wage/income tax as a way to spur urban revival. And in Michigan, the legislature is in the last stages of phasing out its hated business income tax -- the most onerous in the land. "States are now in a ferocious competition to attract jobs and businesses," says economist Arthur Laffer, who is advising several Governors and legislators on the issue, "and one of the best ways to win this race is to abolish the state income tax."

The timing for fixing state tax codes could hardly be more ideal because states are swimming in budget surpluses thanks to the booming national economy. This should be a big year for state tax cuts. Governors in Arkansas, Florida and West Virginia have already announced major tax relief plans for 2007. Even New York City has a $1 billion surplus and Mayor Michael Bloomberg is promising a property tax cut.

But the biggest target is the income tax. Newly re-elected South Carolina Governor Mark Sanford is talking of reviving his plan to phase out the income tax over 18 years. Mr. Sanford ran into opposition from the legislature in his first term, but he tells us that "I still consider this one of my top priorities and if the legislature wants to do it, I would be ecstatic."

Georgia may beat Mr. Sanford to the punch. House Republicans in Atlanta have announced that one of their top priorities is to use the half-billion-dollar budget surplus as a downpayment to "dismantle the current tax code." House Republican Majority Leader Jerry Keen tells us the debate in Atlanta is between a flat-rate income tax and a plan that would "do away with the personal income tax but broaden the sales tax by eliminating 107 exemptions. We're committed to a pro-growth tax plan that announces to the country that Georgia is open for business."

In Missouri the legislature is reviewing a plan by the state think tank, the Show Me Institute, that would increase the rate of the sales tax to 7.5% and limit spending growth to population plus inflation, in return for eliminating the state's income tax over 10 years. House Speaker Carl Bearden says "I would like to see a phasing out of our current tax structure in Missouri. . . . Eliminating the income tax can have a huge positive impact on a state's economy."

The idea of financing state services without an income tax is hardly radical. Nine states today -- Alaska, Florida, Nevada, New Hampshire, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Washington, and Wyoming -- manage well without one. With a few exceptions, the non-income tax states are America's most prosperous. Meanwhile, the high income tax states, which tend to be congregated in the Northeast, keep surrendering jobs, people, and voters to the South and West.

State lawmakers also seem to have learned from two of the most recent states to adopt an income tax: New Jersey and Connecticut. As recently as 1965 New Jersey had neither an income nor sales tax, but managed to balance its budget every year. Now it has both taxes -- its income tax is the 5th highest in the nation -- but the state is facing what Stateline.org calls a "staggering budget deficit." Allied Van Lines reports that the Garden State is now one of the leading places for people to flee.

The latest state to adopt an income tax was Connecticut in 1991, but a new report by the Yankee Institute reveals that the tax has been a calamity. The state has ranked last in employment growth since 1991, losing 240,000 of its native born citizens between 1991-2002. No other state has since enacted an income tax, and lawmakers in Georgia, Missouri and South Carolina say Connecticut is now the model for how not to run a state economy.

Whether these states will be able to eliminate their income taxes in the next few years is an open question. But what's undeniable is that the debate in state capitals has swung decisively in the direction of chopping income tax rates, not raising them.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Experts Examine Bush Health Plan (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Economists are still sorting out the implications of the broad health-care proposals President Bush unveiled this week, but already some clear winners and losers are emerging.

Families with generous employer-sponsored coverage would be worse off, while those who buy insurance on the individual market, or whose health plan costs less than $15,000 annually, would come out ahead. But some of the winners will probably become losers over time, analysts said.

Moreover, while Bush's plan would alter a historic imbalance in the tax code that favors generally better-off consumers who get insurance through their jobs, it also could undermine coverage for some sicker, older people and erode the employer-sponsored system that still provides coverage to more than half of all Americans.

Some experts questioned whether the plan would have any impact on holding down spiraling health costs or extending health coverage to some of the 47 million people in the nation who have none.

"It's not solving the uninsured problem and it's not solving the cost problem, so it's not really advancing what we need to have happen," said Karen Davis, president of the Commonwealth Fund, a nonprofit health policy research organization. "What it does is favor individual insurance. . . . The question is, should you try to undermine employer coverage? Employer coverage has lower administrative costs and it covers everybody in a firm, not just those who are healthy enough to pass a medical exam."

Bush would treat the contributions that employers make to their employees' coverage as taxable income, no longer exempting from payroll and income taxes the money workers use to buy health insurance.

Instead, the president would create a new tax break for everyone who buys health insurance, regardless of where they get it. The government would allow each family to deduct $15,000 a year from its taxable income to offset the cost of its policy; individuals would be allowed to deduct $7,500.

Democrats on Capitol Hill have panned the plan.

"The president's proposals are an opportunity missed," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said. "They will not improve access to good coverage and won't help working families afford the spiraling cost of health care."

Under the plan, which would take effect in 2009, winners would vastly outnumber the losers -- at least at first.

Families that spend less than $15,000 on their health coverage (either on their own or with an employer's contribution) would come out ahead, because the new deduction would apply to all of the money spent on premiums. A family that spends, $13,000 a year on health insurance could claim the full deduction. The administration says about 100 million people with employer-sponsored coverage would see their tax bills go down.

Other winners include the 17 million people who buy health insurance on the individual market, who would for the first time enjoy a tax break on the money they use to pay health premiums.

On the losing side are consumers with more expensive policies, especially those financed by employers, who would have to pay taxes on the money used to pay premiums exceeding $15,000. About 30 million people with employer coverage would see their tax bills go up in the first year, the administration says.

"You've got a Republican president willing to take from the rich and redistribute to the poor, which, symbolically, is a really big deal," said Thomas A. Scully, a former head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services under Bush. "It's breaking the ice to where the real source of revenue is and redistributing it from overinsured people to poor people. . . . The concept is a huge step in the right direction."

Advocates said the proposals would hold down health-care costs by motivating people to seek plans that cost $15,000 or less, and would help put basic insurance within reach of about 5 million of the uninsured. Still more people would gain coverage with the help of another Bush proposal to redirect some federal health money to new grants to assist states in finding innovative ways to cover the uninsured.

"It gives everyone a strong incentive to search for less-costly health care," said Mark B. McClellan, a health economist and former Bush adviser.

Other experts said the proposals were interesting but flawed.

The $15,000 deduction would increase annually with inflation, but health-care premiums typically rise faster. The administration estimates that in 2009, 80 percent of policies will fall under the $15,000 deduction.

After 10 years, though, only about 60 percent will, so more people would be hit by the tax, according to an analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a project of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute. The administration's own figures show the government losing as much as $40 billion in tax revenue in the first year but breaking even over a decade as more revenue rolls in.

Wealthier families who benefit from the deduction would get a much greater value than less-affluent families. The $15,000 deduction would be worth $5,250 to a family taxed at 35 percent but only $1,500 to one taxed in the 10 percent bracket. Moreover, more than half of the uninsured are too poor to owe any taxes and would see no benefit, according to an analysis by the conservative Tax Foundation. A more effective strategy, some said, would be to offer the poor tax credits to pay for health insurance, a strategy that Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said yesterday the administration has considered.

Others fear the plan would prompt more employers to drop health coverage and offer employees an immediate increase in wages to buy coverage on the individual market. But those plans tend to be more expensive, less comprehensive and harder to get for consumers who are already sick.

"We're tilting the playing field toward this very flawed market," said Robert D. Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute.

By Sandra Block

Many workers with employer-provided health insurance sign up for a plan during annual enrollment and move on with their lives.

President Bush's proposal to provide a standard deduction for all who buy health insurance is intended to encourage workers and their employers to pay more attention to the cost of health care. It's also designed to make health insurance more affordable for the 47 million Americans who are uninsured.

The plan faces stiff political resistance. Some lawmakers in the Democrat-led Congress said they wouldn't even hold hearings on the plan, arguing that it would hurt many Americans who do have insurance coverage. But Bush's proposal has managed to focus attention on the uneven tax treatment of health care benefits.

Currently, employees aren't taxed on employer-provided health insurance. The self-employed can deduct the cost of a health insurance plan. But taxpayers who work for an employer that doesn't provide insurance can't deduct the cost of buying an individual policy.

President Bush's plan would address that by creating a standard deduction for all taxpayers who obtain health insurance. Taxpayers would receive a standard deduction of $15,000 for family coverage or $7,500 for single coverage. They wouldn't pay taxes on employer-provided insurance unless their insurance exceeded the deduction.

Individuals who buy individual policies would see their taxable income reduced by the amount of the deduction, even if they spent less on their insurance.

Q: Who would be the biggest winners under this plan?

A: Individuals and families who buy individual insurance plans because they're not covered by a plan at work would get a big tax break. The White House estimates that an uninsured family of four with annual income of $60,000 that bought private insurance would get a $4,545 tax break in 2009.

Healthy workers who decline their employers' plans in favor of an individual policy with lower premiums could also come out ahead, says Edwin Park, senior health policy analyst for the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. Those workers would still receive the full tax deduction, even if their premiums cost less, he says.

But critics say the plan would disproportionately aid high-income taxpayers, who have the most to gain from a tax deduction.

Unlike a tax credit, which is a dollar-for-dollar reduction in your actual taxes, a deduction cuts taxable income. As a result, a $15,000 deduction is more valuable to someone in the 35% tax bracket than someone in the 15% bracket.

Q: Who would be hurt?

A: Workers who are covered by employer plans could lose their coverage, critics say. The Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution, predicts that some small and midsize employers would drop their coverage.

Q: What about low-income people who pay no income tax?

A: They wouldn't get much of a benefit. The Tax Foundation estimated that the majority of uninsured Americans pay no income tax, so they wouldn't gain from the tax deduction.

But the plan includes an exemption from Social Security and Medicare taxes for those who certify to their employers that they've bought an individual plan. Nearly all workers pay those taxes. A young uninsured worker who earns $20,000 wouldn't owe income tax, but she'd still save about $1,100 — enough to pay up to 70% of the cost of an individual plan, says Joseph Antos, an analyst at the American Enterprise Institute.

Q: If the proposal becomes law, how hard will it be to find a private insurance policy?

A: There's a lot of debate on this issue. Critics of the proposal say private insurers are primarily interested in insuring healthy people. Studies have found that individuals with even minor health problems, such as allergies, are charged higher premiums in the private market, Park says. And people with serious problems might not be able to obtain coverage at any price.

The AEI's Antos counters that greater demand for individual policies would spur competition.

Bush's Gambit On Health Insurance (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull, Gregory M. Lamb

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2007

With pressure building to reform America's healthcare system, President Bush has launched what may be his most ambitious bid to tackle the issue from a free- market basis.

Lately, the momentum has appeared stronger in another direction: States have been considering mandates on employers and individuals to purchase health insurance.

Mr. Bush, by contrast, wants to help more Americans get health coverage by creating new tax deductions. He's trying to wipe away a longstanding problem that America's tax code has nurtured: that health insurance is more affordable for large employers than for small employers or individual households.

Democrats in Congress say the president's idea is too little. And some analysts say that, coming seven years into his administration, it is too late.

Still, the debate over how best to contain spiraling costs and cover millions who are uninsured is far from over. Bush has made a bid for conservative ideas to be on the table as voters weigh this issue in the run-up to the next presidential election.

"I think it will help push [healthcare] further up the agenda in 2008," says Robert Blendon, an expert on health policy at Harvard University in Cambridge, Mass. "He sets the floor,... that government has some role in trying to deal with this and has to make some very substantial changes."

Political pressure for a healthcare fix has been mounting for several reasons. Costs keep rising faster than inflation. That's a problem for anyone paying for care, but for many employers it's a matter of global competitiveness. The rising cost of health benefits are one big reason, for instance, why US automakers are having trouble competing with foreign rivals. The soaring costs also mean that many small employers don't offer insurance. About 16 percent of Americans – 46 million people – lack coverage.

Three paths toward reform

The debate now includes three major paths down which America's health system can travel:

•Trying to preserve and improve elements of a free market, with competition and information for consumers holding prices in check. Call it the Bush plan.

•Mandating that all employers provide insurance to their workers, or contribute a share of their payroll to help government insure the workers. This is the path many states are taking.

•Shifting toward a single-payer system, the model in many developed countries, where Congress would expand a program like Medicare to be an insurance provider for all Americans.

Health insurance is currently a blend of federal, state, employer, and individually purchased coverage – and it's likely that the nation will maintain some form of hybrid system.

But with Democratic victories in last fall's election, momentum has shifted toward proposals that involve stronger government involvement.

In his State of the Union address Tuesday night, Bush acknowledged the need for Washington to do more, but he also tried to define a limit.

"Government has an obligation to care for the elderly, the disabled, and poor children," Bush said. "For all other Americans, private health insurance is the best way to meet their needs."

He outlined two major proposals.

One would be a standard tax deduction for health insurance, $15,000 for families, $7,500 for individuals. But health insurance that costs more than that – whether obtained through an employer or individually – would be considered taxable income.

In effect, this would help level a playing field in which employer-based insurance enjoys tax-free status, while individuals must buy insurance with after-tax dollars. This would save $4,500 for a family of four earning $60,000 a year, thus helping to put insurance "within reach" for more Americans, Bush said. The new taxes on those with high-end insurance would help offset the cost of this plan.

Second, he said the government should provide grant money to help states that are coming up with innovative ways to cover the uninsured.

Those could include states such as Massachusetts, which is seeking to achieve nearly universal insurance through a mandate that all individuals obtain insurance. In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger recently launched a similar proposal.

Support for leveling the playing field

Many healthcare experts support the notion of leveling the playing field, in terms of tax treatment, for employers and individuals.

And by taxing those with expensive insurance, it would counter the regressive nature of the current tax system. (As businesses deduct their healthcare expenses, top-tier workers with the costliest coverage are reaping the largest government subsidy.)

But many experts also say the plan does not go far enough. For one thing, they say, it won't result in coverage for most of the uninsured.

"We have to have a system of universal insurance coverage," says Henry Simmons of the National Coalition on Health Care, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group in Washington.

The coalition is one of several lobbying for more sweeping changes to expand coverage, control costs, and improve the quality of care.

Universal coverage could be achieved through mandates on employers or individuals, or through expansion of government programs, Dr. Simmons says.

Business groups, for their part, say they welcome a full debate of these and other options. But they are wary of a single-payer approach.

In part, that's based on skepticism of whether it will be effective at containing costs that are rising faster than overall inflation.

Some experts say the fast-growing spending isn't necessarily a bad thing. Medical technology and treatments are improving, they say, so it's natural that health spending has grown to about 16 percent of the national economy.

And they say that a single-payer system would reap big reductions in administrative costs.

But others note that countries with purely single-payer systems are not all happy with their systems, and some are trying to shift in a more market-oriented direction to curb costs and expand consumer choice.

In the US, the cost of Medicare alone promises to strain the federal budget in the years ahead, and even that program doesn't cover all health costs for the elderly Americans it serves.

"I have yet to hear a proposal coming out of the single-payer crowd [to address soaring costs] other than 'Trust me, things will be better,' " says Joseph Antos, a health policy expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

Dr. Blendon, at Harvard, predicts that Democrats won't generally push for a single-payer system. He expects a Democratic plan to extend public coverage to children, expand Medicaid, "but the rest of their efforts will be to get working populations into private coverages."

That leaves plenty to debate this year and beyond.

Bush Health Plan Shifts Onus To The Consumer (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang, Sarah Lueck

President Bush's proposal for easing the nation's health-care woes -- encouraging families to buy insurance on their own instead of relying on employer-provided insurance -- differs from approaches favored by Massachusetts and California as well as many Democrats in Congress.

In their bids to extend health-care coverage to millions of uninsured, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, both Republicans, aim to shore up existing coverage, which has been offered by fewer employers in recent years. The Massachusetts plan, which was supported by Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, requires all but the smallest employers to offer health insurance, or else pay an assessment to the state. In California, a similar requirement would compel employers that don't offer insurance to pay a 4% payroll tax.

Both states would require all residents to have health insurance, offering government coverage or subsidies to those who are without coverage through an employer.

Mr. Bush, in contrast, avoids mandates and instead would use the tax code to make individually purchased health insurance more appealing and affordable. In a break with the past, he would make employer-provided health insurance taxable, but create a tax deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for singles, for everyone who gets insurance, through work or on the open market. That is designed, the White House says, to be fair -- by treating individuals who buy insurance and now receive no tax break, the same as employees who are covered through their work and can exclude the value of the insurance from taxable income. Another part of the president's plan would help states extend coverage to the uninsured by diverting money from hospitals that care for the poor into state insurance pools.

"What you are seeing is indicative of sharp philosophical differences," said Robert Laszewski, a health-policy analyst. "One is to build on the employer-based system that most Democrats embrace and the other is to develop an entirely new system controlled by the consumer, not the employer," which many -- though far from all -- Republicans and the president endorse.

Whether Mr. Bush's plan will contribute to a further erosion of employer-sponsored health coverage was debated yesterday. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt told reporters that the president's plan will "absolutely not" have a negative effect on the employer-based system. Rather, he said, it does something that states can't: changes the federal tax code to help individuals buy health insurance. "I do not see employers leaving the employment-based system," he said.

Not everyone in the administration agreed. At a White House briefing on Tuesday, Joel Kaplan, deputy chief of staff for policy, acknowledged that the proposal could accelerate the trend of employers dropping insurance, but emphasized that workers left without coverage would, thanks to the new tax deduction, have the means to "buy insurance in the individual market in a way that they can't now."

Some employer and industry groups fretted about the proposal. Neil Trautwein, vice president of the National Retail Federation, said, "The fear is that if it becomes more attractive for people to decline employer coverage and buy on the open market, then you could get great spirals in the employer plans. I'm not convinced we should take away one of the pillars that has been supporting the health-care system."

Democratic lawmakers said that expanding government programs, not changing the tax code, is a cheaper, simpler way to lower the ranks of uninsured than relying on the individual market, where policies often are expensive and people with health problems have trouble buying coverage at any price. "With the individual market, people pay more for [policies]; they also pay for insurance company overhead. And [private insurers] traditionally discriminate against people with prior medical problems," said Rep. Henry Waxman, a California Democrat and a senior member of a House committee that oversees health-care issues.

Nina Owcharenko, a senior policy analyst for health care at the Heritage Foundation, said the Bush plan would complement states' effort to expand coverage: "The states control the regulatory structure of the individual market," especially for small businesses and individuals, and "this proposal is saying, 'How do we work together?' "

Ms. Owcharenko added: "This is trying to find a way to make sure there's a market for an individual so they can buy health insurance. Both can co-exist.

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2007

Key elements of the domestic program President Bush unveiled in Tuesday's State of the Union address are aimed at helping cure Americans' discontent with the nation's healthcare system.

But getting the proposals through the Democratically controlled Congress will be a tough sell.

"A rigorous and robust debate is about to ensue on how to accomplish" the goal of providing affordable health insurance for all, says Michael Leavitt, Secretary of Health and Human Services. As part of the selling of the president's healthcare proposals, Mr. Leavitt spoke to a roomful of reporters at a Monitor sponsored lunch Wednesday.

A Gallup Poll conducted January 15-18 found Americans deeply dissatisfied about the US healthcare system. Seven out of 10 of those polled were dissatisfied with the availability of affordable healthcare. Half of those polled were dissatisfied with the quality of medical care. And more than six out of 10 are dissatisfied with the Social Security and Medicare systems.

In his address to the nation Tuesday, President Bush outlined two key health related proposals. First, Mr. Bush proposed a standard tax deduction for health insurance -- $7,500 for individuals and $15,000 for families. The administration argues the plan will make health insurance more affordable and level the playing field for those who buy insurance on their own rather than through their employer.

"For millions of other Americans who have no health insurance at all, this deduction would help put a basic private health insurance plan within their reach," the president said Tuesday evening.

"In my mind, it is simply indefensible for our country to have a tax policy that provides a tax benefit to part of our citizens and simply ignores the rest," Leavitt said. Currently, Americans who get health insurance through their employer pay no tax on the value of the insurance while those who buy insurance on their own get no tax break and pay for insurance with after tax dollars.

The president also rolled out what the administration called an "Affordable Choices Initiative." Under the plan, states that provide poor and hard-to-insure citizens with basic health insurance will get additional federal funding to help cover the cost of the insurance. To come up with funds for this new program, the federal government would give less aid to hospitals that serve large numbers of Medicare and Medicaid patients.

The current approach "is not a very efficient system," Leavitt said. "There is a better way to deal with this. And our desire is to have a discussion in each state on how best to deal with charity care. We need a charity care system. There will likely be people who are uninsured no matter what system...But if you were able to insure half of those people who currently turn up uninsured, they would get better healthcare and there would be no reason for us to be sending the same amount of money to hospitals to care for people who don't have insurance."

Key Democrats show little enthusiasm for the president's proposals, especially the plan to offer a standard deduction for health insurance. House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D) of New York told the Associated Press, "This is a dangerous policy that ultimately shifts cost and risk from employers to employees and could result in a higher number of uninsured. " The influential chairman added, "the new Democratic majority in Congress is interested in relieving, not increasing, working families' tax burden."

Secretary Leavitt denied the plan was dead on arrival. "Now it may be the debate will begin to center on different proposals, perhaps it will be an offshoot of this one. But we need to have this debate. This is a problem ripe for solving."

Leavitt also denied that the president ducked on offering solutions to Social Security's and Medicare's long term financial problems. "There is a great deal of conversation going on right now with leaders of the Congress," on those issues, he said. "We are going to see a lot of discussion about both Social Security and Medicare."

While most of the conversation at the lunch centered on healthcare, Leavitt was also asked about the 2008 presidential race. A reporter mentioned a recent poll by the political newsletter Hotline that showed some voters are concerned about former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney's Mormon faith. Leavitt, a Mormon who served 11 years as governor of Utah, responded, that Mr. Romney "is going to emerge as a viable, well thought of presidential candidate and I think in time the question of his religion will turn out to be a curiosity for people and not affect his candidacy in a significant way."

ONE OF THE tweaks that would make President Bush's new health-care proposal much more attractive would be changing the proposed tax deduction for those who purchase insurance to a tax credit. Yesterday, the day after the president unveiled the proposal in his State of the Union address, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt signaled the administration's openness to doing just that.

At a luncheon sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor, Mr. Leavitt said there were "redeeming tax policy features to using a credit" but that the administration had decided to "propose as a starting place" to use the mechanism of a standard deduction instead. That sounds like a door opening to us -- and a door skeptical Democrats ought to be willing to poke their heads through. Transforming the deduction into a credit would create a proposal that is fairer and that would do more to reduce the ranks of the uninsured.

Why? The Bush proposal would create a separate standard tax deduction -- $7,500 for individuals, $15,000 for families -- for those who purchase health insurance. While this would make the system more progressive than it is now, the deduction would still be worth far more to those in higher tax brackets. Conversely, a tax credit would treat all taxpayers equally: the $22,000-a-year factory worker would get the same break as a $220,000-a-year lawyer.

An even better approach, suggested in a thoughtful analysis by the Tax Policy Center of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute, would make the credit progressive (lower-income taxpayers would get a larger credit), refundable (taxpayers who don't pay enough taxes to reach the amount of the credit would get money back) or both.

Not only would a credit be more equitable, it would be more effective. Because it would be worth more to lower-income recipients, it would give them a greater incentive to purchase insurance, either by participating in employer-sponsored plans or by buying it on their own. There is the separate, and important, problem of making certain that insurance is available on the private market at an affordable price, but that does not diminish the fact that a credit is the preferable approach.

And consider this: In every previous budget, Mr. Bush has proposed a refundable tax credit for health coverage. Given Mr. Leavitt's apparent openness to change, why don't Democrats suggest modifying the president's plan to do just that?

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted on Wednesday that the federal budget deficit would shrink again this year and could actually swing into a surplus in 2012 — but only if President Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010.

The agency predicted that the deficit for 2007 would decline to about $200 billion. It would be the third big annual decline in a row, and it would come even though spending on the war in Iraq is expected to remain high this year.

The decline of the deficit comes on the heels of unexpectedly large increases in tax revenue over the last two years and slower-than-expected increases in spending on Medicare.

Much of that increased revenue came from taxes on sharply higher corporate profits and big gains in the stock market, even though Congress reduced the tax rate on capital gains and stock dividends in 2003.

The agency's "baseline" estimate, one that assumes current law does not change, is that the deficit will decline to $172 billion this year, from $248 billion in the past fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30, 2006. As a practical matter, officials said, the actual deficit will probably be about $200 billion because of outlays for the war.

It is a rare piece of good news for President Bush, coming as he is struggling to persuade Congress to accept his strategy of sending more troops to Iraq and as his public approval ratings are at an all-time low.

White House officials boasted that the projections validated Mr. Bush's strategy of cutting taxes to stimulate the economy and ultimately generate higher tax revenues.

"Two years ago, the president laid out an ambitious goal to cut the deficit in half by 2009, and we met that goal three years early," said Rob Portman, the White House budget director. "We are now on a solid path toward the president's new goal to achieve a balanced budget by 2012."

But Congressional budget officials cautioned that the projections were not as sunny as they looked, in part because they assume that Congress will let President Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010, along with many corporate tax breaks, and will not try to shield millions of families from a big increase in their tax bills because of the alternative minimum tax.

Mr. Bush and most of his Republican allies in Congress have pushed to make the tax cuts permanent, rather than letting them expire at the end of 2010 as they are scheduled to do. Even some Democrats favor extending the tax cuts that benefit middle-income families.

Extending the tax cuts would cost the Treasury $1.4 trillion in the next 10 years and increase the deficit in 2017 alone by more than $400 billion.

Lawmakers in both parties have wanted to restrain the alternative minimum tax, a parallel tax that was aimed at only the richest families but has not been adjusted for inflation. If left unchanged, the alternative minimum tax is expected to engulf tens of millions of families with annual incomes of $100,000 and less.

Preventing an increase in the alternative tax would cost $1.2 trillion over 10 years and add more than $200 billion to the deficit in 2017, the budget office estimated.

Democrats countered that the fiscal picture remained bleak. "While any improvement in the deficit is a welcome development, today's report from C.B.O. is no cause for a declaration of victory," said Representative John M. Spratt Jr., the South Carolina Democrat who is chairman of the Budget Committee.

After factoring in the cost of tax cuts, Mr. Spratt said, the new report offered a "bleak reminder of how much current policy will need to be changed to return the budget to a fiscally responsible course."

The budget office tried to include costs of the war in its projections. But the baseline projection included only the $70 billion in “bridge” financing that Congress approved last year, and President Bush is expected to submit a supplemental request next month that could be more than $100 billion.

The agency estimated that actual outlays during the 2007 fiscal year would total almost $100 billion and add about $25 billion to the deficit beyond what the baseline estimate indicated. That estimate is consistent with others that war costs are running about $8 billion a month.

Congressional analysts had a more difficult time with war costs in 2008 and beyond. If the United States reduced troops in Iraq to 30,000 in 2010, from more than 130,000 today, the agency estimated, the spending on Iraq would be about $300 billion less than it assumes right now.

Over the long term, the Congressional Budget Office said, the real budget problem will be the surge in spending on Social Security and Medicare as baby boomers retire.

It echoed Ben S. Bernanke, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, who told Congress last week that the recent improvement in the budget was merely the “calm before the storm” and that the nation would face “draconian” choices between severe cuts in benefits and steep tax increases if it failed to act quickly.

Likewise, the budget office said there had been no “substantial change” to the problems that lie a few years ahead. “Either a substantial reduction in the growth of spending, a significant increase in tax revenues relative to the size of the economy, or some combination of spending and revenue changes will be necessary,” it said.

Surpluses Could Be Just Promises (USAT)

WASHINGTON — A day after President Bush pledged to balance the federal budget by 2012 without raising taxes, Congress' budget agency said it probably can't be done.

In a report that will guide this year's debate on spending and taxes, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) on Wednesday projected budget surpluses beginning in 2012 only if current laws and policies remain the same.

The president and Congress, however, are seeking tax changes that would wipe out the projected surpluses and drive up the deficit by hundreds of billions of dollars. Those changes include extending Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and preventing millions of taxpayers from being hit by the alternative minimum tax, which increases taxes on people with large deductions.

In addition, the report warned the White House and Congress that the future growth of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security threatens to unravel deficit-reducing initiatives. By 2050, federal spending on the two health care programs alone would equal 20% of the nation's economy, up from 4.5% today.

"The central long-term problem facing the federal government is health care," said Peter Orszag, the agency's new director. "It is implausible that economic growth alone will eliminate the nation's long-term fiscal imbalance."

Arguments between the White House and Congress over how to erase large deficits dominated budget debates throughout the 1980s and most of the '90s. As a share of the economy since World War II, the deficit peaked in 1983 at 6%. Deficit-reduction agreements in 1990, 1993 and 1997 reduced the red ink, but it took the strong economy of the late 1990s, symbolized by a booming stock market, to create a surplus.

It didn't last long. After four years, recession, war and Bush's tax cuts combined to produce deficits, which peaked at $412 billion in 2004, or 3.6% of the economy. Since then, a surge in corporate tax receipts has helped shrink the deficit to $248 billion, according to the CBO's figures; the White House estimate is $296 billion.

Bush will deliver his proposed 2008 budget on Feb. 5. In Tuesday's State of the Union address, he vowed to balance the budget by 2012 "without raising taxes. What we need to do is impose spending discipline."

In the short term, the CBO report offered some good news. It projected that the deficit would drop to about $200 billion this year and about $100 billion in 2008, partly due to savings in federal health care programs such as Medicare's new prescription-drug coverage. Those numbers will change depending on the cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as other spending and tax decisions.

The White House seized on the short-term estimates Wednesday. "We are now on a solid path toward the president's new goal to achieve a balanced budget by 2012, while making the tax cuts permanent and better constraining spending," said Rob Portman, the White House budget director.

Democrats focused on the longer-term projections. "The estimates from CBO become a bleak reminder of how much current policy will need to be changed to return the budget to a fiscally responsible course," said House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt, D-S.C.

It's A Balanced Budget Or Tax Cuts, Report Says (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush can balance the budget within five years, or he can get Congress to extend his tax cuts beyond their scheduled expiration, the Congressional Budget Office reported Wednesday — but probably not both.

Bush has said otherwise, committing himself in Tuesday's State of the Union address, as he did earlier this month, to providing Congress on Feb. 5 with spending and tax proposals for fiscal 2008 that would put the budget on a path toward balance by 2012.

"We must balance the federal budget," Bush said Tuesday night. "We can do so without raising taxes."

The nonpartisan CBO, in its annual report on where current spending and tax policies would take the budget over the next 10 years, did not contradict Bush in so many words. But its tables painted an unmistakable picture of a budget that needed an extra infusion of cash or a sharp reduction in outlays if revenue were ever to exceed spending.

And even if the budget could be balanced by 2012, said Peter R. Orszag, the CBO's director, the retirement of the baby-boom generation could quickly unbalance it: Not only would the wave of retirees force the government to spend more for Social Security, Medicare and other benefit programs, he said, but it would drain the population of taxpaying wage-earners.

"Congress is within reach of balancing the budget without raising taxes if significant entitlement reforms are enacted within the next five years," said Rep. Paul D. Ryan of Wisconsin, the top Republican on the House Budget Committee

Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, who ranks second in the House GOP leadership, was more enthusiastic. "Tax relief has spurred unprecedented economic growth," he said, "and these results prove that we can balance our budget without raising taxes."

To Democrats, the fiscal outlook was much gloomier. Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad of North Dakota said the CBO must base its projections on current spending and tax law, without regard to likely changes. And currently, he said, the Iraq war is underfunded — the administration is expected soon to ask for an additional $100 billion for this year — and the tax cuts that Bush wants made permanent are due to expire at the end of 2010.

When the budget office's projections are adjusted for these and other factors, said Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.), chairman of the House Budget Committee, the result is "a bleak reminder of how much current policy will need to be changed to return the budget to a fiscally responsible course."

Liberal and conservative budget analysts took the Democrats' slant. Brian M. Riedl, lead budget specialist at the right-of-center Heritage Foundation, said the new numbers implied that balancing the budget by 2012 without increasing taxes meant that federal spending could be $294 billion greater in 2012 than 2007. But in that period, he noted, Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid costs would rise by $367 billion.

Under current law, if the tax cuts expire as scheduled at the end of 2010, the budget would swing nearly to balance in 2011 and show a $170-billion surplus in 2012, the CBO estimates.

But that would occur only if Congress allows the tax cuts to expire. Such a decision — far from a forgone conclusion — would generate $268 billion in revenue in 2012. Without it, there would be a $100-billion deficit.

The budget office said other likely tax actions — notably, continued relief from the alternative minimum tax, which increasingly hits middle-class taxpayers instead of just the very wealthy — would add $160 billion more to the 2012 deficit.

On the spending side of the budget, substantial troop reductions in Iraq could save $43 billion in 2012. But that could be more than offset if Congress let domestic appropriations, which Bush has targeted for no increase even for inflation, grow as fast as the combination of economic output and inflation. Altogether, the policy changes identified by the CBO could turn the 2012 surplus of $170 billion into a deficit of $245 billion.

For What It's Worth, CBO Sees Zero Deficit (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The federal budget deficit will fall to $172 billion this year and $98 billion next year, then disappear completely by 2012, according to a report released yesterday by the Congressional Budget Office. But virtually nobody -- not even top CBO officials -- believes it.

That is because the CBO, the nonpartisan office that supplies Congress with cost estimates, is required to make some whopping assumptions, including: that all of President Bush's tax cuts will expire on schedule in 2010; that the alternative minimum tax will be permitted to ensnare millions of additional taxpayers; and that the war in Iraq and other military operations will never cost much more than the $70 billion that has so far been approved for the fiscal year that ends in September.

Back in the real world, even Democrats want to extend at least some of the Bush tax cuts. Even the White House wants to halt the expansion of the alternative minimum tax. And, as for global war efforts, the president is calling for an additional 21,500 troops to be sent to Iraq and is expected to ask Congress to approve an additional $100 billion for this year alone.

Add it all together, and the deficit would be about $200 billion this year, according to the CBO -- down from the $248 billion deficit recorded in fiscal 2006 and a big drop from the $413 billion spending gap the government racked up in 2004, the largest ever in dollar terms.

But the deficit would climb back up to $275 billion in fiscal 2008, according to Democratic budget leaders, who are just starting work on the 2008 budget. And by 2012, the deficit would be back in the $300 billion range, Democrats said, with the national debt climbing higher and a projected explosion in Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid costs right around the corner.

"You have to acknowledge this is good news. It will make it easier for all of us to bring the budget into balance over a reasonable length of time," House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.) said of the positive changes in CBO's official estimates. "But this is no time to get euphoric."

Both Spratt and Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) have vowed to bring the budget into balance by 2012, as has the president. Bush is scheduled to deliver his five-year budget plan to Congress on Feb. 5.

In a statement, Bush's budget director, Rob Portman, hailed the CBO projections as further evidence that the nation is "on a solid path toward the president's new goal to achieve a balanced budget by 2012."

But Portman told reporters that the White House, too, is projecting larger immediate deficits than the CBO foresees. He said the president's fiscal 2008 budget will include some expensive items left out by the CBO, including a permanent extension of the business tax credit for research and development and, perhaps, a plan to hold the number of households hit by the alternative minimum tax steady at about 4 million for another year.

"Our number will be a little higher than theirs because we make different assumptions. But we'll be consistent in our ability to reduce deficits and balance the budget by 2012," Portman said, adding that the president's plan predicts a surplus in 2012.

In a briefing at the CBO's offices, new director Peter R. Orszag acknowledged that the numbers "may not conform to what many people expect will actually happen in the future." But the CBO is required to make projections based on current law, not on conventional wisdom or even political reality, Orszag said.

For that reason, the CBO's 173-page budget outlook includes a chart titled "Budgetary Effects of Selected Policy Alternatives Not Included in CBO's Baseline" that makes it possible for people to assemble their own budget projections.

Tax Decisions Could Affect Deficit Outlook (WSJ)

WASHINGTON -- Congressional budget experts said the fiscal 2007 deficit could fall to $172 billion if current policies remain in place, down from $248 billion in 2006, but the gap could worsen depending on how Congress addresses several looming tax-policy decisions.

The Congressional Budget Office projections exclude the cost of an anticipated $100 billion war supplemental-spending bill. If that money is approved, CBO expects about $25 billion of it will be spent in 2007, bringing the year's deficit to about $200 billion, according to new CBO Director Peter Orszag. Fiscal year 2007 began Oct. 1, 2006.

Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman said the president's budget will likely result in a higher deficit for fiscal year 2007 than predicted by CBO. "Our number will be a little higher than theirs," Mr. Portman told reporters. "But, it will be consistent with the broad theme of reducing deficits and [reaching] balance by 2012," Mr. Portman said. President Bush will continue a U.S. military buildup while offering a package of entitlement cuts as part of a plan to balance the budget by 2012, a senior administration official said yesterday.

CBO sees the deficit dropping to $98 billion in 2008 and, after a brief increase in 2009 and 2010, leveling out in 2012 and turning into a surplus. Aiding the decline is that revenue is projected to grow an average of 5.2% over the next 10 years and as much as 7% in 2007.

However, CBO's deficit projections assume that the tax cuts enacted by Mr. Bush are allowed to expire in 2010 and that the alternative minimum tax, which is expected to ensnare 33 million Americans by 2010, isn't fixed. Making the tax cuts permanent, which Mr. Bush has requested, would inflate the deficit by about $1.9 trillion over 10 years, according to CBO. Fixing the AMT, which was intended to capture high-income earners but has begun to hit the middle class because it wasn't indexed for inflation, would increase the deficit by $569 billion over that same period.

Mr. Orszag also warned that the favorable outlook suggested by the 10-year projections "doesn't alter the long-term fiscal imbalance" caused by the ballooning costs of entitlement programs such as Medicare and Social Security. Medicare and Medicaid alone are expected to grow from 4.5% of gross domestic product to 20% by 2050, as health-care costs increase and an aging work force begins collecting benefits.

CBO said either a substantial reduction in the growth of spending, a significant increase in tax revenue or some combination of both would be "necessary to promote long-term fiscal stability."

CBO Projects Deficit Of $172 Billion In '07 (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

The Congressional Budget Office said yesterday that this year's federal deficit will be $172 billion, far smaller than last year's tally, and that the budget is on track to be balanced by 2012 without any action or interference from Congress or the president.

But the CBO cautioned that the short-term number doesn't include $30 billion in expected war costs, and that the long-term picture is unlikely to materialize because it assumes giant tax increases with the expiration of President Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and with the growth of the alternative minimum tax. Congress and the president have promised to cut at least some of those taxes.

"When these adjustments are made, the estimates from CBO become a bleak reminder of how much current policy will need to be changed to return the budget to a fiscally responsible course," said House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr., South Carolina Democrat.

The figures set the stage for Mr. Bush, who will present his fiscal 2008 budget early next month. That fiscal year begins Oct. 1.

Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said Mr. Bush will show a higher deficit in 2007 and different projections for later years because he makes different assumptions. Mr. Portman said a key difference is that the administration's budget will assume the tax cuts do not expire.

Still, he said Mr. Bush's budget also will show declining deficits and a balanced budget in 2012.

"Congress should be encouraged by this news, and I am optimistic that we can work together -- across party lines -- to keep the economy strong and spend taxpayer dollars wisely," he said.

The good fiscal news is thanks mostly to extraordinary revenue growth, rather than spending cuts.

Although Mr. Bush has touted a promised balanced budget by 2012, the CBO's projections show the balance would be achieved without any help from Mr. Bush -- as long as he didn't propose deeper tax cuts or more spending.

The CBO projects a $170 billion surplus in 2012, after a deficit of $12 billion the year before. The 2006 deficit was $248 billion.

In 2011, the CBO projects, the federal debt will peak at $5.4 trillion before declining as the budget comes into balance.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said that however good the news, it is still a long way from the huge surplus projected for 2007 when Mr. Bush took office six years ago.

"The reality is that this CBO projection represents a $750 billion deterioration in the budget outlook for fiscal 2007 from the one President Bush inherited when he took office," Mr. Hoyer said.

The CBO report included a warning about the long-term picture, with the aging population putting more stress on Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security.

"Either a substantial reduction in the growth of spending, a significant increase in tax revenues relative to the size of the economy, or some combination of spending and revenue changes will be necessary," the report concluded.

War Costs Extend Budget Deficit Gap (AP)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2007

Budget estimates released Wednesday showed some improvement in the deficit but gave little solace to Democrats struggling to match President Bush's promise to balance the budget.

The new forecast from the Congressional Budget Office put the deficit for the current budget year reaching about $200 billion after factoring in Iraq war costs. Last year's deficit was $248 billion.

Both the White House and the top Democratic budget writers welcomed the improved outlook, but difficult disagreements remain over how to close the gap.

The CBO, a nonpartisan agency that provides lawmakers with estimates of the budget and the costs of legislation, said the budget could run a $170 billion surplus in the 2012 fiscal year.

That figure, however, assumes Congress will let Bush's tax cuts expire at the end of 2010, effectively raising taxes on income, inheritances, married couples and parents.

The Bush administration releases its budget Feb. 5 and promises it will be balanced by 2012 without any such tax increases.

White House budget director Rob Portman met on Capitol Hill with a group of moderate House Democrats and claimed such lawmakers as allies in the president's effort.

"This notion that you have to raise taxes to achieve balance ... is no longer the environment or the scenario," Portman told reporters.

He said Bush's budget would achieve balance with improved but still "cautious" estimates of tax revenues. They probably will be more optimistic than the CBO's estimates.

Bush has one significant advantage in the upcoming debate. In designing his budget, Bush can assume his changes are put in place. He does not have to consider the political difficulties of getting the Democrat-controlled Congress to go along with cuts to hospitals and other Medicare providers and new fees on airline passengers and veterans seeking health care.

The chairman of the House Budget Committee, Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., and his Senate counterpart, Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., have the difficult job of trying to advance a budget that unites politically fractious factions of their party.

Their task is made even tougher because the CBO's figures understate the true magnitude of the nation's fiscal woes.

Not included, for example, are the future costs of modifying the alternative minimum tax to head off a revolt by middle-class taxpayers.

Extending Bush's tax cuts and changing this tax would swamp the projected surplus for 2012 with $425 billion in lost revenues and interest costs, according to CBO figures.

The CBO's new projections credit revenue increases and lower costs for federal health care programs for the bulk of the improvements to this year's deficit.

Just last July, the White House predicted a $339 deficit for 2007. The CBO's new director, Peter Orszag, based his $200 billion prediction by combining the agency's baseline deficit of $172 billion with about $25 billion in additional war spending.

Bush is expected to send Congress a Pentagon request for about $100 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan, but only $25 billion or so will actually be spent before the Sept. 30 end of the current budget year, Orszag said.

Like virtually all of his predecessors, Orszag sees troubling signs in the long term. Rising health care costs and the looming retirement of the baby boom generation promise to swamp the Medicare program unless Congress steps in with politically painful tax increases and or benefit cuts.

"Some combination of either spending reductions, revenue increases or a combination of the two will be necessary to bring the nation's long-term fiscal house in order," Orszag said.

Byrd Fires Warning On Spending (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, January 25, 2007

In an apparent attempt to head off conservative Republicans intent on restraining Congressional spending, Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) is circulating a memo warning that without increased funding for some programs the federal government may have to lay off or furlough thousands of key homeland security, consumer safety and health care personnel.

With the current stopgap funding measure set to expire Feb. 15, Byrd and House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.) are gearing up for a fight with Republicans over how to make sure that 13 Cabinet agencies, Congress and countless independent government agencies continue to operate for the remainder of fiscal 2007, which ends Sept. 30. Congress already has approved fiscal 2007 funding for the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

The current continuing resolution freezes federal spending at fiscal 2006 levels, and conservative Senators such as Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) have pushed to keep the government funded at 2006 levels for the remainder of the fiscal year to trim as much as $7 billion from the discretionary spending budget.

But the Byrd memo predicts that if Congress maintains those levels for the remainder of fiscal 2007, "it would result in thousands of layoffs in the public and private sectors; it would cut off health care for members of America's Armed Forces; and it would close the doors to medical care for thousands of our veterans."

One skeptical Senate GOP aide said the memo is just hyperbole from appropriators who consistently resist efforts to rein in Congressional spending.

"This is like the appropriator who cried 'wolf' in the sense that they say this year after year whenever a CR is put in place," the aide said. "The wild accusations they make never come to pass."

DeMint said on the Senate floor Jan. 11 that appropriators could not be believed.

"You will notice, despite what has been said, we passed a continuing resolution at the end of last year and didn't pass our appropriation bills. Of course, as you look around, you see the country is still operating just fine," DeMint said. He added, "I would make the case we need a system that, if we are not able to have ample debate and discussion about appropriations, we don't have all this fanfare about closing down the government every year and scaring our senior citizens and our veterans that something is not going to come that they need."

Still, Byrd's memo provides a useful window into the programs and government offices likely to see modest increases in a $463 billion 2007 joint spending resolution, which could be on the House floor as early as next Wednesday.

For example, the memo warns that the Food Safety and Inspection Service would have to begin furloughing its entire staff beginning the first week of September, an action that could result in the shuttering of 6,000 meat and poultry processing plants across the country because FSIS staff would not be on site.

The document does not say how much money it would take to keep the FSIS up and running through the end of September.

Meanwhile, Byrd's office estimates that the FBI would be $80 million short, face a yearlong hiring freeze, and have to fire some special agents, intelligence analysts and other support staff if forced to operate under fiscal 2006 funding levels.

Similarly, the daily operations budget of the Army Corps of Engineers would face a $22 million shortfall — requiring the Corps to fire 250 of its 900-person staff, according to Byrd's office. And the federal judiciary would have to trim its staff by 2,500 — a scenario that could affect parole officers' capacity to track convicted felons, the memo noted.

The Social Security Administration would have to furlough 65,000 employees for more than a week if the $180 million projected shortfall under 2006 levels were allowed to continue, the memo asserts. Plus, the 1-800-Medicare call center likely would have to close down for the "final months of the fiscal year," the document says.

The biggest ticket item in the memo, however, is the $3.2 billion needed to shore up veterans' medical care — a figure that has been known for months.

Though the memo plays up the impact of funding shortfalls on national security, the elderly and veterans health care, a number of priorities championed by the new Democratic majority are highlighted as well.

Bush Proposes Broadening The No Child Left Behind Act (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24—The Bush administration called on Wednesday for an array of changes to the president's signature education law. The proposals would give local school officials new powers to override both teachers' contracts and state limits on charter schools in the case of persistently failing schools.

The proposals are part of the administration's blueprint for revising the No Child Left Behind Act, which Congress is scheduled to renew this year. Margaret Spellings, the education secretary, said the goal was to provide students in failing schools with other options and "to make sure we have our best personnel in the neediest places."

President Bush signed the No Child Left Behind Act into law in 2002. It requires schools to test students in reading and math annually in grades three to eight, and establishes progressively more severe penalties for schools that fail to make adequate progress, including shutting the schools altogether.

Administration officials said there were currently about 1,800 of these schools across the country, where students have failed to meet state targets for reading and math for more than five years. But they said that loopholes in the current law allowed them to avoid serious action indefinitely.

"We all have to answer the question what are we going to do about that," Ms. Spellings said in a telephone news conference. "This is the president's answer to, Is the promise of No Child Left Behind real?"

She said that allowing local officials to close failing schools and replace them with charter schools would give children new options. Charter schools are publicly financed but freed from many of the regulations that apply to traditional neighborhood schools.

In 26 states, including New York, there are limits on how many charter schools can be opened. Critics point to a lack of consistent research showing charter schools are any more effective than traditional public schools in raising achievement.

Ms. Spellings said local superintendents would also be helped if they could transfer teachers in their districts to help improve poorly performing schools, even if union contracts banned such moves.

Edward J. McElroy, president of the American Federation of Teachers, derided the proposal as "silly on its face," adding, "I have a feeling they're setting up a straw man just to knock it down."

While allowing for "areas of agreement" with the president's blueprint, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who is chairman of the education committee, said he was "disappointed that the administration has proposed circumventing state law" with its proposal on charter schools.

In the House, Representative George Miller, the California Democrat who is chairman of the education committee, rebuffed the administration's move to allow superintendents to override contracts, which he called a "proposal to gut collective-bargaining agreements."

Separately, he rejected the administration's call for school vouchers. President Bush proposed, as he has every year since taking office, taxpayer-financed vouchers to allow children in struggling schools to transfer to private schools.

"Private school vouchers," Mr. Miller said, "have been rejected in the past, and nothing has changed to make them acceptable now. They are the same bad idea they have always been."

Other administration proposals seemed likely to be more acceptable, among them: a call for a federal fund that would give extra pay to teachers who are most effective in raising children's test scores, or who agree to teach in the neediest schools; and allowing districts with failing schools to first offer children tutoring before allowing them to transfer.

The administration also proposed requiring states to publicize how their students perform on a national exam, known as the nation's report card, side by side with student performance on state exams. The move is intended to pressure states to make their own standards more rigorous.

Congress will consider the president's blueprint as it takes up hearings to renew the law this spring. But with the presidential race taking shape, it is not at all certain that Congress will complete the job this year.

In moving to update the law, Congress and the administration are threading their way through discontent from across the political spectrum, from teachers unions upset that the law's testing requirements are dictating what teachers do in the classroom to conservatives who say education should remain a purely local matter.

Michael J. Petrilli, an Education Department official in Mr. Bush's first term who recently called the law "fundamentally flawed," said the administration's proposals represent "a pretty decent repair attempt."

"It's 50 percent stay the course, 30 percent tweak and tuck, and 20 percent bold new ideas," Mr. Petrilli said.

He added, "Not bad for a president with 33 percent approval ratings, though the package as a whole has about a zero percent chance of getting through Congress."

Bush Proposal Revives Private-school Vouchers (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

On the heels of the State of the Union address, the Bush administration unveiled its education wish list Wednesday. It proposes more leeway for administrators to move good teachers into poorly performing schools and would provide a $4,000 check for students who would rather leave the public system for private school.

Under the plan, school districts would be required for the first time to send parents a "report card" showing how students do both on state skills tests and on a more rigorous national test. In many states, the majority of students meet state standards but not national requirements.

The move could force schools to toughen coursework in math and reading.

Among other proposals, the plan would:

•Allow students with poor skills to get federally funded tutoring earlier, even if a school isn't required to offer it to all students.

•Give schools more flexibility with federal money. For instance, money intended for safety programs could be spent on reading or teacher training.

•Allow a more generous measure of student progress, giving credit for year-to-year gains even if children don't meet rising benchmarks.

A controversial proposal would allow supervisors to move talented teachers to struggling schools even if a union's collective bargaining agreement forbids it. The law now prohibits such moves if they conflict with union contracts. Spellings says the plan is a tool "to get these best people in the neediest campuses."

Edward McElroy, president of the American Federation of Teachers, says the union "would oppose any federal intervention" in local contracts. The move may not get better teachers into struggling schools but could drive good teachers out, he says. "This is a whole area where we need thoughtful study rather than people setting up straw men and knocking them down."

The proposal to allow students in persistently failing schools to use about $4,000 in federal money to attend a school of their choice faces steep odds. Congress has killed similar plans in Bush's budget each year since 2001.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., who chairs the Senate education committee, says he'll look closely at the administration's ideas: "I am sure there will be areas of agreement." But, he says, "I am disappointed that the administration has once again proposed siphoning crucial resources from our public schools — already reeling from increased requirements and budget cuts — for a private school voucher program."

Spellings says she'll "fight hard" for the vouchers and the rest of the plan.

"I see this as a very vigorous package of proposals that are sound and make sense when they are taken together," she told reporters Wednesday.

Spellings Stands Firm On 'Real School Choice' (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said yesterday the administration will fight tenaciously for a few key changes to its signature education law, including helping children in chronically failed public schools to attend private schools instead.

During his State of the Union speech Tuesday, President Bush called on Congress to renew one of his key domestic accomplishments -- the No Child Left Behind Act -- this year, and the administration yesterday laid out its suggestions, including new requirements for high schools, a new focus on science, and aggressive restructuring tools for schools that have failed to make progress during the past five or six years.

Mrs. Spellings told editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday that she thinks a bill to renew the law will be ready to move through the Senate education panel by March or April.

"We must be much more aggressive and much more vigorous about those restructuring notions, including offering real school choice to the kids on those campuses," Mrs. Spellings said. "We've given them a chance, we've given them resources, and it's time for us to say '[The law] is a real promise and other options have to be brought to bear.' "

Top Democrats, such as Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, chairman of the Senate education panel, immediately balked at the school-choice provisions, while indicating agreement in other areas. Democrats' top goal is to secure a steep funding boost for the law, and Mrs. Spellings indicated the administration will use that as a bargaining chip.

"What levels of funding are calibrated to what levels of reform I think is the discussion we'll have this year," Mrs. Spellings said. "But you bet I am going to fight for these policies."

She said funding details won't be released until Mr. Bush sends his budget to Capitol Hill in the coming weeks.

Mr. Bush's proposal for renewal wouldn't change the bulk of the five-year-old law, which mandates that students be able to read and do math at grade level by 2014, and requires that states set standards and administer annual tests.

But Mrs. Spellings said she has "never been involved in the passage of a perfect bill," so some changes are needed.

The administration's proposal adds science to the list of subjects tested, requiring students to reach grade-level proficiency by 2020. It also would set more tests and requirements for high schools, such as collecting better graduation-rate data and partnering with colleges to develop English and math curricula that better prepare students for the workplace.

Meanwhile, conservatives on Capitol Hill have worried the administration will try to dramatically expand the law, either with more funding, by mandating new requirements for high schools, or both.

Some Republicans in the Senate and House want to keep the law's high standards in place but let states enter a five-year performance agreement with the federal government in exchange for less regulation and more flexibility in how they would use federal dollars and would track their progress.

The administration's proposal doesn't go that far, though it does give states more flexibility in how they spend their federal education dollars.

Mrs. Spellings said she has spoken with some of these concerned conservatives and is open to more discussion, as long as the core requirements of the law aren't watered down. But she also said there will be some degree of increased education funding this year.

Among its more contentious suggestions, the administration proposal would allow more aggressive action to be taken when a school has consistently failed to make progress for several years. Currently, chronically failing schools must offer their students the option of another public school or after-school tutoring.

But if a school fails to meet improvement standards repeatedly, which Mrs. Spellings defined as five or six years, the new proposal would give each child about $4,000 to take to another public school or a private school. It also would allow superintendents in these areas to convert the schools into charter schools even if a state's charter-school limit has been reached. Superintendents also would be able to break union contracts in order to move teachers within these schools.

In communities with several failing schools, the administration proposal also would offer scholarships for pupils to attend private schools.

Democrats have argued that these struggling schools need more money in order to meet the law's tough requirements.

House education panel Chairman George Miller, California Democrat, slammed the school-choice idea yesterday, saying it "didn't pass muster when Republicans controlled the Congress, and it certainly won't pass muster now that Democrats do."

Mr. Miller said he'd consider some of the administration's ideas but added "we won't know if the president is seriously committed to the law until we see his budget."

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 25, 2007

Changes proposed to help students in struggling schools

Five years after the signing of the No Child Left Behind Act, which raised the stakes for standardized testing, the Bush administration has released its plans for the next chapter.

The administration's wish list includes keeping the hallmarks of the law -- school accountability based on standardized tests in reading and math -- and making changes to increase its reach, flexibility and ability to improve the lives of students in chronically low-performing schools.

In a conference call from Washington yesterday, U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced the administration's priorities, called "Building on Results: A Blueprint for Strengthening the No Child Left Behind Act." In his State of the Union address Tuesday night, Mr. Bush urged Congress to improve the law -- "without backsliding" -- and to reauthorize it.

Proposed changes include:

Holding schools accountable for achievement on science tests, beginning in 2008-09 at three grade levels, with all students to be proficient by 2019-20.

Expanding on the use of growth models, which look at how much a student grows in a school year, not just the final score, to judge schools.

Providing vouchers -- worth an average of $4,000 per student -- to enable students in chronically low-performing schools to transfer to private or other public schools. The money would include both federal Title I money and newly created Promise Scholarships of $2,500 per student.

Setting up "Opportunity Scholarships" within set geographical areas to help students attend private schools through a local scholarship program.

Fostering charter schools, with the department supporting "all viable charter applications that improve academic outcomes" even if the number exceeds any caps states have.

Permitting school administrators in the most troubled schools to transfer teachers as they see fit despite any collective bargaining agreement to the contrary.

Requiring states to develop by 2010-11 course-level academic standards for English and math that "prepare high school students to succeed in college and the global workplace."

Ms. Spellings emphasized the desire to keep the "core principles," which include having all students proficient in math and reading by 2014 and using annual tests and results broken down by race, income and other factors to hold schools accountable.

In a written statement, Pennsylvania Education Secretary Gerald Zahorchak said the department "supports the fundamental purpose of the act," but the proposal has "some vague areas where the details will be critical to the success of the implementation."

Amy Wilkins, vice president for government affairs and communication at The Education Trust, which works for equal education opportunities, said she's pleased the administration appears to be "holding the line on an accountability system which demands real progress on gap closing," but agreed there are too few details to tell what some of the proposals mean.

Ms. Spellings said some of the proposals focus on "What are we going to do for kids trapped in schools that underperform?"

One way, she said, would be for students to have a chance to attend better-performing schools, including private schools. Others include flexibility in spending tutoring money or other federal funds.

Mr. Bush also had included a voucher proposal the first time around, but that didn't survive a then-Republican controlled Congress. Some observers think it's even less likely to survive a Democrat-controlled one.

Ms. Spellings said the amount of money for NCLB will be announced next week in Mr. Bush's budget proposal. The blueprint states there will be a "substantial increase" in federal Title I money so that more will go to help high school students.

John Tarka, president of the Pittsburgh Federation of Teachers and a member of the NCLB task force of the American Federation of Teachers, said, "Unfortunately, I think that much of what we see in the recommendations [is] pretty much the same old song resung." He said the plan still relies too much on standardized tests.

As for vouchers, he said, "It's one guaranteed way to avoid addressing the true problems. ... What we have to do is work to make sure [public] schools are places where parents and children and the community are happy to have their children."

Andy LeFevre, executive director of REACH Alliance in Harrisburg, a school choice advocacy group, said he thinks vouchers "make perfect sense" and would be enough money to help families.

Ms. Wilkins hopes Congress can reauthorize the act early this year before the presidential election cycle is in full swing.

"The important thing to say is 'stay tuned.' Everybody, including the president, is sort of staking out positions," Ms. Wilkins said.

"The positions people stake out early in the legislative process are rarely where we end up at the end of the process."

Bush Proposes Adding Private School Vouchers To 'No Child' Law (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The Bush administration yesterday unveiled an education plan that would allow poor students at chronically failing public schools to use federal vouchers to attend private and religious schools, angering Democrats who vowed to fight the measure.

The private school vouchers, which on average would be worth $4,000, were among a series of proposals presented yesterday that President Bush hopes will be included in the reauthorization of his signature education initiative, No Child Left Behind.

In a conference call with reporters, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said the initiatives were necessary to help students in the nation's 1,800 most persistently under-performing schools.

"How do we answer the question: What do we do for kids trapped in schools that continue to under-perform?" she said. "Is the promise of No Child Left Behind real?"

Democrats in Congress assailed the plan -- which also would allow low-performing schools to override union contracts or become charter schools despite state laws limiting their creation -- and expressed concern that the politically charged proposals could delay the reauthorization, which is scheduled for this year.

"Ideological proposals like private school vouchers and attacks on collective-bargaining agreements won't help this reauthorization move forward on shared, bipartisan goals," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee.

The plan also includes measures that enjoy bipartisan support. It addresses one of the most persistent criticisms of No Child Left Behind: that schools that meet state testing goals overall but fail in a small category must provide all students in the school with free tutoring or the option to transfer to another school. Under the president's proposal, only students in the categories that failed would receive those options.

The initiative also would hold schools accountable for test scores in science starting in 2008 (the current program holds schools accountable only in reading and math). It also would for the first time require states to publicize their performance on a national test that states are already required to administer.

Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, the nation's largest teachers union, attacked the administration's proposal to allow some school administrators to override labor contracts to push out bad teachers and attract better ones.

"The No Child Left Behind law was designed to close the achievement gap, not to strip collective-bargaining agreements," he said.

The president's plan also would allow mayors to take over chronically failing schools and for those schools to transform themselves into charter schools, even if that would violate a state law capping the number of charter schools.

It was the private school voucher proposal, modeled on a plan implemented in the District in 2004, that seemed to anger some Democrats. The program in the Distict provides $7,500 vouchers, known in the administration as scholarships, to about 1,800 students, from kindergartners to high school seniors, attending 58 private schools.

"We have seen that the sky doesn't fall when kids go to private schools with public money," said Jeanne Allen, president of the Center for Education Reform, who was briefed on the plan in advance by White House staff. "So school choice is not nearly as scary as some congressmen have led us to believe."

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, called the voucher proposal a "bad idea" that was unlikely to gain traction in Congress. "Private school vouchers, which would divert taxpayer dollars away from public schools that need them, have been rejected in the past and nothing has changed to make them acceptable now," he said in a statement.

Spellings insisted that the administration will try to push through even those proposals likely to face stiff resistance in Congress. "I plan to fight hard for the whole kit and caboodle," she said.

New Education Reforms Get Mixed Reviews (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, January 25, 2007

Democrats and teachers' unions are criticizing the Bush administration for proposing to let school officials override collective bargaining agreements and state laws in an effort to reshape the No Child Left Behind law.

The recommendations are part of a plan that Education Secretary Margaret Spellings released Wednesday. It details changes the administration wants in the five-year-old education law, which is up for renewal this year.

The law seeks to ensure that all children can read and do math at grade level by 2014, requirements that have placed unprecedented demands on schools. They have had to increase testing, raise teacher quality and pay more attention to the achievements of minority children.

Spellings told reporters in a conference call that some proposals would meet resistance. But she said it was important to address the problems facing chronically failing schools; her department estimates there are about 1,800 such schools.

"How do we answer the question, 'What are we going to do for kids who are trapped in schools that continue to underperform?'" Spellings asked.

The goal is to free school administrators from parts of local contracts that govern teacher assignments. This is promoted as a way to get good teachers into troubled schools and help push out bad teachers.

Edward McElroy, president of the American Federation of Teachers, said the proposal does not make sense.

"To have a superintendent who is a party to the contract ... then have the authority to override it is silly beyond words," McElroy said.

He said trying to force experienced teachers into troubled schools would lead them to seek jobs elsewhere. "Getting people to go to a school can't be as a result of a coercive act," McElroy said.

A second proposed change would allow local officials to close failing schools and turn them into charter schools, regardless of any state limits on the number of charter schools. These are public schools that sometimes are run by private entities and usually are free of many of the regulations that govern traditional public schools.

The administration says the federal government has the right to include the charter school and contract language in a renewed No Child Left Behind law as strings attached to the billions of dollars in aid it provides to these schools.

Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, chairman of the Senate committee overseeing education issues, said he was disappointed that the administration has proposed "circumventing state law."

Kennedy and union leaders also criticized a proposal that would give students in failing schools private school vouchers. Each scholarship would be worth an estimated $4,000.

"School vouchers divert scarce dollars from underfunded public schools and move us farther from achieving a great public school for every child," said Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, the largest teachers' union.

DOJ_NMG_0121414

The top Republican on the House committee overseeing education indicated the measure would have GOP support.

"If we are truly serious about meeting the goals of No Child Left Behind, we must equip parents with every available option so their children can learn, succeed, and grow," said Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon, R-Calif.

Republicans and Democratic leaders back the administration's plan to stick with the law's 2014 reading and math goal, though some have said it is unrealistic.

A proposal to allow schools to consider how much students progress each year, not just whether they meet specific benchmarks, was applauded by all.

In addition, lawmakers appear willing to consider a proposal that would hold states accountable for students' science scores in addition to the math and reading assessments.

There also seems to be support for requiring states to create standards and tests linked to what students should know when they start college or go to work.

Bush School Rule Changes Affect Chicago (CHIT)

By Stephanie Banchero, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 25, 2007

The Bush administration called Wednesday for Congress to strengthen the No Child Left Behind law by ratcheting up penalties on low-performing schools, giving districts more latitude to transfer teachers to failing schools, and providing poor children vouchers to attend private schools.

The plan, released by the U.S. Department of Education a day after Bush's State of the Union address, also would give districts more power to convert failing schools to charters, even if that meant subverting state-imposed charter caps. Such a move would greatly benefit the Chicago Public Schools system, which has been thwarted from opening more than the state-allowed 30 charter schools.

"I see this as a very vigorous package of proposals that are sound and make sense if taken together," said U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. "This is the president's answer to the question, 'Is the promise of No Child Left Behind real?' If this proposal is not what Congress had in mind, then we all have to ask them what they have in mind."

Spellings will be in Chicago Thursday to tour a charter school and promote the president's proposals.

But the plan already is coming under fire from some Democrats, who object to vouchers, and from teachers union officials, who are opposed to a plan that would allow districts to subvert collective bargaining agreements and move teachers to underperforming schools.

"Once you put vouchers and teacher contracts out there, this is war," declared Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, the nation's largest teachers union. "It appears that, instead of putting forth areas that we have commonality on, they put forth the stuff where they knew there would be no agreement. If we have to go to war, we are certainly prepared to do so."

No Child Left Behind, Bush's signature domestic policy, comes up for renewal this year. The five-year-old act mandates that schools test students in math and reading and holds them accountable for the results. Schools that repeatedly fail are subject to increasing sanctions. Students in those schools can transfer out or receive free tutoring.

Spellings laid out a laundry list of proposals that touch virtually every aspect of public education, from high school reform to teacher quality to penalties for chronically underperforming schools. Many of the proposals, including those that would give schools move flexibility in determining student progress and relaxing requirements on testing special education students, are likely to receive bipartisan support and applause from educators nationwide.

Some proposals, however, are certain to draw fire.

The so-called "Promise Scholarships" will meet stiff resistance. Under the plan, a poor student who attends a chronically failing school would be given a $4,000 voucher, which could be used to transfer to a private school. Bush tried to insert a voucher component into the No Child Left Behind Act five years ago, but it was defeatedby Democrats.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), who chairs the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, already has attacked the voucher proposal. "Once again, he proposes siphoning crucial resources from our public schools—already reeling from increased requirements and budget cuts," Kennedy said in a statement.

Other major changes in the plan include:

Results from state science exams would be used to determine whether schools are meeting federal goals. Currently, only math and reading results are considered.

States would be required to publish a report card that compares student results on state exams with performance on more rigorous national exams.

Students who attend schools where test scores are low for two consecutive years would be eligible for free tutoring. Currently, the school must fail for three years before free tutoring is offered.

States would have to develop assessments that measure whether high school students are prepared for college and must report those results to the public.

A school that has failed for five consecutive years would be required to make substantial changes to its staff or reconstitute the school's governing structure. Currently, schools have a third option that allows them to make minor changes to improve student learning.

What Can Bush Achieve In Two Years? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann, Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2007

The final quarter of George W. Bush's presidency has begun, and a big question looms: Can he achieve anything significant in his remaining time in the White House?

The Democrats now control Congress, a fact of life that was almost palpable when President Bush delivered his State of the Union address Tuesday night in the Capitol. Despite calls for common ground and an end to partisanship, powerful forces in both parties don't see reason for compromise. And the unprecedentedly early and active start to the 2008 presidential campaign leaves little breathing room for key players to work together, away from partisan pressures.

But there is some hope. Both the Democrats in Congress and Mr. Bush, each for their own reasons, need to show accomplishments. The Democrats don't want to lose control of Congress in two years, after fighting so hard to regain it. And Bush has his legacy and the Republican Party's image to consider. Polls show the public clamoring for an end to the intense partisanship that has dominated national policymaking since the 1990s.

The first half of Bush's State of the Union speech, that portion devoted to domestic policy, was crafted to identify areas of possible cooperation between the parties. In taking that approach, the president showed a clear recognition that the political environment has changed dramatically since his reelection.

"On healthcare and certainly immigration and on energy, there is a possibility that the two sides can meet again," says Stephen Wayne, a political scientist at Georgetown University in Washington. "A lot depends on the willingness of the president to compromise, and his willingness to share credit with the Democrats."

The 800-pound gorilla in the wider policy mix is Iraq. The war's unpopularity with the American people, and Bush's chronically low job-approval ratings, give him little political capital with which to work. The president's controversial decision to boost the US presence in Baghdad and Anbar Province by 21,500 troops may be absorbing whatever capital he has left.

Despite Bush's repeated pleas for Americans to give the plan a chance, including in the State of the Union, he faces increasingly bipartisan challenges to it in Congress. The biggest blow came on Monday, when Sen. John Warner of Virginia – the top Republican on the Armed Services Committee – introduced a resolution opposing the plan. Wednesday, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee began consideration of a resolution rejecting Bush's plan, with strong support from committee Democrats and at least one Republican, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Even supporters of the plan are challenging the president over Iraq in ways unheard of before. One supporter in the House, Republican leader John Boehner, is calling for a monthly report from the administration that would gauge progress on military, political, and social benchmarks set for Iraq.

The fact that Bush spent fully half of his State of the Union address on Iraq, Iran, and the war on terror – after much advance focus on the speech's domestic initiatives – demonstrates how central these foreign-policy matters will be to the remainder of Bush's presidency.

Still, if the potential for success in Iraq in the next two years remains an open question, the president clearly wants to show that he is not consumed by Iraq and can address matters closer to home. Among other things, he said he would soon submit a budget plan that would run in the black after five years. He called on Congress to cut the number of legislative earmarks – special-interest items slipped into bills at the last minute – by half in this session.

But his two biggest domestic items were his healthcare and energy initiatives.

On healthcare (see story), Bush called for legislation that would establish tax deductions for health-insurance payments worth $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. Employer-financed benefits greater than that would become taxable income under this plan.

About 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would get a tax reduction, according to the White House, while 20 percent would see their taxes go up. Those currently uninsured might find healthcare within their reach.

"Changing the tax code is a vital and necessary step to making healthcare affordable for more Americans," said Bush.

Critics, such as Rep. Pete Stark (D) of California, chairman of the House Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health, say that the poor pay little in taxes in any case, and thus a tax deduction is worth less to them than to wealthier Americans.

Representative Stark says he won't even consider holding hearings on the subject. Administration officials insist that critics' attitudes toward the proposal may change.

"This is a bold, new proposal. It's going to take some time for people to absorb it and to understand it," said Joel Kaplan, deputy chief of staff for policy, at a briefing for reporters.

On energy, Bush called for a 20 percent reduction in gasoline usage by 2017. "When we do that, we will have cut our total imports by the equivalent of three-quarters of all the oil we now import from the Middle East," said Bush.

This gas cut would be achieved mainly through a huge increase in the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels blended into the fuel supply, under government mandate. The administration also proposed raising the fuel-economy standards for passenger cars.

An energy change of this magnitude would be huge. Producing the necessary ethanol could require the conversion of at least 30 million acres – possibly the biggest change in American land use since the Civil War, according to Steven McCormick, president of the Nature Conservancy.

"That will have serious implications for both water and soil quality and wildlife habitat," said Mr. McCormick in a statement. "It could also significantly raise the cost of gasoline impacting local economies."

In addition to substance, the atmospherics of Bush's address provided plenty of fodder for commentary among members. From inside the hall, the high point seemed to come when Bush and Nancy Pelosi (D) of California – the first woman speaker – stepped up to the podium amid tumultuous applause. After that, political reality seemed to set in.

"He was down. His heart wasn't in it. He overreacted to the number of Democrats. He's facing the last two years without a whole lot of pleasure," said Sen. John Rockefeller (D) of West Virginia.

Republicans looked for the silver lining in an evening that featured as much nonapplause as applause, as members sought to show displeasure at times by sitting on their hands. But it could have been worse for Bush, some suggested.

"He made it tough for his critics to be too hard on him by repeatedly emphasizing opportunities to work together and find common ground," especially on issues such as energy independence and health care, said Rep. John Shadegg (R) of Arizona.

Senate Firefighters (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Despite the raging controversy over Iraq military policy, President Bush's plea for bipartisan cooperation on the domestic agenda has a chance of success in the Senate. The reason has less to do with sympathy for the politically weakened chief executive than a dynamic that has gone largely unnoticed among the senators themselves.

Since the midterm election created a near-even balance in the Senate -- 51 Democrats and 49 Republicans -- serious efforts at cross-party communication have developed momentum.

Forty senators showed up on Jan. 9 for the first of a planned series of weekly 8 a.m. breakfasts designed to provide neutral ground where lawmakers of both parties can meet, rather than caucusing separately.

Yesterday, some 60 top Senate staffers of both parties held a similar breakfast session aimed at obliterating party lines and fostering personal relationships.

The core of the "Gang of 14" -- the self-selected bipartisan caucus that negotiated the compromise on judicial filibusters and averted an explosion in the Senate in 2005 -- has reconstituted itself as a "fire department" ready to douse other blazes.

And at the top, Majority Leader Harry Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell have forged a personal relationship of unusual trust, and already they have used it to rescue landmark ethics legislation from threatened defeat and steer it to overwhelming passage.

All this has happened in the first weeks of a session in which the Senate had to adjust to a sudden shift of party control from Republicans to Democrats. No comparable spirit has developed in the House of Representatives, where the new Republican minority is complaining bitterly that dissenting views have been stifled.

There is no guarantee that the budding spirit of fellowship among senators will survive the Iraq debates and persist into the spring and summer, when other big issues reach the point of decision. But as Bush suggested in his State of the Union address, at least some issues -- education, immigration, health care, energy and the environment -- are open to bipartisan approaches.

The powerful current toward consensus-building flowing through the Senate has two sources. Politicians who were at home last autumn had their ears burned by constituents frustrated by the partisanship of the past Congress and its failure to act on issues of national concern. "The last election was a resounding repudiation of the status quo," said Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine, one of the few Republican survivors in New England.

And senators themselves are weary of excessive partisanship. "All our time is spent in team meetings, playing petty kindergarten games about what we're going to do to each other," said Republican Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, referring to the party caucuses.

Snowe and Alexander became ringleaders in two of the efforts to break down party barriers. Alexander teamed with Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, reelected as an independent Democrat, as co-hosts of the new Tuesday morning breakfasts for senators of both parties.

With senators seated at round tables of eight, and the seats alternating between Republicans and Democrats, the breakfasts feature five-minute briefings by a pair of senators from opposite parties on an issue about to reach the floor, followed by 20 minutes of discussion of that issue and a half-hour of general conversation. No votes are taken; no policy set. But senators, without staff, get to listen to each other and build personal bonds.

After skipping a week for the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday, the second such breakfast was held Tuesday, and 24 senators showed up, even though they were not expected to return to Congress until that night's State of the Union address. Lieberman and Alexander are hopeful the weekly breakfasts will become a staple on senators' calendars.

At the head of the reinvigorated core group of the Gang of 14 are Snowe and Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu of Louisiana. They have no fixed meeting schedule but a readiness to intervene if the opposing parties seem headed for gridlock.

Landrieu explained her motivation: "The success of the Gang of 14 was not just a success for the Senate. It was also a very personally rewarding experience. We met for rather long periods, with no staff allowed, and literally talked and listened very quietly. That experience changed me; it made me think we need to do this more often -- find a quiet time and use it to search for common ground."

The two efforts are complementary -- not in competition. The Snowe-Landrieu common ground group will work on policy; the Lieberman-Alexander breakfasts are primarily social. But Lieberman expressed the hope of all the organizers when he said, "We're trying to change the atmosphere here and make agreement a little easier to come by."

Democrats Hedge On Bipartisan Pledge (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

House Democrats say they intend to honor their pledge to allow Republicans to participate in writing legislation, but they won't say when.

"I said we were going to be fair, not stupid," said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, adding he is wary of Republicans using amendment votes as ammunition for future campaign attack ads.

"But we do intend to engage, involve and allow Republicans to have substantive opportunities as we consider legislation," the Maryland Democrat told reporters. "We want Republicans to have the opportunity to offer amendments in committee [and] amendments on the floor."

He still hasn't said when the majority will open up the amendment process, known as using "regular rules."

That prompted Minority Leader John A. Boehner yesterday to introduce a resolution rebuking House Democrats.

"We've extended the hand of friendship to each other in hopes of working together for the common good," the Ohio Republican said. "Unfortunately, the hand of friendship is being slapped away by the actions of the majority. You simply can't talk about cooperation at the same time you're circumventing the rules of the House to shut the other side out."

The resolution died in a party-line vote.

"The Republicans have a problem," spokesman Drew Hammill said. "They are having a hard time finding issues to talk about and today's comments by Mr. Boehner are further evidence of that."

The new Democratic majority suspended regular rules to hurry passage of its "100-hours" agenda, including legislation to raise the minimum wage, authorize more stem-cell research funding, subsidize lower student-loan interest rates and end oil-industry subsidies.

The bills passed and the 100-hour rush ended a week ago, but regular rules "remain suspended."

"Just treat us the way you [had] asked to be treated," Mr. Boehner told Mr. Hoyer earlier this week during debate of a bill to which Republicans were not allowed to offer amendments.

The bill, which would ban federal pensions for members of Congress convicted of certain crimes while in office, passed in a unanimous vote Tuesday.

Without regular rules, Republicans couldn't offer amendments that would have expanded the list of pension-losing crimes, including some unrelated to abuse of office -- ranging from white-collar embezzlement crimes to political crimes such as securing campaign contributions by intimidation.

"My colleagues on this side of the aisle want to participate," Mr. Boehner said. "We want to work with the majority in the best interest of the American people, and we can do that together. But the only way to do that is to go through regular order."

The debate of the bill -- and the rules -- grew heated as Republicans repeatedly raised objections.

"The process has been shut down to us, and that is why we are upset," said Rep. Lee Terry, Nebraska Republican, who supported the bill, but wanted to offer an amendment to strengthen it.

Mr. Hoyer said he sympathized.

"It's difficult to be in the minority," he said. "I feel your pain. I want you to know that."

The Democrats' Rude Rebuff (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

When President Bush called for a bipartisan "special advisory council" of congressional leaders on the war against terrorism in his State of the Union address, he had in his pocket a rude rejection from Democratic leaders. Thank you very much, said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, but no thank you.

Three days earlier, Reid and Pelosi wrote a letter to the president turning down his offer (which was contained in his Jan. 10 speech on Iraq) to establish a council consisting of Democratic chairmen and ranking Republican members of the relevant committees. "We believe that Congress already has bipartisan structures in place," they said, adding: "We look forward to working with you within existing structures."

That could be the most overt snub of a presidential overture since Abraham Lincoln was told that Gen. George B. McClellan had retired for the night and could not see him. Courtesy aside, it shows that the self-confident Democratic leadership is uninterested in being cut into potentially disastrous outcomes in Iraq. It wants to function as a coordinate branch of government, not as friendly colleagues in the spirit of bipartisanship. Pelosi and several Democratic committee chairmen are leaving for Iraq on Friday.

In his Jan. 10 speech, Bush called for a "new, bipartisan working group that will help us come together across party lines to win the war on terror." That prompted the Pelosi-Reid letter of Jan. 19 rejecting the offer.

Bush made a mistake in attributing the idea to Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, who as the Senate's only self-identified Independent Democrat is estranged from his colleagues who are unmodified Democrats. These former comrades are not charmed by the prospect of Lieberman pontificating as a member of the "working group" by virtue of his chairmanship of the Senate Homeland Security Committee.

But Lieberman was not the reason for the speaker and majority leader's rebuff. The Democratic leadership is beyond consultation on Iraq, as demonstrated by the selection of Sen. Jim Webb to deliver the party's response to the president Tuesday night. Webb, whose unexpected election in Virginia last year gave Democrats a Senate majority, is a hard-edged critic of the war not interested in bipartisanship. Discarding staff-written talking points, professional writer Webb declared: "The president took us into this war recklessly."

Webb's astringent comments contrasted sharply with Bush's tone, which indicated he still has not shed illusions that he carried from Austin to Washington in 2001. Congressional Democrats are nothing like the tame Democrats in the Texas Legislature whom Bush dealt with as governor. On Tuesday night, Bush ignored issues dear to the conservative base such as embryonic stem cell research, abortion and same-sex marriage. Delivering his State of the Union on the day after the annual March for Life on the anniversary of Roe v. Wade, Bush did not see fit to mention the abortion issue, which is important to so many of his supporters.

Instead, the president talked about goals, though not methods, dear to Democratic hearts: expanded health insurance, energy independence and federal aid for local education. Bush was reminiscent of President Bill Clinton in sprinkling his speech with small proposals that might be popular. Yet Democrats immediately indicated that all such Bush plans have no chance of passage.

Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), chairman of the relevant Ways and Means subcommittee, immediately declared that Bush's serious effort to improve health insurance coverage was dead on arrival, without the benefit of hearings. Stark has been notoriously cantankerous, whether in the majority or minority, during 17 terms in the House. But his attitude dominates today's Democratic side of the aisle.

On both sides, the prevailing attitude is that Bush looks like a president at bay. Statements made to me this week by two prominent political figures, one from each party, were so candid that these sources did not want to be quoted by name.

The Republican, a ranking House committee member, said: "The president and his aides are irrelevant and out of touch, removed from realizing what happened in the election." A Democratic state party leader said that "Bush is in such bad shape that the result of the 2008 election is already decided." In that atmosphere, pleas for consultation go nowhere.

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Fallout from the war in Iraq, which already has weakened President Bush among the general public and in Congress, now is causing problems with the group that has been his mainstay: social and economic conservatives.

These longtime loyalists, appreciative of Mr. Bush's record on issues ranging from tax cuts to his veto of federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, also have supported his war policies. But Mr. Bush's annual State of the Union message Tuesday night aggravated their underlying fear: that the president might become so consumed by the worsening conflict in Iraq -- and chastened by Democrats' takeover of Congress -- that he will give up on the issues they care about.

Yesterday morning, the weekly meeting of conservatives that is convened by antitax activist Grover Norquist, a White House ally, was marked by "tense exchanges" with administration press secretary Tony Snow over border enforcement and Mr. Bush's immigration proposals, according to conservative activists.

Conservatives are becoming more openly critical, adding to the president's woes and emboldening Democrats for battles ahead. Increasingly, they are looking beyond Mr. Bush for a new standard-bearer, though no one in Republicans' emerging 2008 presidential field has yet captured conservatives.

Meanwhile, their most recent nemesis -- the Democrats' 2004 nominee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry -- announced yesterday that he will not run ion 2008.

In a video circulated on the Internet soon after Mr. Bush's speech, entitled "A Lifeless State of the Union," President Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council, one of the nation's most active conservative groups opposing abortion and same-sex marriage, took note of the president's unbowed determination on the war, a subject which accounted for nearly half of his address to the new Democratic-led Congress.

"However," Mr. Perkins said in the video, "that same clear and concise determination to defend the culture of America was missing. I believe the president failed in challenging the new majority to join him in addressing core family and cultural issues....The president failed to draw a line in the sand on behalf of life."

It was perhaps Mr. Perkins' harshest public criticism of the president. Even so, he said in an interview yesterday, "My staff felt that it was way too kind."

Aside from the lengthy closing section on Iraq and the war on terror, Mr. Bush devoted the first part of his nationally televised address to a range of domestic issues, including education, energy, health care and immigration control. Gone were his past calls for big tax cuts, or even making permanent the ones in law, for overhauling Social Security to create individual retirement accounts or for a constitutional ban on same-sex marriage.

The president devoted one paragraph to his call for reining in the unsustainable growth in spending for big social programs -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- a cause that had been a major feature of his past two State of the Union speeches. But absent was the demand for Social Security private accounts, or even last year's proposal for a bipartisan entitlements commission to tackle the problem. Mr. Bush never did create that commission, as numerous figures contacted by the White House demurred, including former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, believing that neither the president nor Democrats were willing to compromise.

The Institute for Policy Innovation, a conservative organization espousing free-market ideas, gave Mr. Bush credit for continuing to raise the entitlements issue. "But he lacked leadership in that he failed to propose any solutions," the group said in a statement. It recalled that he previously had proposed carving out personal accounts for Social Security funds, "but he has never proposed a specific plan."

In fairness to the president, said the American Conservative Union's longtime chairman, David Keene, "most of the things he cared about getting done have either been done, or rejected." Moreover, he said, Mr. Bush "decided to be conciliatory and I understand that," given Democrats' control of Congress. "But there should have been one or two things...with appeal to his base," he said. Mr. Keene suggested the president should have ruled out any tax increases.

Meanwhile, he said, "People are looking past Bush. It's all about the future."

But the early frontrunners among Republicans -- Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York City Mayor Rudy Guiliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- all have problems among conservatives. The two Republican aspirants with the most appeal are Kansas's Republican Sen. Sam Brownback and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

President's Sin Of Omission? (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The president in his State of the Union address Tuesday night left out a tiny little suffix that means a whole lot to some people. He did it so subtly you could have missed it. Just a little "-ic." What's in an "-ic"?

Bush started the speech on a bipartisan note, honoring the first Madam Speaker, Democrat Nancy Pelosi, and calling on the country to come together.

Then: "I congratulate the Democrat majority," he said, dropping the last two letters from "Democratic."

Bush does this a lot, and while it's hard to say if the omission was intentional in this instance, it is a semantic tactic that's been part of Republican warfare for decades. It's a little thing, a means of needling the opposition by purposefully mispronouncing its name, and of suggesting that the party on the left is not truly small-"d" democratic. The president's pronunciation was all the more striking because it was apparently not what Bush was supposed to say. The prepared speech that the White House distributed beforehand retained that precious "-ic."

The case of the missing suffix provoked an oh-no-he-di'int reaction from some Democrats. The bloggers caught it, of course. (Bloggers catch that sort of thing.) "Code word," wrote one. "Calculated insult," wrote another.

"We all noticed," says Markos Moulitsas ZÃºniga, founder of the liberal blogging site DailyKos.com, who replayed the president's opening words on his TiVo to make sure he'd heard what he thought he heard. "He just clearly couldn't help himself."

Tuesday on CNN, Democratic strategist Paul Begala noted the omission right after it happened, adding that the president was being "insulting" and "self-defeating." Republican strategist Mike Murphy chided Begala, saying that if this was his "biggest complaint, I think the president had a pretty good night."

But for those who see a big symbol in two little letters, the question becomes: Is a man who can't say "-ic" capable of being bipartisan?

"He offers this olive branch," Begala says. "Boom, 10 seconds later, he drops the hammer, insults the party and he winks at his base. . . . It tells you what's in his heart. It tells you that he has no damn desire to compromise."

The missing "-ic" has a long legacy. Dick Armey was fond of saying "Democrat Party." Commie-hunting Sen. Joseph McCarthy even used the phrase half a century ago. Bush used it Tuesday night even as he was calling for politicians to "cross that aisle," even in the context of a formal address and even as he addressed a Congress dominated by those he was insulting.

Or not. Could the word have been unintentional?

"It's hard to disentangle whether that's an intentional slight at the opposition, or traditional problems with the president's vocabulary," says Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University.

"I doubt if it was a conscious slight," says nonpartisan political analyst Charlie Cook. "I think it was just a force of habit." When it comes to omitting the "-ic," Republicans "have been doing it so long that they probably don't even realize they're doing it."

"Even More Of A Hodgepodge Than Usual" (WSJ)

By David Frum

DOJ_NMG_0121421

WASHINGTON -- On State of the Union night, Americans witnessed two President Bushes. The first President Bush delivered a firm foreign policy message in tones of passion and commitment. The second President Bush dragged his way wearily through a domestic agenda that seemed to interest him as little as it excited Congress.

The first President Bush pledged himself to bold free-market reforms in health care -- including the removal of a treasured but destructive tax loophole from the wealthy and powerful. The second President Bush proposed to regulate America's way to energy security with a plan that might have been dusted off from the Carter administration.

The first President Bush insisted that the budget can be balanced without raising taxes. The second shrugged off Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security as problems for later.

The first President Bush spoke with realism about the generational struggle against Islamic extremism. The second President Bush offered false hopes about the good intentions of the government of Saudi Arabia and other sometime allies.

There is a famous story of President Franklin Roosevelt listening to a passionate debate between protectionists and free-traders. As the argument ended, he turned to his speechwriters and said: "Weave them both together." All States of the Union mix the high and the low, big ideas and petty compromises, soaring rhetoric and Baby Einstein bathos. But SOTU 2007 seemed even more of a hodgepodge than usual -- and much will turn on whether it is the first or second George Bush who sets the nation's course in the 24 months ahead.

Compare and contrast the president's health and energy ideas. On health care, he focused intensely on the fundamental problem in the American system: Tax subsidies have encouraged Americans to demand that their employers buy health insurance for them rather than shopping for themselves. That core error is responsible for almost everything wrong with the health market in the U.S. It dulls consumers' sensitivity to the cost of insurance. It discourages insurers from competing against each other. It tempts state legislators to pile appealing but expensive mandates onto insurance companies. I might want to buy a cheaper policy without acupuncture coverage, but I'm not paying attention and the acupuncture lobby is.

The president's plan identifies the problem and responds to it in a targeted way, by taking the first step toward negating the distorting subsidy. The ghost of George Stigler is smiling somewhere.

But now look to the president's misdirected, wasteful energy proposals. The president wants the country to use 20% less gasoline in 10 years. To that end, he proposes that government regulators tell Americans which fuels to use, which cars to buy and which industries should grow. This time, Stigler was not smiling -- but Iowa's Sen. Chuck Grassley practically danced a jig.

Does 20% over 10 years sound like a lot? After the Iranian oil shock of 1979, Americans cut their gasoline use by 15% in just two years -- and they did not catch up again to their 1978 levels of gasoline competition until 1993.

The "energy policy" that accomplished this amazing conservation achievement can be summed up in two words: higher prices. When energy prices rise, consumers conserve and substitute. When energy prices drop, consumers don't bother. And guess what? These market processes still work. Americans used less petroleum in 2006 than they did in 2005. Reduced demand led to lower prices.

If policy makers fear that today's lower prices will induce consumers to stop conserving, they do not need to reinvent Jimmy Carter's Moral Equivalent of War. Just slap a tax on gasoline at the pump, or on petroleum by the barrel, or on Venezuelan, Russian and Persian Gulf imports, or even on all forms of energy, period -- and consumers and producers will respond the way they always do. No regulations, no bureaucracy required.

The President Bush who delivered the health-care portions of the State of the Union clearly understood the power of pricing. Why not the president who delivered the energy portions?

The answer may be revealed by the contrast between president's listlessness as he discussed domestic policy and the vigor with which he addressed national security. With Congress in opposition hands, with his own agenda completed or discarded, and with a huge and difficult war to fight, the president's attention has focused abroad. That often happens to second-term presidents -- but rarely as completely as with George W. Bush. As he tersely noted, the fight America entered in Iraq is not the fight America is now in. The U.S. has stumbled into a much bigger and more dangerous war than the administration expected or planned for. Its political opponents believe the war already lost. The first President Bush is still fighting to win. It was powerfully symbolic of the difference between the president and his critics that Democrats declined to rise and applaud his call, "Let us find our resolve, and turn events toward victory."

Yet with his presidency and place in history dependent on Iraq, the president still finds it difficult to shake the restraints and illusions that have done so much damage to America's efforts since 9/11. He acknowledges that the deadliest insurgents in Iraq are supported by Iran. Yet he did not use this fact to rally public support for a more assertive approach to the threat.

He accepts that the U.S. is waging a global struggle not just against terrorism but against "extremism" -- and though he will not call it "Islamic extremism" he did refer to "Shia and Sunni extremists," which represents at least a fair approximation.

But then, why does Saudi Arabia rate a mention as a partner in that generational struggle? Especially when, as by now the whole world knows, Saudi Arabia is the leading bankroller of the global system of propaganda and incitement behind Sunni extremism? The president calls the war a "global struggle against extremism" -- and immediately names Saudi Arabia a partner in the struggle. And while he declines to name Pakistan as a partner, neither will he publicly acknowledge how much the re-emergent Taliban owe to the support and protection of a country that he praised as a coalition partner in his State of the Union of 2005.

Perhaps the answer to all these questions can be found in this: The sixth and seventh years of a presidency are the years when presidents discover their office's limits -- and their own. All presidents end up trying to stretch too little sheet over too much bed. We want them to be bold but not adventurous, flexible but not vacillating, resolute without stubbornness, confident without cocksureness. Above all, we want them to pursue great and uncertain goals -- and yet to achieve consistent success. The men and women who seek the office believe themselves capable of all those things. They have to, or they would not dare. And then they, and we, know great disappointment.

But that is not usually the end of the story. The story ends much later on, when partisan rancor cools, when the results come in, and the record can be read in full. When that day at last arrives for this president, perhaps all Americans will be able to agree that this most divisive of figures united in himself both the first President Bush and the second, both the president who sometimes erred and stumbled -- and also the man who nonetheless kept fighting. George W. Bush has always been at his best in adversity. Americans face no shortage of adversity now.

Mr. Frum, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, served as a speechwriter to President Bush in 2001-2002.

Long On Rhetoric, Short On Sorrow (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

President Bush showed what he does well at the beginning of the State of the Union ceremony when he graciously acknowledged and introduced Nancy Pelosi as speaker of the House of Representatives. He seemed both generous and sincere, and it was the right touch for a genuinely historic moment.

At the end of his speech he introduced four Americans of whom the nation can be proud, including Wesley Autrey, a New Yorker who made like a Hollywood stunt man to save the life of a stricken passenger who had fallen onto the tracks in front of an oncoming subway train.

The rest of the evening was a study in governmental dysfunction. The audience kept mindlessly applauding — up and down, like marionettes — when in fact there was nothing to applaud. The state of the union is wretched, which is why the president's approval ratings are the worst since Nixon and Carter.

If Mr. Bush is bothered by his fall from political grace, it wasn't showing on Tuesday night. He seemed as relaxed as ever, smiling, signing autographs, glad-handing.

I wanted to hear him talk about the suffering of the soldiers he has put in harm's way, and the plight of the residents of New Orleans. I wanted to hear him express a little in the way of sorrow for the many thousands who have died unnecessarily on his watch. I wanted to see him slip the surly bonds of narcissism and at least acknowledge the human wreckage that is the sum and substance of his sustained folly.

But this is a president who runs when empathy calls. While others are monitoring the casualty lists, he's off to the gym. At least Lyndon Johnson had the decency to agonize over the losses he unleashed in Vietnam.

The State of the Union speech was boilerplate at a time when much of the country, with good reason, is boiling mad. The United States, the most powerful nation in the history of the world, seems paralyzed. It can't extricate itself from the war in Iraq, can't rebuild the lost city of New Orleans, can't provide health care for all of its citizens, can't come up with a sane energy policy in the era of global warming, can't even develop a thriving public school system.

If it's true, as President Bush told his audience, that "much is asked of us," it's equally true that very little has been delivered.

But such a timid crowd!

Ask a potential Democratic president what he or she would do about the war, and you'll get a doctoral dissertation about the importance of diplomacy, the possibility of a phased withdrawal (but not too quick), the need for Iraqis to help themselves and figure out a way to divvy up the oil, and so on and so forth.

A straight answer? Surely you jest. The Democrats remind me of the boxer in the Bonnie Raitt lyric who was "afraid to throw a punch that might land."

There's a hole in the American system where the leadership used to be. The country that led the miraculous rebuilding effort in the aftermath of World War II can't even build an adequate system of levees on its own Gulf Coast.

The most effective answer to this leadership vacuum would be a new era of political activism by ordinary citizens. The biggest, most far-reaching changes of the past century — the labor movement, the civil rights movement, the women's movement — were not primarily the result of elective politics, but rather the hard work of committed citizen-activists fed up with the status quo.

It's time for thoughtful citizens to turn off their TVs and step into the public arena. Protest. Attend meetings. Circulate petitions. Run for office. I suspect the public right now is way ahead of the politicians when it comes to ideas about creating a more peaceful, more equitable, more intelligent society.

The candidates for the most part are listening to their handlers and gurus and fat-cat contributors, which is the antithesis of democracy. It's not easy for ordinary men and women to be heard above that self-serving din, but it can be done.

Voters should listen to Dwight Eisenhower, who said in 1954:

"Politics ought to be the part-time profession of every citizen who would protect the rights and privileges of free people and who would preserve what is good and fruitful in our national heritage."

Bush, Democrats Play "Old Politics." Voters Want "New" (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, January 25, 2007

A new, non-polarized, problem-solving politics is trying to be born in this country, but — lip service aside — most current politicians are stuck in the old model of nonstop partisan warfare.

Bush enunciated — once again — the clear message of the 2006 elections: "Our citizens don't care which side of the aisle we sit on —as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done."

The agenda he offered created some opportunities for bipartisan agreement — notably, comprehensive immigration reform and reauthorization of the No Child Left Behind program — but most Democratic commentary emphasized the negative.

In the main, Democrats gave a nod to the public's desire for bipartisan cooperation, then quickly dismissed Bush's proposals as inadequate or wrong-headed.

Typical was the reaction of Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.). "I welcome the president's change in tone," he said. "But though [Bush's] tone sounds more accepting of other views, his basic policies so far have not changed."

The same kind of message came from Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and the Democrats' official SOTU responder, Sen. Jim Webb (Va.).

Webb, in particular, exuded the old politics, accusing Bush of starting the Iraq War "recklessly" and likening current economic disparities to the early 1900s, when "the dispossessed workers at the bottom were threatening revolt."

Bush should get U.S. troops out of Iraq and "take action" — unspecified — about "inequality," Webb said. "If he does, we will join him. If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

The leading exponent of a new politics is Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), whose fantastic appeal lies, I think, both in his personal charisma and his promise to answer the public's hunger for nonpartisan politics — or "post-partisan" politics, as California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) calls it.

Obama had it exactly right in announcing his presidential exploratory committee last week. "America has faced big problems before," he said. "But today, our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, common-sense way.

"Politics has become bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solution," he said. "We have to change our politics and come together around our common interests and concerns as Americans."

As various commentators have said, Obama represents a new generational sensibility — a pragmatic post-boomer attitude trying to bypass the ideological hang-ups of boomer veterans of the Vietnam and cultural struggles of the 1960s.

In fact, there are multiple bipartisan efforts under way to promote consensus solutions to various problems, even some of them in Congress, such as the Senate's "bipartisan caucus" started by Sens. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) and Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.).

In recent weeks, several "strange bedfellows" coalitions have announced agreements to work together on health care and education reform. One collection, including formerly hostile groups such as the liberal Families USA, the conservative U.S. Chamber of Commerce and America's Health Insurance Plans, announced a cooperative effort to cover all of America's

9 million uninsured children by expanding the State Children's Health Insurance Program.

Another coalition was formed by AARP, the Service Employees International Union and the Business Roundtable to jointly address both health care and the nation's long-term fiscal crisis.

Two House Members, conservative Tom Price (R-Ga.) and liberal Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.), and moderate Sens. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) and Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) are co-sponsoring measures to encourage states to experiment to cover the uninsured, as Massachusetts, California, Pennsylvania and other states are doing.

Bush, virtually ignoring such approaches, came up with a novel alternative to make health care more affordable by offering families a $15,000 tax deduction to buy insurance — paying for it by limiting deductions for more expensive plans.

Without even a hearing, the plan was declared "DOA" by old-politics Democrats, including influential Reps. Pete Stark (Calif.) and John Dingell (Mich.).

Obama, encouragingly, granted that Bush's proposal was "serious" and should be addressed "in a constructive way." But he also declared that "incremental plans that do nothing to bring down costs or guarantee coverage are simply no longer sufficient" and added that "it's not going to be adequate."

Indeed, a Treasury Department analysis shows that Bush's plan will cover only 5 million of the nation's 47 million uninsured, although White House officials said it would actually cover more.

It's not health care, but the Iraq War, that mainly prevents the new politics from being born. Beyond that, presidential candidates will be pressured by ideological activists to keep the old wars alive. But, the new politics is coming because the public wants it. It will just take courage and vision to give it life.

As Jimmy Carter's dismal presidency drew to a close, his field of vision was narrowed to an embassy in Tehran. On Richard Nixon's last day, all he could see was a tape recorder. When Lyndon Johnson left office, all was forgotten but Vietnam. After his speech to the nation last week urging a larger troop commitment in Iraq, it seemed President Bush was destined to go down the same narrowing road to oblivion.

But his State of the Union speech Tuesday night boldly broadened his presidential agenda and vision. He once again became the president of the United States, not the mayor of Baghdad. By articulating viable, and potentially bi-partisan, proposals on energy independence, global climate change, healthcare, immigration reform, education standards and a host of other issues, he renewed the 360-degree mandate that should be the span of vision of any president.

And even as he hewed to a strict line on Iraq, he broadened his foreign policy vision to encompass the danger posed by Iran's potential for acquiring nuclear weapons and his domestic agenda to highlight his administration's breathtaking success in thwarting terrorist attacks at home. Missing only was a focus on North Korea, which cannot be allowed to keep its nuclear arsenal without provoking a nuclear arms race among China, Japan and North Korea that will leave Washington, Seoul, Tokyo and Beijing scared to death.

President Bush even found time to discuss his singular achievements: the economy, oil prices and the falling deficit. In recent months he has seemed to ignore his own track record as he pleaded for a longer tenure in Iraq. But the economy is growing nicely and its surging tax revenues — particularly from capital gains — lead some experts to predict the same kind of rapid deficit eradication as buoyed Clinton's last years as president. And oil prices are dropping; we see their reflection as gas prices hover around $2 per gallon.

George W. Bush finally seems to have grasped a crucial but ironic fact: The only way he can keep sufficient credibility and power to continue his commitment to victory in Iraq is to raise his approval ratings. The presidency's inherent powers are largely titular unless animated by national support and popularity. While an unpopular president still gets the corner office, his practical ability to act is severely constrained. There is an ongoing need for a daily majority in his national approval ratings for him to govern.

But the only way he can get those ratings — in order to continue to fight in Iraq — is to talk about issues other than Iraq! Even if the war begins to go well, the blood and violence will continue and he will always come out on the short end of the national debate about the war. But if he expands his constituency by addressing issues like global warming, energy independence, and the Iranian and North Korean nuclear threats, he can achieve the approval ratings he needs to govern — and to fight on in Iraq.

Americans will always make time to listen up when the subject is the possibility of a nuclear war. Bush can command a national consensus as he moves against Iran and North Korea. We will pay close attention to anything he does to reduce our dependence on foreign oil and will hail any initiatives that lead to greater consumption of alternatives to gasoline. And Americans are sufficiently cognizant of the dangers posed by climate change to welcome the president to the fold if he indicates a real desire to turn the corner and stop the progression of deadly worldwide warming.

In our hearts and our heads, we realize that the stakes involved in these issues are more important than those in Iraq. If Bush leads the way on these subjects, Americans will follow and even cheer. If he insists on slogging on in Iraq, a majority will continue to be pessimistic and discouraged, but Bush will still be able to summon their support by a focus on the broader agenda on display in Tuesday's address.

By Michael D. Shear

Liberal bloggers, national pundits and local Virginia politicians said the freshman senator's critique of the economy and the Iraq war was among the best retorts to Bush's administration they could remember.

"In office only three weeks, [Webb] managed to convey a muscular liberalism -- with personal touches -- that left President Bush's ordinary address in the dust," Jonathan Alter said on Newsweek's Web site.

In his speech, Webb ignored the laundry list of issues that many of his predecessors have felt compelled to mention in such responses. Instead, he focused on only two issues: the economic divide between rich and poor and the difficulties in Iraq. He campaigned on the same themes last year.

Jeff Cohen, writing on the Huffington Post, a liberal blog, cited the nine-minute speech's "stirring appeal, both progressive and patriotic," and said it would have broad appeal for "swing voters, NASCAR dads, soccer moms, even Republican leaners."

Not all of the reaction was positive. Conservatives scoffed at Webb's less-than-animated demeanor. One blog headline commented on Webb's constant seriousness with the headline: "Dem Response: Countdown to Webb's Aneurysm."

"Senator Webb's logic was as incoherent as his language (the two are often related)," wrote Michael J. Gerson, a former Bush speechwriter, also on the Newsweek site. "No 'precipitous withdrawal' -- but retreat 'in short order.' Fight the war on terror vigorously -- except where the terrorists have chosen to fight it. It is, perhaps, a good thing that James Webb earned a job as senator. As a speechwriter he would starve."

Webb, who has written several books, said in a radio interview Wednesday morning that he threw away the first draft of the speech suggested by Democratic leaders in Congress. He wrote a new draft that became the speech he delivered Tuesday night.

The speech did not specifically offer a solution to the war or attack the president's plan to send an additional 21,000 troops to Iraq. But Wednesday, Webb issued a statement saying that he supports a bipartisan resolution opposing the plan for such an increase.

"It is inverted political logic for people to say that we need to continue in this direction for the good of our troops," Webb said in the statement.

But Webb did receive praise from some conservatives. Columnist David Brooks called Webb's speech "intense," "eloquent" and "forceful." Liberal counterpart Mark Shields said "it was a strong, tough statement, and surprising in its intensity."

Reaction among Virginians was similar. Lawmakers in Richmond from both parties said they generally liked the speech, as did Northern Virginia Democrats, who were key to Webb's victory over incumbent Sen. George Allen last year.

Jessica Smith, Webb's communications director, said the senator "is encouraged to see that his response -- with its themes of economic fairness and affirmative leadership in Iraq -- is being well received across party lines."

"He doesn't show a whole lot of emotion and ability to communicate to the audience," said U.S. Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.). "I don't think that matters. I think that's a mark of the fact that he's genuine. I find his personality refreshing. I find the content of what he has to say very persuasive."

And Webb's performance fired up the young liberals who campaigned for him last year. A group of them -- who called themselves the Webb Brigade during the election -- gathered at Bailey's Pub and Grille in Arlington on Tuesday night to watch the speech.

"To the people who have become such loyal followers of Jim, we're motivated by the fact that he's willing to fight for what he believes in," said Jim McBride, 32, who organized the party. "We are waiting for the Democratic Party to fight the way Jim is fighting."

Reagan Democrat (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Like him or not, Ronald ("Tear Down This Wall") Reagan spoke in a clean, clear prose that almost always left listeners with a sense that he stood for something.

It may thus be no accident that Jim Webb, Virginia's new Democratic senator, was once a Reaganite.

In his reply to President Bush's State of the Union speech on Tuesday night, Webb defined the two central moral issues that animate most of the Democratic Party's rank and file: the mess in Iraq and the fact that the fruits of a growing economy are not being shared by all Americans.

Then Webb did something rather astonishing: He didn't fudge on his language or try to take the hard edge off his impatience with the status quo.

Giving the speech in response to a president's State of the Union address may be the hardest assignment in politics. Even the best of the genre reek of focus-grouped and poll-tested sentences. You have the feeling the words are dictated by some party pooh-bah who believes the speech will fail if it does not touch all the issues on every strategist's list.

Gee, say the consultants to the poor politician who has to carry the party's torch, you just have to mention health care and child care and the environment and union rights and stem cell research -- and every other issue that energizes some base voter in some corner of the party.

And, oh yes, Mr. Politician, don't forget that your real targets are those critical moderate independent swing voters in the Midwestern and Rocky Mountain states, and here's a list of key phrases we've polled to death that they respond to. You have to throw them in somewhere.

Ever wonder why politicians are so often accused of offering mush?

There was no mush from Webb. On the contrary, he tried only to make his two points, on Iraq and inequality, and he showed what he was upset about.

Many Democrats tremble that they will be accused by some right-wing Web site or presidential spokesman of waging class warfare. Webb made clear that there is a class war going on and that the wrong side is winning it.

"When I graduated from college, the average corporate CEO made 20 times what the average worker did," Webb said. "Today, it's nearly 400 times."

Yes, that's a standard sort of line from your standard progressive speech. But then came this arresting sentence: "In other words, it takes the average worker more than a year to make the money that his or her boss makes in one day."

Examine that closely. How many politicians out there raising campaign contributions from rich people are willing to use "boss" instead of a more respectful locution?

And by talking about the time it takes someone to earn a buck, Webb makes it impossible for anyone to forget how vast the inequalities in our society have become.

Webb knows whom he is fighting for. "We're working," he said, "to get the right things done, for the right people and for the right reasons."

On Iraq, Webb did not mince his words about Bush's responsibility. "The president took us into this war recklessly," he declared.

Instead of qualifying this strong statement, Webb backed it up: "He disregarded warnings from the national security adviser during the first Gulf War, the chief of staff of the Army, two former commanding generals of the Central Command. . . . " The list more than supported Webb's next thought, that "we are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable -- and predicted -- disarray that has followed."

Okay, even Webb held back on a couple of politically sensitive points. He offered workers an all-purpose promise on the trade issue that so divides his party. "Government," he said, "has a duty to insist that their concerns be dealt with fairly in the international marketplace."

And, yes, he simultaneously came out against "a precipitous withdrawal" from Iraq and in favor of "a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq." Philosophers and lexicographers might debate the difference between the words "precipitous" and "short order."

But Webb's performance was a salutary sign that Democrats just might be getting over the battered party syndrome that has left so many of them terrified of saying exactly what's on their minds. Then again, maybe Webb was just speaking for himself. Having lived on the Republican side of politics during the Democrats' most traumatic years, he may have escaped the traumas associated with defeat.

University Holds Meeting On Bush Library (WP)

By Matthew C. Wright

DALLAS, Jan. 24 -- Members of the Southern Methodist University faculty again raised concerns that the building of the George W. Bush presidential library on campus might damage the school's reputation, said a participant at a closed-door meeting on Wednesday.

At the tightly guarded meeting, several members of the faculty questioned school president R. Gerald Turner about the political institute that will accompany the library. The institute will conduct research on issues that will be determined by Bush. Many of the questioners wondered whether such a powerful institution on campus will influence the type of research that can be conducted by SMU faculty and whether it will have an impact on the university's reputation.

"We're worried about a group of people on campus with a lot of money and a lot of power who aren't concerned for our values as an academy," Dennis Foster, a professor of English and a faculty senate member said, according to a participant in the meeting who asked not to be identified.

Turner responded by saying that because the institute will be governed by a separate board, any controversy would not reflect poorly on the university.

"The tail will not wag the dog," he said, according to the participant.

No official action was taken during the meeting. Faculty members will relay any further concerns to the faculty senate, which will then summarize them and present a list to Turner. Turner said after the meeting that he will take the concerns into advisement as he goes into negotiations with the president's site-selection committee in the coming weeks.

"I think the faculty is working its way toward a consensus on this," said James F. Hollifield, the director of the Tower Center for Political Studies on campus. He said that the main thing for many faculty members was just "getting their questions answered."

In reality, the faculty can do little to stop the library because several university leaders, including Turner, are committed to bringing it to SMU.

SMU, the alma mater of Laura Bush, was named the sole finalist for the library in December. The site selection committee -- which includes Bush's former chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., and former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans -- requested that any proposals for the library include plans for a public policy institute. In the meeting Wednesday, many faculty members expressed concerns that the Bush institute would become nothing more than a conservative think tank working to advance the ideologies and policies of the Bush administration.

The controversy began in November when two faculty members wrote in the school newspaper criticizing the absence of university-wide discussion about the library. The editorial also questioned the ethics of pursuing a presidential library "regardless of an administration's record and its consequences," a reference to the war in Iraq.

President To Request Fast Track Next Week (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, January 25, 2007

President Bush will ask Congress to extend fast-track negotiating authority in one of two speeches on the economy next week, according to administration sources, after choosing not to make the request in his State of the Union address.

Without fast track, which expires at the end of June, the administration would lose the ability to send free-trade agreements to Congress for up-or-down votes. This would make it virtually impossible for the administration to negotiate bilateral deals or a World Trade Organization agreement it is trying to conclude.

The White House intends to announce more details of next week's economic speeches today, according to White House Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto. He said President Bush intends to get his trade agenda completed, and this would include a continuation of fast track.

The president asked Congress to renew fast track in his State of the Union addresses in 2001 and 2002, but wanted the 2007 address to focus on other issues, including subjects such as healthcare and energy that might provide more common ground with Democrats, Fratto said. He added that Bush wants to speak more expansively about trade and other economic issues, and said the State of the Union address would not have allowed this.

Business lobbyists said they were not disappointed, even though the president mentioned trade only once in the 6,000-word address. They said the administration appeared to be taking a pragmatic approach to dealing with a Congress that could be hostile to the administration's trade agenda.

Asking for a fast-track extension in the State of the Union address would have been an "in-your-face" gesture that would not have improved the atmosphere for actually winning an extension, according to Nicole Venable of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which she said would likely lead business efforts to extend fast track with the Business Roundtable.

Venable said the administration's approach will allow discussions between U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and other key Democrats to evolve, which could create a better climate for the approval of a new fast-track law that will have to differ from the current law to be approved.

Opposition to the administration's trade agenda was highlighted in the Democratic response to the State of the Union delivered by freshman Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.), who is one of several new Democrats seen as critical of free-trade policies.

"Our manufacturing base is being dismantled and sent overseas," said Webb, who added that workers "expect, rightly, that in this age of globalization, their government has a duty to insist that their concerns be dealt with fairly in the international marketplace."

Venable said conversations between the administration and congressional Democrats have yet to kick into gear. Schwab met Rangel, ranking member Jim McCrery (R-La.) and Rep. Sandy Levin (D-Mich.) last week to discuss the trade agenda, which a committee spokesman described as a listening session. Levin, in a release, expressed disappointment that the president had not mentioned the challenges of globalization.

Rangel still plans to organize a retreat for committee members and Schwab, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and other administration officials on economic issues, but no date for that meeting has been set. Ways and Means has also scheduled a hearing on trade and globalization on Jan. 30.

A new fast-track law will have to be shaped to fit the positions of Rangel and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who has said Congress should renew fast track with some changes. A spokeswoman for Baucus said he has no concrete plans to introduce legislation extending fast track at this time.

Fratto said the administration believes it can find common ground with Democrats worried about rising economic populism in their party.

Delaying the request also gives U.S. negotiators more time to craft a possible deal in the current round of World Trade Organization talks launched in 2001, Venable and other business- and farm-group lobbyists said. This could be used as an incentive to get Congress to extend fast track, since other WTO members would be unlikely to negotiate seriously with the U.S. if a deal could be amended by Congress.

National Foreign Trade Council President William Reinsch said Congress is unlikely to grant the Bush administration a fast-track extension unless there is some tangible trade deal that will not be completed without it. Getting an extension "requires an engine, and the engine is getting the round going," Reinsch said. "If you don't, people are going to say they're busy. Why waste time on negotiating [fast track] if there's not going to be a deal to negotiate?"

The Doha round has been sputtering for years, but efforts have stepped up in recent weeks, partly because the U.S. sees progress in the round as giving it leverage in the upcoming fight over a new farm bill. Administration officials have been consulting with agriculture-group representatives to weigh their views on a possible agreement with the European Union in which the U.S. would agree to reduce its farm subsidies in exchange for the EU reducing tariffs on farm goods.

One agriculture lobbyist said the U.S. and EU appear to be within "spitting distance" of an agreement, but cautioned that a preliminary deal between the U.S. and EU would still have to be sold to other WTO members.

If the administration reaches a tentative deal on basic figures for reducing agriculture tariffs and subsidies, it could present an argument to Congress that a fast-track extension is necessary to conclude a multilateral round, which would be the first completed since the Uruguay Round in 1994. Schwab has acknowledged it would be impossible to conclude WTO talks under current fast-track authority.

Some observers believe the administration could also cast blame on congressional Democrats for blocking a multilateral deal if they oppose extending fast track. However, Venable and Reinsch, who both worked in the Clinton administration, said they do not think the Bush administration is driven on fast track by political calculations, but by the desire to move forward on trade. Venable said she does not think anyone is "so sinister" as to be figuring out an endgame of blame for the fast-track fight.

Tax Break Talks Slow Minimum Wage Hike (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, January 25, 2007

The minimum wage increase that was supposed to zip through Congress veered onto a collision course Wednesday as lawmakers argued over business tax breaks that would be attached to ensure Republican support.

Democratic leaders in the House began laying groundwork to blame the Republicans for any impasse. Senate Democrats, however, cautioned their House colleagues not to jeopardize legislation they'd promised to approve if they gained control of Congress.

The Senate did vote 54-43 to advance a House-passed measure that would lift the pay floor without any accompanying tax cut. However, that was well short of the 60 votes needed to keep that version moving.

The vote was a signal to the House that without the tax breaks a minimum wage bill appeared doomed in the Senate. And the Senate promptly moved to a broader bill, backed by its Democratic leaders, that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour over 26 months and provide $8.3 billion in tax benefits to businesses over 10 years.

In the House, Democrats threatened to stifle that effort by enforcing constitutional precedents that require all tax bills to originate in the House. They blamed Republicans for the brewing impasse.

"Democrats are committed to helping small businesses, but we should not delay a minimum wage increase another day in order to negotiate a tax package," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Senate Democrats seemed more willing to accept the tax portion if it meant fulfilling their campaign promise.

House Democrats could try to alter or even remove the tax package from the Senate version when the two houses try to reconcile their differing versions in a conference committee.

In the meantime, the confrontation exposed difficulties the Democratic majority may well encounter when sending other House legislation to the Senate, where the minority Republicans enjoy more power to shape legislation than in the House.

Still, in a separate vote Wednesday, the Senate effectively killed a modified line-item veto bill. The Republican-inspired measure would have permitted a president to pluck individual items out of spending bills and submit them to Congress for a vote.

Senators also defeated a Republican amendment that would have given only the states the right to increase the minimum wage.

The federal minimum wage has been unchanged for 10 years. In the meantime, a number of states have moved on their own to increase their minimums.

According to the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal leaning think tank, inflation has eroded the value of the minimum wage to its lowest level in more than 50 years.

"Minimum wage workers are men and women of dignity," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., a longtime advocate of raising the wage floor, said. "They do some of the most difficult, backbreaking jobs in our society. They deserve a fair wage that respects the dignity of their work and they shouldn't have to live in poverty."

Since the House passed its version two weeks ago, Speaker Pelosi, D-Calif., and Rep. Charles Rangel, the chairman of the taxwriting Ways and Means Committee, have prodded the Senate to keep tax proposals out of the bill.

In scheduling the vote Wednesday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sought to demonstrate the lack of Republican support for a straight minimum wage bill without tax cuts. Every Democrat present voted to cut off debate and five moderate Republicans joined them.

"There seems to be agreement to raise the minimum wage," said Republican Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming. "The difficulty has been how do we take care of some of the impact to small businesses that will result from this."

Reid is backing an $8.3 billion tax package that would extend for five years a tax credit for employers who hire low-income or disadvantaged workers. It also extends until 2010 tax rules that permit businesses to combine as much as $112,000 in expenses into one annual tax deduction.

The cost of the proposal would be paid with revenue realized from a proposed cap of $1 million on executive compensation that can be tax deferred. The tax package also would end deductions for court settlements or punitive damages paid by companies that have been sued.

Those proposed revenue increases have drawn opposition from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which has urged senators to vote against them.

"These are permanent tax law changes that hat have significant impact on the broad business community," Bruce Josten, the chamber's top lobbyist, said in an interview.

Effort To Move On Minimum Wage Bill Falters In Senate (NYT)

By Bloomberg

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 (Bloomberg) — Senate Republicans rejected an effort by Democrats to pass minimum-wage legislation without breaks for small businesses on Wednesday, setting the stage for a potential impasse with the House, where lawmakers are demanding a “clean” bill.

The Senate vote of 54 to 43 was six votes short of the 60 needed to move ahead with a wage measure that does not include tax benefits for employers. Earlier this month, the Senate Finance Committee voted to add $8.3 billion in tax breaks to the bill.

Leaders of the new Democratic-led Congress have said raising the federal minimum wage for the first time in 10 years, to $7.25 an hour from the current $5.15, is a priority. The measure may now be headed for deadlock. Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, has suggested he will block any minimum-wage measure that includes tax provisions.

The House passed its minimum-wage measure on Jan. 10.

Mr. Rangel notes that the Constitution requires tax-related legislation to originate in the House.

Under Congressional rules, Mr. Rangel can block House consideration of the Senate’s minimum-wage measure. Any legislation would have to be reconciled between the two chambers before being sent to President Bush for his signature.

Mr. Bush has said he supports raising the national minimum wage as long as the legislation includes tax relief for small businesses that might face increased labor costs.

Roundtable Setup Left Some Republicans Feeling Like Squares (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

In case you were wondering how the Republicans were adjusting to their new minority status, consider this painful story.

Democratic Rep. Jim Oberstar of Minnesota, the new chairman of the House Transportation Committee, wanted to show members of his panel how bipartisanship and policymaking can work in tandem. So the chairman, along with ranking Republican John Mica (Fla.), organized a roundtable discussion for members last week. And to drive home the point, Oberstar invited back Bud Shuster (R-Pa.), the retired Republican chairman of the committee.

It seemed like a great idea until Mica arrived for the roundtable and discovered that he did not have one of the nice, cushy chairs at the head of the table that were occupied by Oberstar, Shuster and other speakers, including New York financier Felix Rohatyn.

According to sources, none of whom wanted to be anywhere near this story, Mica threw a fit and demanded to know from staff why he didn't have a special chair of his own next to Oberstar and the others.

But before staff could rectify the situation, and as startled members looked on, a furious Mica stormed out of the room and ordered the other Republican members to leave. Among the uncomfortable departees was Shuster's own son and successor, Rep. Bill Shuster.

A source close to Mica acknowledged last night that the congressman was "very upset" because he "wants to be sure members of the minority are treated with the respect."

But after hearing from Oberstar later, the source said, Mica knows the slight was unintentional, and there are no hard feelings.

Note to other Republicans: Bring your slights to us. We'll help you air them.

Meanwhile, on the Other Side of the Aisle . . .

After years of tension between House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) , the two appear to be getting along much better these days, or so report the staff and allies of the Democratic leadership.

They say the tension and mistrust that long existed between the two native Marylanders is no longer evident.

She no longer seems to be keeping him in the dark on insider maneuvering, and he no longer feels as if he's being kept out of the loop.

"They both realized that they have to get along to succeed," said a former leadership aide who knows them well.

Take Hoyer's meeting on Tuesday with committee chairmen, a weekly event chaired by Hoyer that at one time no one could have imagined Pelosi relinquishing. According to one source at the meeting, Hoyer unequivocally defended Pelosi's decision to create a select committee on global warming, beating back complaints from unhappy chairmen concerned about turf.

But Pelosi is the one who has made the more significant turnaround, Hill sources say.

For reasons that are still unclear to many Democrats, Pelosi kept Hoyer at a distance as her No. 2 when they were in the minority. But members thought the partnership nonetheless worked well and were shocked when she aggressively supported Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) for majority leader.

After Hoyer trounced her guy, and after she was elected speaker, observers say her attitude toward Hoyer changed. Most unexpectedly, Pelosi was comfortable sharing power with him, giving him voice in committee assignments and full rein on the floor schedule.

"What you're seeing," said someone close to her, "is Nancy coming into her own. She more confident, more relaxed. She doesn't think he's submarining her anymore." Stay tuned.Some Days It's Just Not Worth Going to Work

His problems started when the allergist-turned- legislator jokingly told some local antiwar activists last month that he aggressively confronted Karl Rove in a White House men's room. "You're in the White House and think you're safe, huh?" Kagen told the activists, according to a report in a monthly alternative publication.

"You recognize me? My name's Dr. Multimillionaire, and I kicked your [expletive]."

Kagen also said that he blocked Rove's exit in the bathroom of the White House and then deliberately called Laura Bush "Barbara" to insult her.

By the time the odd remarks were picked up by the mainstream media, they were reported as fact -- along with a White House response calling Kagen's account "ridiculous."

Confronted at a news conference about the remarks, Kagen awkwardly backed away from them, saying he was "thrilled" to meet the president and first lady and never insulted anybody. But he declined to clarify what did happen, and the brouhaha wouldn't die as the media continued to chronicle Kagen's various versions of his White House excursion.

The furor was finally quelled when the congressman wrote an op-ed piece published Sunday in several home-state papers. "I apologize for handling this situation as I did. I allowed this distraction to get out of hand and divert our attention from the critically important work we are doing," he said. "My mishandled attempt at humor wasn't delivered or received well. It won't happen again."

Asked whether the lawmaker understands now the danger of exaggerating in politics -- even in jest -- an adviser to Kagen said: "One would hope."Thank You, Mr. President

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) watched Tuesday's State of the Union address from his room at George Washington University Hospital and was touched that President Bush acknowledged him, a spokeswoman for the senator said. Johnson has been in the hospital since Dec. 14, when he underwent brain surgery, and his recovery has been slow.

The senator was transferred from intensive care to a rehabilitation unit at the hospital two weeks ago, and he is starting to talk.

"It is not a conversation yet, but it's progress," said Julieanne Fisher, the spokeswoman. "He is saying words, and he understands."

A statement on his Web site says "he has been working with parallel bars and participating in speech therapy, including naming objects." He also ate a hamburger.

In his speech, Bush also singled out Republican Rep. Charles Norwood of Georgia, who is being treated for a recurrence of cancer that has developed near his kidney.

"Two members of the House and Senate are not with us tonight," the president said, "and we pray for [their] recovery and speedy return."

Norwood's staff said he was "thrilled" by the president's wishes. The congressman is receiving chemotherapy as an inpatient at Inova Mount Vernon Hospital, spokesman John Stone said.

Desire To Be In Driver's Seat Takes Back Seat At Auto Show (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

DOJ_NMG_0121432

A highly choreographed peace accord was reached in the middle of the Washington Convention Center yesterday, when Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) escorted House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) through the auto show, hoping to smooth over the public rift that erupted between them last week.

Pelosi irritated Dingell by announcing her desire to create a special committee on global warming. As chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Dingell had planned hearings on global warming and saw Pelosi's proposed committee as an affront to his authority. Dingell, the longest-serving House member, sent a memo to colleagues that called special committees as relevant as "feathers on a fish." He and others threatened to fight Pelosi's plan.

Pelosi, meanwhile, believes Democrats must show a sense of urgency about carbon emissions and has called for an aggressive schedule that would develop legislation to address the problem by July. She thinks a select committee on energy independence and climate change would demonstrate the party is serious about action.

To soften the edges of the turf battle, Dingell's wife, Debbie, an executive with General Motors Corp., suggested that he invite Pelosi to the Washington Auto Show to see the hybrid vehicles manufactured in his home state.

They were trailed by a group of photographers and reporters, who pinned them up against a baby-blue Ford Escape hybrid that runs on ethanol. Two Ford salesmen appeared and opened the doors so Pelosi could see the car's pale gray interior. Pelosi nodded appreciatively as the salesmen talked about capacity and mileage. The group strode to the rear and gazed into the open hatchback.

Cameras clicked.

Dingell and Pelosi refused to answer questions about whether they had resolved their dispute over the special committee or saw eye-to-eye on global warming.

"I won't talk to you about that now," Dingell said.

"That's not the subject we're here to discuss today," Pelosi said.

"She's here to learn about our business and be supportive," Dingell said, putting an arm against her back.

"I was honored by the invitation," Pelosi said.

Cameras clicked.

Pelosi allowed that she bought a Jeep Cherokee in 1976 and has owned several in the years since but does not drive herself around anymore. She said she'd like to ride in a hybrid SUV, but her security team forbids it.

"They said it was something about the size," she said.

Cameras clicked.

Then, 20 minutes of peacemaking over, Pelosi, Dingell and their entourage walked to a rear exit and climbed into two gas-guzzling Chevy Suburbans.

Capitol Hill Power Shift Could Aid Philip Morris (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'connell And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

In many ways, the new Democratic Congress looks like big trouble for big tobacco.

Representative Henry A. Waxman (D., Calif.) -- long the industry's chief Capitol Hill scourge -- just became an important committee chairman. Loyal Republican allies of big tobacco are now in the minority, including John Boehner (R., Ohio), a smoker who in 1995 famously handed out checks from tobacco lobbyists on the House floor (he later apologized), and Roy Blunt (R., Mo.), whose wife is a lobbyist for Altria Group Inc., the parent of Philip Morris USA. (Mr. Blunt's office notes that his wife doesn't lobby the House.) Because of the changes on Capitol Hill, the public could be seeing all sorts of ideas floated that had sunk quickly before -- from a federal excise tax increase to photos of diseased lungs on cigarette packs.

From the point of view of the nation's largest cigarette maker, Philip Morris, the shift in power could be a blessing in disguise. That's because it could help ease the way for legislation to give the Food and Drug Administration new powers to control how cigarettes are made and marketed. That, ironically, could help Philip Morris maintain its current market domination.

The FDA doesn't regulate cigarettes. Under former commissioner David Kessler it tried years ago to claim jurisdiction over cigarettes as drug delivery devices -- the drug being nicotine -- but that effort was challenged by tobacco companies and rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Most tobacco companies are opposed to FDA regulation of cigarettes, which, among other things, would likely ban the use of descriptors such as "light" and "mild" and require big new warnings to cover at least 30% of cigarette packs.

Philip Morris, however, has embraced the idea that the FDA should have broad powers over tobacco. "Legislation that reduces the serious harm caused by smoking would be a very good development, and it is not about giving a competitive advantage to any one company," says Steven C. Parrish, senior vice president of corporate affairs for Altria.

The company's rivals contend that new restrictions would hurt them more because their brands are much less known than the famous Philip Morris Marlboro brand. With marketing potentially dramatically curtailed by FDA regulation, they would have fewer ways to promote themselves. The result, they say, would be that Marlboro would keep its market share. Philip Morris USA's share of the retail cigarette market was 50.4% as of the third quarter of 2006. Competitors such as Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., which markets Camel and Kool cigarettes, gripe that FDA regulation is the "Marlboro Monopoly Act."

Oversight by the FDA also would help Philip Morris develop a legal way to market its cigarette products that are meant to be less hazardous, such as Marlboro Ultra Smooth, which already have been selling in limited test markets but without any explicit health-related marketing claims. A bill in the works includes sections that define reduced-risk products, laying out how they can be marketed.

In coming weeks, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass), chairman of the Senate Health Committee, and Rep. Waxman, chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, are expected to formally introduce FDA tobacco legislation. Sen. Kennedy's plan is for hearings in February and a vote in his committee on the bill in March. Phillip Morris USA Chief Executive Officer Michael Szymanczyk, and other cigarette company chiefs, are expected to be asked to testify before Congress.

They could face tough questions about some new findings from researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health alleging that tobacco companies increased the level of addictive nicotine in their cigarettes. Philip Morris disputes the findings.

Another hot topic might be whether legislation should give the FDA power to demand that all cigarette makers reduce nicotine levels all the way to zero. In the past, Philip Morris has argued against that on the grounds that doing so would make cigarettes unacceptable to consumers.

Traditional antiregulatory sentiment on the part of the Republicans has proved an obstacle to passage of FDA regulation. The Democrats' win in November means that legislation to regulate tobacco has more votes than in the last session of Congress. But with a presidential race gearing up, and the congressional clock always racing, many bills may fall by the wayside as priorities shift.

Rep. Waxman has been particularly tough on cigarette makers. In 1994, he called cigarettes "the single most dangerous consumer product ever sold," and he was chairman of the hearings that exposed major tobacco executives over the health risks of smoking. Seven executives declared, under oath, that nicotine isn't addictive. The companies have reversed course. Reynolds suggests smokers rely on the conclusions of the U.S. Surgeon General, and other public-health and medical officials, while Philip Morris USA agrees cigarettes are harmful.

Now Rep. Waxman will be in the position of arguably aiding Philip Morris by introducing the FDA bill on the House side. His spokeswoman said yesterday that the bill could come soon and would likely give the FDA the power to regulate nicotine but not eliminate it.

"I don't think there's been any love between Philip Morris and Henry Waxman," said Rep. Waxman in an interview yesterday, noting that he is aware that some employees of the cigarette maker used to mock him as "Hollywood Henry" -- a likely reference to the fact that he invited movie stars and celebrities to his hearings. "I don't care about Philip Morris's interests," he added. "Cigarettes -- as dangerous as they are -- are the only consumer products that are completely unregulated by the federal government."

Among the antitobacco measures Democrats might take would be increasing the federal cigarette excise tax, now 39 cents. The last increase was legislated in 1997.

Antitobacco advocates also hope there might be political opportunities for the U.S. to finally ratify the terms of a World Health Organization treaty known as the Framework Convention on Tobacco Control. The U.S. signed it in 2004, and about 143 other countries have ratified it, including the United Kingdom, Japan, and Canada. The treaty calls for a ban of terms such as "light" and "low tar" and would require text or pictorial warnings covering at least 30% of each tobacco pack.

In Canada and some other countries using pictures, the images include a diseased lung and a drooping cigarette to show tobacco's ill effects on male sexuality. The odds of passage this year are uncertain because the State Department has yet to introduce the legislation that would make the treaty's terms legally binding.

"We agree with most of the treaty's core principles, and we want to engage with the rest of the world to help bring them up to our standards," White House deputy press secretary Tony Fratto said Wednesday. "The treaty requires statutory changes that we would have to make before ratifying it, and also raises some constitutional concerns -- particularly with respect to the First Amendment. I can't say at this time how quickly those issues would be resolved."

Another likely move would be to pass legislation that would limit Internet sales of tobacco products. In the last Congress, there was debate about providing the states additional authority to ensure that state taxes were paid. The proposal is likely to surface again this year, says Wendy K.D. Selig, lobbyist for the American Cancer Society in Washington.

House Restores Some Voting Rights To Congressional Delegates (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — The Democratic majority in the House restored limited floor voting rights to the Congressional delegates from the District of Columbia and four territories on Wednesday after a rancorous debate with echoes of the days before the Republicans won the majority in 1994.

The change approved on a party-line vote of 226 to 191 was mostly symbolic because the five delegates will be allowed to vote just on floor amendments, not on final approval of bills.

If their votes influence the outcome on amendments, a new vote will be taken without their participation.

The return of the privileges, first allowed by Democrats in 1993 and rescinded by Republicans in 1995, resulted in Republicans' pouring out their frustration about their treatment by Democrats in the first weeks of Congress. The sour mood threatened efforts at forging a more cooperative relationship between the parties.

"We've extended the hand of friendship to each other in hopes of working together for the common good," Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, said as he accused Democrats of trampling House rules. "Unfortunately, the hand of friendship is being slapped away by the actions of the majority."

Democrats responded by suggesting that Republicans were demeaning the role of the delegates who represent the Virgin Islands, Guam, Puerto Rico and American Samoa and refusing to recognize that the five million residents of those territories and the District of Columbia deserve representation on the House floor.

Democrats noted that residents of the territories were among the people being killed and wounded in Iraq.

"The House is ordained to be a marketplace of ideas," Speaker Nancy Pelosi said. "We should work to expand democracy, not limit it."

Delegate Eni F. H. Faleomavaega, Democrat of American Samoa, bristled at Republican gibes that he would be able to vote on the floor when he represents 60,000 residents compared with the approximately 600,000 in a typical Congressional district.

"I am saddened this has gotten to the point where we are caught in this crossfire," Mr. Faleomavaega said about the broader dispute over Democratic management of the House.

Republicans said the proposal on delegate voting was one more Democratic initiative rushed to the floor without committee hearings. They called it an unconstitutional power grab and derided it as "representation without taxation," because residents of the territories do not pay federal income taxes though residents of the District of Columbia do.

"Under this rule, the majority party could seat anybody in the House," said Representative Tom Price, Republican of Georgia.

Referring to the chairman of the national Democratic Party, Mr. Price asked: "Who is next? Howard Dean? He has a significant constituency."

Republicans used similar tirades at Democrats, accusing them of arrogance in their operation of the House when they instituted delegate voting rights in 1993. A court challenge failed when a judge ruled that the voting was essentially meaningless and thus was not unconstitutional. On taking control of the House, Republicans reversed the rule.

Delegates Gain Limited Voting Rights (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The House gave D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton the right yesterday to vote on amendments to bills on the House floor, a privilege that legislators acknowledged is largely symbolic.

The action, pushed through by the new Democratic-led House, restores a right that Norton (D) and four other non-state representatives received in 1993. It was taken away two years later, after Republicans won control of the House.

Norton has been pushing for passage of a much broader bill that would give her a full vote. She supported the limited measure yesterday but expressed concern that it could slow the momentum toward giving the District a full vote by confusing activists and increasing tension with Republicans.

"This debate is extremely heartbreaking for me," Norton said in an impassioned floor speech, after Republicans assailed the rule change. She questioned why lawmakers were arguing about the constitutionality of the limited measure, when the courts had upheld it in the 1990s. She said Congress should instead be considering the broader bill, which supporters call their best hope in years of getting the District a full vote in the House.

Norton and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) recently reintroduced that bill, which would add two seats to the House -- one for the overwhelmingly Democratic District and another for Utah, a Republican bastion. Until now, Norton has been able to vote only in House committees.

The rule change that was approved "offers so little for Americans who have given so much," Norton lamented.

The measure allows Norton and representatives from Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa and the Virgin Islands to vote in the Committee of the Whole, where amendments to legislation are considered.

But it comes with an important caveat: If the delegates' votes provide the margin of victory, their votes are thrown out and representatives revote without them.

The measure passed 226 to 191 on a party-line vote. Democratic supporters acknowledged that it provided mainly symbolic privileges but said it would give delegates greater participation in Congress.

"It is not enough what we do today," said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who has expressed strong support for the District having a full vote in the House. "But it would be tragic if we do not do this basic step."

Republicans attacked the measure, saying it was unconstitutional and a power grab by Democrats.

Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.) noted that four of the five non-state representatives who benefit from the rule change are Democrats.

Other Republicans expressed concern that the rule change was the first step toward offering full voting rights to the territories. And some suggested it would be used in legislative maneuvers to benefit Democrats.

Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.) noted that the last time the measure was in effect, the Democratic-controlled House had numerous revotes on amendments, though it was rare that the delegates affected the margin of victory. During the revotes, he said, representatives often changed sides.

"We're going to embark on another legal struggle, just as we did 14 years ago," to defeat the measure, he declared.

House Republicans filed suit in U.S. District Court in 1993, citing a violation of the Constitution. But Judge Harold H. Greene ruled in favor of Norton and the other delegates, saying their votes posed no constitutional problems because they were "symbolic" and therefore "meaningless." That decision was upheld on appeal.

GOP May Sue Over Delegates' Vote (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, January 25, 2007

After a contentious floor debate Wednesday, the House voted to give the chamber's five Delegates the right to vote in the Committee of the Whole — but Republicans are considering challenging the rules change in court.

The House passed the measure, 226 -191, after a series of protests from Republicans, who claimed the vote was an unconstitutional power grab by the new majority.

Rep. Tom Price (R-Ga.), who spent much of his week rallying against the proposal, called it "flawed policy" and said Republicans will continue to fight it.

"At this point, because there are internal rules, the only option we have is through the courts," Price said. "We'll be in discussions with that."

According to the rules change, Democratic Dels. Madeleine Bordallo (Guam), Donna Christian-Christensen (V.I.), Eni Faleomavaega (America Samoa) and Eleanor Holmes Norton (D.C.), along with Resident Commissioner Luis Fortuño (R-P.R.), can vote on amendments to bills but not the final passage. Plus, if a Delegate casts the deciding vote on a bill, the Delegate votes are thrown out and a revote takes place.

Democrats argued that the vote is a symbolic gesture to the nearly 5 million Americans who live in Washington, D.C., and the territories.

"What are we really giving them? A chance to participate in democracy," said Rep. José Serrano (D-N.Y.), who was born in Puerto Rico. "How can we be willing to spread democracy around the world when we can't spread it here?"

Christian-Christensen said she is pleased to get the vote and called Republican arguments against the measure unfounded.

"None of their arguments were really good arguments," she said. "The only thing I can go back to is the politics. I think they should have been honest and said, 'We don't want to have four Democratic Delegates.'"

If Republicans decide to go to court, it won't be the first time the Committee of the Whole vote has been challenged.

The U.S. Court of Appeals upheld the rules change after it was enacted during the 103rd Congress, with judges writing it does not go against the Constitution because it does not affect the overall outcome of a vote.

With that history behind him, Faleomavaega said he welcomes sending the measure back to the courts.

"I must say that I have never seen such a more divisive issue before the House for consideration," he said. "And I feel really bad... all we wanted was the symbolic vote."

Republicans threw out the vote when they took power after the 1994 elections. But GOP leaders said Wednesday that if the rules change were to reach the Supreme Court, they are confident it would be struck down.

Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.) led much of the floor protest, criticizing Democrats — specifically the Rules Committee, of which he is ranking member — for not bringing in Congressional experts and other observers to discuss the merits of the measure.

"If they want to vote in this body, Mr. Speaker, they should pursue statehood, plain and simple," Dreier said of the Delegates.

"It saddens me there was no discussion about this with the minority," Boehner said, adding that Republicans got word of the proposal on Friday only when Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) released the weekly calendar.

Dreier also said he was disappointed Democrats did not withdraw an amendment presented in the Rules Committee by Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), even after Kirk submitted a letter requesting the committee do so. The amendment would have required the House Clerk certify in writing that the constituents of the delegates are covered by the federal tax code.

But one Democratic leadership aide said that things were handled correctly and the Republican outcry was unjustified.

"I think they're just trying to adjust to being in the minority, to be honest," the aide said.

That outcry seemed ironic to Christian-Christensen, especially because the Delegate with the most constituents — Fortuño, who represents about 4 million people — is a Republican, she said.

For Norton, the symbolic measure is far from her ultimate goal of obtaining a full House vote with the D.C. Fair and Equal House Voting Rights Act.

In an emotional six-minute speech on the House floor Wednesday morning, Norton criticized the way House leaders handled the rules change, which she said needlessly divided "the people's House about a right to vote settled 14 years ago."

"I say to my friends on the other side, 'There is nothing left to debate about,'" Norton said.

The Delegate grew angrier as she discussed the need for a swift vote on the D.C. voting-rights act.

"Why isn't H.R. 328 the first bill out of the Democratic Congress?" she asked.

Hoyer, who introduced the Delegate measure, said he is dedicated to giving D.C. a full vote "and we will address that shortly."

"To the cynic in me, this resolution smacks of obfuscation," Davis said. "What the majority is doing today threatens to delay action on the real injustice that has plagued the District for more than two centuries."

For Bordallo, the new power is worthwhile.

"This is a step forward," she said.

Senate Shows Its Age; Health Problems Pose Challenge For Governing (POL)

By Jonathan Martin And John Bresnahan

The Politico, January 25, 2007

The average age of members of the U.S. Senate is older than it has ever been, according to Senate Historian Richard Baker. For many senators, advanced age is starting to show, raising questions about their ability to govern.

Until his retirement last month, former majority leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., a noted heart surgeon, was being consulted for informal medical advice by two dozen of his colleagues -- more than 20 percent of the Senate, according to a former leadership aide. They went to Frist complaining about a host of illnesses and chronic maladies, most related to aging.

Among them were Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., who flew on Frist's jet for private consultation and treatment at the Frist Clinic in Nashville, according to Senate sources.

The average age of the 100 senators is 62, up from 60 in the last Congress. Among the new Democratic committee chairmen, it is 69. And, of the five longest-serving senators, three are there today. Including the grand-daddy of seniority, Sen. Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., 89.

As far as illnesses, at least 10 senators have fought various cancers or suffered severe injuries. Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., remains hospitalized here for a brain hemorrhage suffered last month. And others deal with chronic and debilitating infirmities.

In the past, the clubby atmosphere of the Senate provided cover for its frailest members. No longer. Today, a senator's smallest stumble, nap or memory lapse gets instant and widespread public exposure online through blogs and videos posted on YouTube and other social-networking Web sites. (See related story.)

Few senators will talk publicly about their own health problems or those of their colleagues. But many sought counsel from one of their own, Frist. He offered informal and discreet medical advice to his colleagues and some spouses during his 12-year tenure, a former Senate leadership aide said.

"You would be surprised by the people who sought his advice" on health-related issues, said the former aide. "There was a steady flow of people in and out of the office." Frist declined to comment.

If the president appears in public wearing so much as a dime-sized bandage, the press demands, and usually gets, a detailed medical explanation from the White House. No one questions the public's right to know precisely and in full about the physical health and mental well-being of the commander in chief.

Closer to home, Americans routinely face the wrenching tasks of taking car keys away from elderly parents who can no longer drive safely, or delivering the necessary (but unwelcome) news that it's time for an infirm parent to move into assisted care.

Yet suggestions that an enfeebled senator consider retirement haven't been broached, even considering the distressing example of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who spent the final year of his term, at age 100, in and out of Walter Reed Army Medical Center here.

The issue is increasingly relevant today, considering the current Senate's advanced age, particularly among its leaders. Byrd, Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii -- Numbers 1, 3 and 4, respectively, among the longest-serving senators -- have been in the Senate more than 40 years each. And each chairs an important committee at an age when most people are retired: Byrd holds the gavel at Appropriations, Kennedy, 74, at Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, and Inouye, 82, at Commerce, Science and Transportation.

"People don't like to talk about age," said Boston University history professor Julian E. Zelizer. "It's not a political taboo, but a cultural one. We're respectful of the elderly." To raise the issue in a political context, Zelizer continued, is even more fraught with difficulty because any discussion of the office-holding elderly portends a conversation about that which is even more awkward -- mortality. The subject of death is especially acute in the Senate, "where individuals matter," as Zelizer diplomatically put it.

The impact of a single senator's health was underscored when Johnson, 60, suffered a brain hemorrhage in mid-December. He is recovering in a Washington hospital, and physicians have said it may take months.

This was big news, in part because of how suddenly a relatively young senator was stricken, but more importantly because of the potential political fallout. Should Johnson be unable to complete his six-year term, which ends in January 2009, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, would likely fill Johnson's seat with a GOP appointee, thus taking control of the Senate out of Democratic hands.

Johnson is receiving several hours of speech and physical therapy a day, and his office has issued repeated statements that he is on the way to a full recovery. Johnson has hired a strategist to help oversee his re-election effort next year, answering, at least for now, the question of whether he plans to run again. (Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., appointed Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., to take over Johnson's gavel at the ethics committee in Johnson's absence.)

Johnson's illness also reinforced the delicate topic of whether a senator is mentally fit to serve. Such was the question when Thurmond finished his tenure.

After moving into Walter Reed following several hospitalizations, Thurmond stopped presiding over the Senate, and at committee hearings typically would only read verbatim remarks prepared by his staff. On the floor, his fellow senators would "come pay homage" to their nonagenarian colleague as he sat waiting to vote, said Rutgers professor Ross K. Baker.

"They were very nice, but they treated him like an ornament, like a figure in [the Capitol's] Statuary Hall."

Meanwhile, loyal aides, led by Chief of Staff Duke Short, fiercely protected Thurmond's privacy. Short, whose moniker was the "101st Senator," was mostly able to keep Thurmond's decline out of the news. He barred sit-down interviews and deployed staffers to help fend off reporters on Capitol Hill.

Even today, senators dance around the topic of personal health when quizzed, and staffers and lobbyists -- who have so much riding on the well-being of their political patrons -- clam up as well.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., who turned 83 this week, said it was difficult to discuss, even with colleagues, because such talk can lead to speculation about a senator's retirement and replacement.

"What is public is public, and what is private ought to remain private," Lautenberg said.

His attitude is typical. "They all understand what it took to get there, and they kind of look out for each other in that way," said associate Senate historian Don Ritchie. He added that some senators also "walk around aware that, 'But for the grace of God, there go I' " when seeing a colleague having difficulty.

For Byrd, hard times are painfully obvious. The senator who oversees hundreds of billions of dollars in government spending as chairman of Appropriations is still good for a rant on Congress's rights and privileges, as evidenced last week by his emotional attack on a proposal to give the president a line-item veto. But his health problems are legion.

Byrd suffers from tremors, causing his hands to shake noticeably. He has complained about growing weakness in his legs, and when he leaves the Senate chamber, he switches from using two canes to a wheeled walker.

Although more than a decade younger than Byrd, Domenici, 74, also suffers from a variety of ailments -- and not quietly, according to fellow senators. Domenici was one of those who leaned heavily on Frist for medical advice, insiders say.

He has undergone two surgeries for a nerve problem, has bursitis in his hips, and suffers from spinal stenosis, a narrowing of the spinal cord that can be painful. He has hearing aids in both ears, forcing him to lean in very close to someone when having a conversation, and he moves slowly and deliberately when taking the floor for votes, stopping often to lean against a wall or desk for rest or to steady himself.

He can appear disheveled at times. Domenici wore a suit with a with large tear in the coat one day recently, and in early December, after being seen ambling through the halls of the Hart Senate Office Building in a pair of hunting pants that resembled pajamas, Domenici aides scrambled to quash a rumor that the lawmaker was not as mentally acute as he had been.

Despite his health, Domenici, who is senior Republican on the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, is running for a seventh term next year. And with last week's announcement that Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., will retire, GOP leaders need Domenici to stay more than ever. Domenici's advisers and Republican strategists portray him as hale and hearty, and suggest any buzz that Domenici's problems will force him to step down is nothing more than a Democratic plot to drive him from office.

"The senator, in my view, is in better health than he was three years ago," said Matt Letourneau, a Domenici spokesman, pointing out that his boss no longer uses the motorized cart that he had several years ago.

To be sure, illness does not disqualify lawmakers from effective service. The Senate roster includes a number of members -- old and relatively young -- who are dealing with or have recovered from serious health problems.

Sen. Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., was diagnosed with acute myeloid leukemia last November and has undergone chemotherapy treatments since then. Thomas, 73, has returned to the Senate minus most of his hair, and he predicts a full recovery. Recently re-elected to six-year term, he will have another chemotherapy session later this month. "I'm feeling great and glad to be back at work," he said in an interview.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., 76, was diagnosed with Hodgkin's disease in February 2005, and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., 70, has been treated for skin cancer (see related story). Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., 63, was treated for prostate cancer in 2003, and Sen. Mike Crapo, R-Idaho, 55, has twice been hospitalized for the same condition.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., 58, who is also a physician, is a colon-cancer survivor. Sens. Max Baucus, D-Mont., 65, and Lautenberg both suffered severe head injuries while in office. Even Majority Leader Reid, 67, and Minority Leader Mitch

McConnell, R-Ky., 64, had health scares in recent years, although both appear to be fine now. (Reid had a small stroke in August 2005, and McConnell underwent triple heart bypass surgery in early 2003.)

But when a senator begins experiencing age-related decline, they, their staffs and families face the most difficult decision of all: how to retire with dignity.

The challenge, said Professor Baker, is that it can be difficult to tell when someone who has become accustomed to the routine of casting votes and reading prepared remarks is not up to the rest of the job.

"When do you stop issuing drivers licenses?" Baker asked. As with elderly motorists, "you're going to have people whose reflexes aren't too good behind the wheel, you're going to have people [in the Senate] who aren't too sharp anymore making very important decisions."

What's more, almost all of those who would make, or influence, the decision about whether it's time to retire are disposed against it.

The senator usually wants to stay because he or she enjoys and derives purpose out of public service; aides want to keep their jobs and the influence that comes with working for a senior legislator (especially one who is increasingly dependent on aides); the party wants to keep a safe seat that will cost less money to retain; and constituents want the senator to run again because that means continued influence and dollars for a state.

Often, then, the only way the hazards of age and infirmity may be decisive are the same as with anything else in politics, Baker said.

"If it becomes scandal, if the public takes notice of it. That's the way change comes about."

This story allows me to bring up an important point in the political spectrum, political polarization. I respect politicians who are able to have a successful career in politics, but if there is not limit, we can't bring new ideas to Washington. Voters think that long serving members have done a good job, but really they have been going to the extremes for years and have said and done the same things. Term limits seem to be one of the good solutions to this problem.

McCain's Health And Age Present Campaign Challenge (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, January 25, 2007

"I am older than dirt and have more scars than Frankenstein," John McCain likes to say.

It always gets a laugh, though I don't suppose his mother, who is 94, and her twin sister, appreciate it very much. If he is older than dirt, what does that make them? Older than lava?

If McCain, 70, runs and wins, he would be the oldest person ever inaugurated as president. As is evident from the scar on the left side of his face, he has had malignant melanoma, the most invasive and dangerous form of skin cancer. (One in every 60 Americans is at risk for developing invasive melanoma in their lifetimes.)

I talked to McCain recently and asked him about his health. He said it was good. "I hiked the Grand Canyon rim-to-rim last August with my son, Jack," he said.

I tried to imagine that. The last time I saw it, the Grand Canyon was seriously deep.

How on earth do you hike a thing like that rim-to-rim? I asked.

"Down and up!" he said. "It takes three days."

John Kennedy, who at 43 became the youngest person ever elected president, and who was always associated with "vig-ah," in fact had serious diseases that were kept from the public.

As was revealed in 2002, Kennedy was sick from age 13 through the rest of his life, was on chronic-pain medication throughout his presidency and had Addison's disease, an endocrine disorder that until 1940 was a terminal illness. Kennedy survived it through cortisone injections, which at the time only rich people could afford.

Dr. Jeffrey Kelman, who examined Kennedy's medical records in 2002, said, "He was never healthy. I mean, the image you get of vigor and progressive health wasn't true."

The point being: Electing a young person to the presidency is no guarantee that he or she will be healthy or stay healthy.

The media often demands the release of medical records these days, and the candidates sometimes comply. There were so many false rumors circulating about McCain's health when he ran for president in 2000, that he released 1,500 pages of medical and psychiatric records. They showed him to be in good health and not nuts. (And how many presidential candidates can say that?)

"We'll probably have to do that again," McCain told me of the record release.

Do you think all candidates should release their medical and psychiatric records? I asked.

I thought he would jump on that and say yes, just to put pressure on the other presidential campaigns, but he did not.

"I don't know," he said. "I think probably in my case it was a little more unique because of my POW status and the war injuries and the fact that people were spreading rumors that I was crazy and disabled both. So we'll probably have to do that again."

You think the rumors will start again? I asked.

"They already have!" he said.

But I don't think that is going to be McCain's problem. It isn't his health but rather his demeanor that worries some people.

The Iraq war, which he strongly supports, has disturbed and dismayed him. He told The Washington Post it was a "train wreck." He told me it was a "witch's brew." He visits wounded soldiers and Marines when they come back home for treatment and if any civilian feels the pain of the military, it is McCain.

And it is showing.

Last April, I wrote of a campaign swing McCain made through New Hampshire and Iowa, "Though McCain said he enjoyed himself, he was not the rollicking campaigner of six years ago. At a number of stops, he was largely subdued and sometimes almost somber."

Last Sunday, on "Meet the Press with Tim Russert," McCain seemed to have moved from almost somber to almost gloomy.

In my recent interview, I suggested to him that the laughing, joking John McCain of his last presidential campaign seemed to be AWOL.

"It's hard to make jokes; we are a nation at war," he said. "There are great national security challenges that we face. But I also believe, as Ronald Reagan did, that America's greatest days are ahead of us. It's going to be an upbeat campaign and an optimistic one."

And will you still come to the back of the bus and goof off with the press like before? I asked.

"If I changed that," McCain said with a smile of old, "I would probably get death threats."

I wouldn't care about his age, if his brain was working properly, but it is NOT. So, he would NEVER get my vote. We have had ENOUGH clouded judgement for the past 6 years. We need someone with a "clear head" the next time!

This is one terrific political blog. I really look forward each day to checking out what you all have to say. Regarding the age of McCain, I think he is probably too old & maybe too cranky to be president. Also, one picture I saw of him at the "State of the Union" last night--he appeared to be sound asleep. However, he is a patriot no matter what his age and has certainly served the nation honorably.

by Jennifer on 01.24.2007 at 10:14 PM

Excellent piece. Part of his constant campaigning and talk show appearance routine is no doubt aimed to project a picture of vitality. But I agree it is the crankiness problem that will be significant. Reminds me of Mr. Wilson from the Dennis the Menace cartoon --always screaming at the kids. Wait until the staffer stories start popping up. It'll make Hillary seem demure.

by M J Petersen on 01.24.2007 at 09:18 PM

I normally wouldn't say age matters much, but after losing my father when he was only 70, it is hard for me to imagine electing the most powerful man in the word for a possible 8 years at that age.

FEDERAL DIARY: Union Suit Against Intern Program May Revive Debate On Fairness In Hiring (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The Federal Career Intern Program has become one of the most popular ways for federal agencies to recruit on college campuses and hire young professionals.

Agencies may hire interns at any time, do not have to advertise the job openings in advance, and can take advantage of the two-year job tryouts to evaluate the interns before deciding whether to offer them permanent civil service jobs.

Under regulations issued in 2000 and 2005, some agencies have used the intern program to build a recruitment pipeline to replace baby boomers who retire as well as to beef up law enforcement and other specialized workforces. The interns are paid the same as other entry-level government workers.

But the popular hiring program was challenged in federal court yesterday by the National Treasury Employees Union, which asserted that the intern program "has become the hiring method of choice" and has undermined century-old laws that require federal jobs to be filled through fair and open competition with applicants afforded equal opportunity.

The union asked the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to throw out the program's regulations and to stop agencies from using the hiring program.

The lawsuit seems likely to reopen debate over where to draw the line on ensuring fair and open competition for federal jobs while allowing the government to become more competitive in the "war for talent" with Fortune 500 companies and large nonprofit organizations.

In its lawsuit, the union said the intern program has become the primary method for hiring revenue officers and revenue agents at the Internal Revenue Service, customs and border protection officers at the Department of Homeland Security and financial institution specialists at the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. NTEU represents thousands of employees at the three agencies.

The union said the intern program had deprived current employees of chances for promotions and other career opportunities.

NTEU also objected to the program's rule that places interns on probation for two years, instead of the one year that generally applies to civil service jobs, and to an IRS decision to extend the probation to three years for revenue agents. Lengthy probation periods mean the employees have to wait too long to gain job rights that allow them to contest major disciplinary actions, the union said.

The Office of Personnel Management, the defendant in the suit, and the IRS said the suit was under review and declined to comment. A spokesman for Customs and Border Protection said the agency's hiring practices follow federal law and "encourage the selection of qualified candidates." The FDIC described its hiring process as highly competitive.

By most accounts, federal managers see the internships as a way to hire faster and place new employees into training programs that monitor their job performance and conduct. Speedy hiring has become especially important at Homeland Security, which has been given extra money by the White House and Congress to improve border security and reduce the threat of terrorist attacks.

The FDIC has used the intern program to recruit bank examiners at about 600 colleges. In the past six months, the FDIC received more than 1,100 applications for 75 such jobs, the agency said.

Overall, the government hired more than 11,000 people through the intern program in fiscal 2005, the union said yesterday.Union Movement at the GAO

The International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers announced yesterday that it has launched a union-organizing campaign to represent employees at the Government Accountability Office, the congressional auditing and investigations agency.

The union, an affiliate of the AFL-CIO, represents federal scientists, engineers, immigration and administrative law judges and others, including the staff at the Congressional Research Service. A group of GAO analysts approached the CRS local union several months ago about forming an organizing committee, the union said.

Last year, David M. Walker, head of the GAO, completed a restructuring of the agency's pay system after an outside report showed that some GAO analysts were underpaid and some overpaid. The changes have created morale problems at the GAO, with some analysts feeling they had been demoted and others concerned about losing out on pay raises they had counted on receiving.

White House Social Secretary Lea Berman is stepping down next month after two years on the job.

"I've had four great jobs in this administration in six years -- and that's a long time to work at the White House," she told us yesterday. "I admit that I am tired." The decision to leave was entirely Berman's, said Susan Whitson, spokeswoman for Laura Bush."Mrs. Bush adores Lea and thinks her work is outstanding. Lea will be greatly missed."

The prominent Republican hostess became the nation's most prestigious party planner in December 2004 -- after stints as social secretary for Dick Cheney, chief of staff to Lynne Cheney and a staffer in the president's 2004 reelection campaign. It was, she said yesterday, like "winning the lottery, to go from being a housewife to the White House social secretary." Berman is married to millionaire businessman and GOP donor Wayne Berman.

She oversaw a dramatic overhaul of the White House's entertaining style: The hiring of Cristeta Comerford as the mansion's first female executive chef, the hunt for a new White House pastry chef (Thaddeus DuBois left for piles of dough at a new Las Vegas casino), and the first lady's push to entertain more than in the first term.

Berman will leave at the end of February, after two more big dinners: one for the nation's governors and another honoring Ford's Theatre. She informed the first lady shortly before the midterm election that she planned to resign. Whitson would not say whether anyone had been interviewed for the position, but said no successor has been named.Your Questions About the State of the Union Address Answered

How'd the Baby Einstein lady end up saluted as a hero? Is she a big campaign contributor? Also, is she available?

We've checked but can find no evidence that Julie Aigner-Clark, founder of the series of instructional videos intended to produce genius tots, is a donor, big or small. Just another business entrepreneur turned "social entrepreneur," whatever that entails, who caught the eye of the White House. Sorry, fellas: The millionaire is married with two kids.

Photos are funny things, aren't they? We know this shot was taken during the speech itself, and not during the interminable wait beforehand. Perhaps the shutter just happened to catch a moment when more than one guest in Nancy Pelosi's box was mid-blink or neck-stretch. O'Malley's spokesman, Rick Abbruzzese, says the new Maryland guv "was very interested to hear what the president of the United States had to say." We're also told that many VIPs captured on film with downcast eyes may simply have been following a text of the speech handed out at the start.

One Cabinet member always has to sit out the SOTU, to provide for a succession in case the Capitol gets blown up. Who was it this time?

Vacations in the Hamptons, overnights at the White House, lots of big fat checks over the years -- from all appearances, Steven Spielberg has long been one of Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton's bestest buddies in all of Hollywood, which is saying a lot. So why is the Oscar winner, along with fellow moguls Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen, hosting a $2,300-a-person fundraiser for . . . Barack Obama? Invitations to the Feb. 20 event at the Beverly Hilton went out this week.

Spielberg's rep, Andy Spahn, said the director is simply spreading the love in these early months of the '08 race. "He expects to be helpful to several candidates in the primary race," he said, mentioning Clinton and John Edwards by name. "In particular, he has been very impressed by Sen. Obama. . . . It is an indication of the seriousness and strength of his candidacy."

The fundraiser does not equal an endorsement for Obama, Spahn said. "He will ultimately settle on one candidate" -- just not yet. Is he hosting a similar party for Clinton? Nothing's planned yet, said Spahn.Simeon Booker Looks Back at a Storied Career

Simeon Booker, the longtime Washington bureau chief for Ebony/Jet magazine, is finally retiring at age 88, so the tributes were long and heartfelt Tuesday night. "We have reaped the benefits for his nearly 60 years in journalism," said his boss Linda Johnson Rice, prez and CEO of Johnson Publishing.

Old colleagues and admirers cited his stories on the White House beat, the civil rights movement and the rise of the black middle class. Booker himself cited a different career highlight: The time he brought Martin Luther King Jr . to the then lily-white National Press Club. "He was their first black speaker," Booker told the crowd.

Among those turning out to pay tribute: Bernard Shaw, Gwen Ifill, Rep. Charles Rangel, Eleanor Clift, radio host Joe Madison, and perhaps the most delightfully random guest -- Kellie Williams, the D.C. native who played Urkel's dream girl on "Family Matters" and now works here in children's theater.A Heady Day at the White House

During the anxious days of late spring 2003 inside the White House, as the rationale for the Iraq war was eroding, Scooter Libby was especially worked up one morning about a visit from a couple of VIPs. CIA official Craig Schma ll testified in Libby's perjury trial yesterday that notes he took from a June 14 intelligence briefing with Dick Cheney's then chief of staff included this sentence: " Tom Cruise and Penelope Cruz at his office."

Dow Hits Record, Its 26th Since October (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

Wall Street soared yesterday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average to a new high. The Nasdaq composite index jumped 1.4 percent after profit reports from Yahoo and Sun Microsystems restored the confidence of investors in the technology sector.

There was little wide-ranging movement in the energy and health sectors in response to President Bush's State of the Union address, during which he called for expanded health insurance coverage and a 20 percent reduction in the country's consumption of gasoline over the next 10 years. Some alternative-energy companies pulled back after rising sharply before the speech.

In an essentially all-earnings day, investors were left without new economic data to help provide clues about the direction of interest rates.

"I think investors were waiting with the techs for the earnings to come out," said Neil Massa, an equity trader at John Hancock Funds. "Investors were in the show-me mode."

The technology-laden Nasdaq composite index jumped 34.87 points, to 2,466.28, for its biggest one-day increase since early December.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 87.97 points, or 0.7 percent, to 12,621.77, passing a record close of 12,582.59 set Jan. 16. It was the Dow's 26th record close since the surge began at the start of October.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index reached a six-year high, rising 12.14 points, or 0.85 percent, to 1,440.13. The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies was up 8.65 points, or 1.10 percent, at 794.03.

Light crude settled up 33 cents at $55.37 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange as investors grew more confident that OPEC would make good on production cuts and as cooler weather took hold in the Northeast. Prices rose even as United States government figures showed a buildup of crude, gasoline and distillate inventories last week.

Exxon Mobil rose 41 cents, to $74.90. The energy sector appeared to take in stride the president's call for austerity in gasoline consumption, though some companies that make a business of alternative energy products were lower.

Xethanol, an ethanol maker, fell 25 cents, or 8.14 percent, to $2.82, while its larger rival, Archer Daniels Midland, declined 54 cents, to $32.09.

Health care stocks also appeared little moved by the speech. The insurer Aetna fell 44 cents, to $41.74, while the drug maker Pfizer rose 45 cents, to $26.82.

In other corporate news, Yahoo jumped $1.98, to $28.94, after the company's fourth-quarter profit topped Wall Street's estimates.

Sun Microsystems, a maker of server and storage products, rose 49 cents, to $6.15, after the company reported its first quarterly profit in years as revenue increased.

McDonald's fell 69 cents, to $44.16, after some analysts said operating profits at the fast-food chain came in lower than expected. Over all, fourth-quarter earnings were in line with Wall Street's estimates. The company's profit more than doubled after it spun off Chipotle Mexican Grill and recorded strong sales in Europe.

The chip maker Advanced Micro Devices fell $1.48, to $16.03, after it swung to a loss in its fourth quarter from a profit in the period a year ago.

Corning, which makes glass, fiber optics and specialty materials, rose $2.06, to $20.90, after posting a stronger-than-expected fourth-quarter profit on strong sales of liquid-crystal-display glass for flat-screen televisions.

The benchmark 10-year Treasury note was flat at 9818/32, and the yield remained at 4.81 percent.

Following are the results of yesterday's Treasury auction of two-year notes:

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

NEW YORK, Jan. 24 -- Wall Street bounded higher Wednesday, lifting the Nasdaq composite index well over 1 percent after profit reports from Yahoo and Sun Microsystems restored investors' confidence in the tech sector. The Dow Jones industrial average logged trading and closing highs.

The Dow rose 87.97, or 0.70 percent, to 12,621.77, surpassing its record close of 12,582.59 set Jan. 16. It was the Dow's 26th record close since the blue-chip average began its surge in October. The Dow also reached a record trading high of 12,623.45.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index reached a six-year high, rising 12.14, or 0.85 percent, to 1440.13. The tech-laden Nasdaq composite index jumped 34.87, or 1.43 percent, to 2466.28 -- its biggest one-day increase since early December.

Tech stocks have borne most of Wall Street's concern about the health of corporate earnings in recent weeks. Restive investors, taking their cues from a flurry of profit reports, have been at turns pleased and concerned about the prospects that profit growth will help drive stocks higher following a sharp run-up in 2006.

There was little movement in the energy and health sectors in response to President Bush's State of the Union address, during which he called for expanded health insurance coverage and a 20 percent reduction the country's gas consumption over the next 10 years. Shares in some alternative-energy companies pulled back after rising sharply before the speech.Movers

Exxon Mobil rose 41 cents, to $74.90, as the energy sector appeared to take in stride President Bush's call for austerity in gasoline consumption.

Aetna fell 44 cents, to $41.74.

Yahoo jumped $1.98, to $28.94, after its fourth-quarter earnings topped estimates.

Sun Microsystems gained 49 cents, to $6.15, after the company reported its first quarterly profit in years as revenue increased.

Advanced Micro Devices gave up $1.48, to $16.03, after the chip maker swung to a loss from a profit in its fourth quarter.

McDonald's fell 69 cents, to $44.16, after fourth-quarter results were in line with estimates.

Stocks Surge On Optimism And New Cash (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

A fresh spurt of optimism about the economy, and a wave of new money flowing into the market, propelled the Dow Jones Industrial Average above 12600 for the first time, marking its 26th record finish in less than four months.

The blue-chip average turned in its largest one-day point or percentage gain of the new year, jumping 87.97 points, or 0.7%, to 12621.77. It is up 1.3% since the year began.

A few investors remain nervous about the risk of higher interest rates this year, with Federal Reserve officials due to discuss their rate plans at a meeting on Tuesday and Wednesday of next week. Others worry that oil prices have suddenly begun rising again as East Coast weather has turned cold.

Still others are uncomfortable that the pace of corporate-profit gains slowed at the end of last year and is likely to slow more this year.

But for now, those concerns have been swept aside. Late Tuesday, Internet portal Yahoo forecast better days to come and computer-maker Sun Microsystems announced upbeat profit news. After regular trading hours yesterday, eBay announced its quarterly results, and investors were betting in advance on good news.

Their bets paid off, as eBay delivered much-stronger-than-expected fourth-quarter results. Its stock already had risen almost 5% in the regular session, and in after-hours trading, it rose another 13%. The eBay results could affect trading today.

More generally, hopes are spreading that, while economic growth may slow from last year, it will remain strong enough to keep profits rising steadily. And despite uncertainty about the Federal Reserve's plans, many investors still appear persuaded that rates will fall at some point this year.

The result is that, after an uncertain start to the month, investors are using any market pullbacks, such as Monday's 88-point Dow decline, as an opportunity to jump in and buy at reduced prices.

"It is still gangbusters. There is still money flowing in," said Tim Smalls, head of U.S. stock trading at brokerage firm Execution in Greenwich, Conn.

Not only was the Dow up strongly yesterday, he said, but the rally was broad-based, including such diverse groups as technology stocks, financials, drug stocks and miners. "You are hard-pressed to find a negative sector," Mr. Smalls said.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, a broad gauge of large stocks, jumped to its highest level since September 2000, up 0.9%, or 12.14 points, at 1440.13. It still isn't closing in on its record high of 1527.46, which it hit in March 2000, but it has gained 1.5% this year, more than the Dow.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index was up, too, jumping 1.1% to 794.03. It is ahead 0.8% for the year after spending a good part of the new year in the red.

Some investors welcomed the fact that President Bush made few major policy proposals in his State of the Union message Tuesday night. It is an old Wall Street maxim that stocks do better when the government faces gridlock.

Yahoo rose more than 7% and Sun more than 8%. The biggest percentage gainer among the 30 components of the Dow industrials was AT&T, which rose more than 4% after its wireless unit Cingular reported better-than-expected profits.

Oil remained volatile. Oil futures initially fell following a weekly government report showing stockpiles strong. But the futures then rebounded amid concerns about rising heating demand, finishing ahead 33 cents at $55.37 a barrel.

Technology stocks were among the day's big winners. They drove the Nasdaq Composite Index ahead 1.4%, or 34.87 points, to 2466.28, its biggest point or percentage gain since early December. It is up 2.1% in 2007 but would still have to double to return to its record of 5048.62, which dates from March 2000.

Some investors worried that tech stocks sometimes rise amid January optimism, only to fade later. But so far, those concerns aren't preventing the gains.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.51%, or 1.26 points, to 246.15.

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.82 billion shares as 2,313 stocks rose and 1,014 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 2/32, or 63 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.810%. The 30-year bond was down 6/32 to yield 4.910%.

The dollar was mixed3. Late in New York, it traded at 121.11 yen, down from 121.64, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2960 from $1.3027.

Incomes And Inequality: What The Numbers Don't Tell Us (NYT)

By Tyler Cowen

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

The growing inequality in wealth and income has led many people to question whether the contemporary American economy is rigged in favor of the rich. While there is little doubt that the gap between the wealthy and everybody else has widened in recent years, the situation is not as unfair as some of the numbers seem to imply.

Much of the measured growth in income inequality has resulted from natural demographic trends. In general, there is more income inequality among older populations than among younger populations, if only because older people have had more time to experience rising or falling fortunes.

Furthermore, more-educated groups show greater income inequality than less-educated groups. Uneducated people are more likely to be clustered in a tight range of relatively low incomes. But the educated will include a greater range of highly motivated breadwinners and relaxed bohemians, and a greater range of winning and losing investors. A result is a greater variety of incomes. Since the United States is growing older and also more educated, income inequality will naturally rise.

Thomas Lemieux, professor of economics at the University of British Columbia, estimates that these demographic effects account for about three-quarters of the observed rise in income inequality for men and 69 to 95 percent of the observed rise in income inequality for women ("<></>" The American Economic Review, June 2006). In other words, rising income inequality is not just a result of unfairness or bad public policy.

Alan Reynolds, senior fellow at the <></>, goes further in his recent book "Income and Wealth." Mr. Reynolds argues that many measures of income inequality do not adequately account for government aid to lower-income groups. Furthermore, he says, the rich appear to be getting so much richer because of the tax-induced shifting of income from the corporate sector to the personal sector in the wake of the 1980s tax changes.

He describes the observed rise in income inequality as a statistical illusion. The consensus of professional economists is that Mr. Reynolds goes too far. The long-term trend of rising income inequality is evident in many different studies, including those of executive compensation, even if some estimates are exaggerated.

In any case, as Mr. Reynolds and others point out, income is not the only — or even the most — important measure of inequality. For instance, inequality of consumption — the difference between what the poor consume and what the rich consume — does not show a significant upward trend (Dirk Krueger and Fabrizio Perri, "Does Income Inequality Lead to Consumption Inequality?" <></>, January 2006). Consumption, of course, is not an ideal indicator of well-being; a high or steady level of purchases may reflect growing debt, and the ease of buying a big-screen TV does not reflect a comparable ease in buying good health care.

Happiness, possibly the most relevant variable for a study of inequality, is also the hardest to measure. Nonetheless, inequality of happiness is usually less marked than inequality of income, at least in wealthy societies. A man earning $500,000 a year is not usually 10 times as happy as a man earning $50,000 a year. The $50,000 earner still enjoys most of the conveniences of the modern world. Even if more money makes people happier, it appears to do so at a declining rate, which places a natural check on the inequality of happiness.

Studies of personal happiness, based on questionnaires and self-reporting, indicate that the inequality of happiness is not growing over time in the United States. Furthermore, the United States has an inequality of happiness roughly comparable to that of Sweden or Denmark, two nations with strongly egalitarian reputations. (See the symposium in Journal of Happiness Studies, December 2005.) American society offers good opportunities for people to be happy, even if not everyone becomes rich.

If we look at leisure, from 1965 to 2003, less-educated groups experienced a bigger boost in free time than more-educated groups (Mark Aguiar and Erik Hurst, "<></>," Federal Reserve Bank of Boston Working Paper). In other words, the high earners are working hard for their money and perhaps they are having less fun.

So matters are not as bad as the critics have suggested. The dollars in our bank accounts are one measure of societal value, and it hardly seems fair that the very wealthy should receive more and more. But for the rest of us, life on the ground is not so terrible. Income and wealth inequality measures, taken alone, provide a misleadingly pessimistic picture.

The broader philosophical question is why we should worry about inequality — of any kind — much at all. Life is not a race against fellow human beings, and we should discourage people from treating it as such. Many of the rich have made the mistake of viewing their lives as a game of relative status. So why should economists promote this same zero-sum worldview? Yes, there are corporate scandals, but it remains the case that most American wealth today is produced rather than taken from other people.

What matters most is how well people are doing in absolute terms. We should continue to improve opportunities for lower-income people, but inequality as a major and chronic American problem has been overstated.

Kerry Won't Run For President In '08 (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON --An emotional Senator John F. Kerry today said he will not run in the 2008 presidential race and vowed to use his Senate perch to hasten an end to the war in Iraq, saying he would work with lawmakers from both parties to reverse President Bush's troop "surge" and force him to withdraw virtually all troops from Iraq by early next year.

Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat, used the unusual forum of the Senate floor to announce his political ambitions. Choking up as he harkened back to his service in Vietnam, Kerry said he would work to make sure the next president doesn't have to cope with the consequences of a "wider war" sparked by the failed policy in Iraq.

"Two years ago I sought the presidency to lead us on a different course. I'm proud of the campaign that we ran," Kerry said.

"We came close, Mr. President, certainly close enough to be tempted to try again," he continued. "There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I've concluded that this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign. It is the time to put my energy to work as part of the majority in the Senate, to do all I can to end this war and strengthen our security.

"The people of Massachusetts have given me an incredible privilege to serve, and I intend to work here to change a policy in Iraq that threatens all that I have cared about and fought for since I came home from Vietnam," he said.

Kerry's decision to stay out of the presidential race reflects a realization that he would have had an uphill climb in capturing the Democratic nomination, given the other party heavyweights who are already in the race, according to Kerry associates.

Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, has been acting like a 2008 candidate virtually since he lost to President Bush -- traveling the country, spreading money to other Democratic candidates, and keeping in place a campaign infrastructure that was ready for another presidential bid.

But according to Kerry associates, the senator's plans changed dramatically in the fallout of his election-eve "botched joke" about the education levels of US troops. The harsh reaction to that incident -- from many Democrats as well as Republicans -- displayed to Kerry the extreme skepticism within his own party about whether he should mount another run.

And, with polls giving front-runner status to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, Kerry realized that he would face formidable adversaries in the quest for the Democratic nomination. Clinton, Obama, and a host of other candidates have been busily hiring campaign operatives and signing up key fund-raisers in recent weeks.

On Iraq, Kerry has emerged as a fierce war critic after initially supporting the invasion of Iraq. He has spoken of his war opposition in a similar vein to his efforts to bring the Vietnam War to a conclusion in the early 1970s.

Kerry's announcement freezes in place the various Democratic aspirants to his Senate seat. Massachusetts hasn't had a vacant Senate seat since 1984 -- when Kerry himself won his first six-year-term -- and several members of the state's all-Democratic congressional delegation have expressed interest in running for the Senate if Kerry retired.

The Money Just Wasn't There For Kerry (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico.com, January 25, 2007

That amount, which the senator from Massachusetts still had on hand after running for the presidency four years ago as the Democratic nominee, is only a fraction of what a presidential candidate will need by the fall of this year.

Serious candidates and candidates who want to be serious in 2008 will have to raise more than a million and a half dollars a week in $2,000 increments starting right about now.

And Kerry, who was criticized by many in his party for not running a more vigorous campaign last time, found it tough going.

A source close to Kerry said, "He was calling around Wednesday and Thursday to close advisers and they had talked to donors several times and the money wasn't going to be there. That coupled with (Barack) Obama-mania, which gave people looking for a Hillary alternative a viable option, is what ended his plans."

Kerry announced his decision not to try again for his party's nomination on the Senate floor yesterday, tearfully saying, "Two years ago, I sought the presidency to lead us on a different course. We came close ... certainly close enough to be tempted to try again. There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I have concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign.

"I don't want the next president to find that they have inherited a nation still divided and a (Iraq) policy destined to end as Vietnam did -- in a bitter and sad legacy. We have to find a way to end this misguided war and bring our troops home."

Kerry lost Ohio, which would have given him the presidency in 2004 by 118,601 votes. The Democratic Party has not re-nominated a losing candidate since Adlai Stevenson in 1956, who then lost again to Dwight D. Eisenhower.

While it never reached the proportions that Howard Dean's scream did, Kerry received a thorough lashing in the media when last year he botched a joke about the draft saying, "Education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Shortly after, Jay Leno said: "John Kerry has apologized for saying those who do not study hard and do their homework will get stuck in Iraq. Now, those that do not campaign well and are boring will end up stuck in the Senate."

Leno's words were more true than he knew. Kerry, who might have had a difficult time running simultaneously for the presidency and the Senate in 2008, will now run just for re-election.

"Today revealed his true character," said Jenny Backus, who worked for Kerry in 2004. "He is a man defined by his commitment to fight and stop unjust wars and this is what he is doing . He is doing this even though it is against his own (presidential) interests."

Late Wednesday, a Kerry advisor said that Kerry would have been capable of raising sufficient funds to run for president through the Internet and "Kerry was prepared to add money of his own."

"We would have been in a far, far stronger fundraising position than (John) Edwards," he contended. He said, however, that "by Thursday (Kerry) basically decided he wasn't running."

"He is a man defined by his commitment to fight and stop unjust wars and this is what he is doing." The best way to do that is to not give one man the power to pretty much declare "war" on any country he wishes - maintaining the power of Congress is the first step to not only stop unjust wars but to prevent them.

by M J Petersen on 01.24.2007 at 09:26 PM

I more than fully supported Kerry in the 2004 election and I thought he did a great job considering I knew next to nothing about him in 2002. I am glad, however, that he will not run this time around as I believe there are far more exciting democratic candidates already on the move.

Senator Kerry's video to supporters and his floor speech in the Senate were eloquent and pointed. He brings passion to the subject of Iraq and his voice will be vital in holding the Bush administration accountable for the wind-down of the war.

by Bette Jeanne on 01.24.2007 at 06:29 PM

John Kerry finally realized his presidential prospects are dead. Too bad he didn't realize that after making the decision not to respond immediately to the Swift Boat attacks!

by GORD2000 on 01.24.2007 at 06:00 PM

Senator Kerry was the only one who thought he was running for President. He was, unfortunately, the last person to find out the truth.

Nevertheless, he is a good man and except for letting himself get Swift-boated and Drudged, he ran a great campaign and won all three debates. He will continue to make a contribution through his work as a Senator through 2008 and beyond.

'Not The Time' For Kerry In '08 (BOSH)

By Emma Ratliff And Casey Ross

Boston Herald, January 25, 2007

"This isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," said Kerry from the Senate floor.

In a speech to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Kerry put pressure on the current administration to set a date to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq but dedicated the last few minutes of his time on the floor to announce to his colleagues that though he was "tempted to try again," he would not make a push for the presidency.

The Senator showed his gratitude to the people of Massachusetts stating, "They have given me the incredible opportunity to serve."

Gov. Deval Patrick, who has previously said he would support Kerry in a 2008 White House bid, is now undecided on who he will back on the Democratic side for the office.

"Had he decided to run, I would have been with him," said Patrick. "I was with him the last time early and I think very highly of Senator Kerry as a man and as a public servant."

Patrick added, "He and I spoke about it on more than one occasion and I respect his decision."

As for the landscape of the democratic race for a 2008 presidential bid, it's still too early to tell.

"The Senator dropping out will have little effect on the race ... The biggest effect will be in fundraising. There will be those loyal to Kerry that will now be up for grabs as fund-raisers and I am sure the candidates are already on the phone," said Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics.

Kerry, 64, who lost the White House when Ohio voted for President Bush by 118,601 votes on election night in November 2004, said today he was "proud" of his failed campaign.

"We came close," he said.

Kerry said he feels a “deep moral obligation” to help end the war in Iraq and bring the troops home. That daunting task, and not another run for the Oval Office, will be his focus, he said.

“I don’t think there was one single thing,” said Morgan Felchner of Campaign and Elections Magazine of Kerry’s decision.“It’s such a crowded field already and he probably felt they had no room for him.”

His decision leaves a field of nine Democrats running or signaling their intention to do so, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

The Republican field has a similar number with Bush constitutionally barred from seeking a third term.

Kerry’s 2004 campaign drew widespread criticism from fellow Democrats after his defeat. His critics said he had failed to make a forceful enough response to Republican criticism as well as charges by conservative groups that he did not deserve the medals he won for combat in the Vietnam War.

Kerry’s announcement comes just after the release of “What A Party! My Life Among Democrats,” Terry McAuliffe’s scathing memoir that includes an insider’s look into John Kerry’s failed 2004 presidential campaign. McAuliffe was the former head of the Democratic National Committee. [continue]

By David Espo

AP, January 25, 2007

Democratic Sen. John Kerry, who fell 118,601 Ohio votes short of the White House in 2004, said Wednesday he will not run for president in 2008.

"We came close ... certainly close enough to be tempted to try again," the Massachusetts senator said, recalling his defeat.

"There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I have concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign."

His decision leaves a field of nine Democrats running or signaling their intention to do so, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, and John Edwards, Kerry's 2004 vice presidential running mate.

Officials said Kerry would seek a new six-year term in the Senate in 2008. The fourth-term lawmaker and decorated Vietnam War veteran said he would devote his time and energy to ending the conflict in Iraq.

He said he wanted President Bush's successor to enter office with the United States having "a reasonable prospect of success" in Iraq.

"I don't want the next president to find that they have inherited a nation still divided and a policy destined to end as Vietnam did — in a bitter and sad legacy," he said.

Kerry, 64, made the announcement on the Senate floor at the end of a lengthy speech on Iraq. He briefly choked up.

Edwards said he knew the decision was a difficult one for Kerry "because we know his first instinct is always to respond to any call to serve his country." In a statement, he added that Kerry will work to find the appropriate exit from the Iraq war and said, "In Vietnam, in public office and in private life, John Kerry has always fought the good fight for the right cause."

Obama said that from Vietnam to the 2004 campaign, "John Kerry has fought for his country and his ideals. ... and will continue to serve his country with honor and distinction in the years to come."

Kerry's 2004 campaign drew widespread criticism from fellow Democrats after his defeat. His critics said he had failed to make a forceful enough response to Republican criticism as well as charges by conservative groups that he did not deserve the medals he won for combat in the Vietnam War.

The senator stirred unhappy memories for Democrats last fall, when he botched a joke and led Republicans to accuse him of attacking U.S. troops in Iraq.

He apologized, then hastily scrapped several days of campaigning for fellow Democrats as party leaders urged him to avoid becoming an unwanted issue in a campaign they were on the way to winning.

At the same time, he worked to keep his presidential hopes alive.

Aides said he had donated more than $14 million to more than 260 Democratic candidates in 2006, and campaigned in 35 states. They said he has an active online community of more than 3 million people, and has $12.5 million in his campaign bank account, advantages for any presidential contender.

At the same time, polls showed Kerry trailing his Democratic rivals. Last October, an Associated Press-AOL News poll had Kerry at just 1 percent and recent surveys indicated he had gained little among Democrats.

In a CNN/ORC poll released Wednesday, 51 percent of Democrats said they would not like to see Kerry run in 2008. When asked who they would support, only 5 percent said Kerry, placing him fifth and far behind leader Clinton at 33 percent.

The Massachusetts lawmaker decided to clarify his political plans on a day in which he participated in a debate over the war in Iraq by invoking memories of Vietnam. At the committee hearing, he said a memorable question he first posed in 1971 had relevance today: "How do you ask a man to be the last person to die for a mistake?"

Despite his difficulties on a national level, Kerry customarily rolls up large victory margins at home in Massachusetts. He won his first term in 1984.

While Kerry was saying privately as recently as December that he would likely wage a second campaign, the tone among his aides changed in recent weeks as Clinton and Obama announced their White House bids.

Instead, aides began talking about Kerry's concern about the personal toll a campaign would take. Kerry had millions left from his 2004 run — a sore point with some Democrats. Despite the advantage, he would have faced intense competition with Obama, Clinton and Edwards for campaign dollars.

US Senator Kerry Says He Won't Relaunch Bid For White House (AFP)

AFP, January 25, 2007

US Senator John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate who narrowly lost to Republican President George W. Bush, announced he will not launch a new bid for the White House.

"We came close -- certainly close enough to be tempted to try again," the Massachusetts senator said on the floor of the US Senate.

"There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I have concluded that this is not the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," Kerry said.

His decision to pull out is the latest major development in the accelerated 2008 presidential race, in which several candidates have felt compelled to declare their intentions earlier than ever to lock up vital funds and campaign staff, or to bow out.

Kerry made his announcement in a 20-minute speech which he used as a platform for slamming what he called President Bush's "reckless" plan to put more troops into Iraq.

"Our own intelligence agencies tell us that the war in Iraq is fanning the flames of jihad ... and creating a recruitment tool for Al-Qaeda," said Kerry, a decorated Vietnam war veteran who made his opposition to the war in Iraq the centerpiece of his failed White House bid.

He assailed the administration's recently announced plan to send 21,000 additional troops to Iraq.

His 2004 campaign faltered in part over allegations swirling around his past as an anti-war activist and questions raised about the authenticity of his war hero claims.

Senator Harry Reid, the Senate's top Democrat, said those charges were unfair and unfounded smears.

"John Kerry came within a few votes of being president of the United States in one of the dirtiest, most negative, unfair campaigns I have ever witnessed," Reid told the Senate.

"To try to take away from this man his gallantry as a war fighter was beyond the pale," said Reid, "but they did it."

Kerry Says He'll Sit Out 2008 Race (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

WASHINGTON — Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), whose 2 percentage-point loss in Ohio cost him the White House in 2004, announced on the floor of the Senate on Wednesday that he would not seek the presidency in 2008.

"This isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," Kerry said. "It is the time to put my energy to work as part of the majority in the Senate to do all I can to end this war."

Referring to his 2004 campaign, he noted: "We came close, certainly close enough to be tempted to try again." But Kerry said he felt a special obligation to end a war that he had voted to authorize, and attacked the "arrogance" of a White House that not only ignored the advice of military leaders, but changed generals to pursue its goals.

Analysts said Kerry may also have surveyed the field of Democratic candidates — with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois among the front-runners — and determined that there was little interest in a candidate given to long speeches, a less charismatic style and a similar position on the war.

"The writing was on the wall," said Jennifer Duffy of the independent Cook Political Report. "He was getting squeezed. Where once you saw the possibility of his running an 'I-told-you-so' campaign, his position on Iraq is not unique anymore."

About a year before the first primary or caucus vote is cast, the Democratic field is taking shape. In addition to Clinton and Obama, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina — Kerry's 2004 running mate — is preparing a challenge, as are New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, among others.

Eight days before the 2006 midterm election, Kerry did not help his presidential chances when he told students in California that if they did not study hard, they would "get stuck in Iraq." Aides said he misread his text, intending to say "You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush." Kerry apologized, calling his remarks "a botched joke."

But the media, fueled by a Republican drumbeat, kept up a barrage of stories that seemingly confirmed the GOP's characterization of Kerry as elitist.

Kerry's announcement came at the end of a long speech on Iraq in which he argued that the United States finds itself "doing precisely what [former Defense] Secretary [Donald H.] Rumsfeld said we wouldn't do — putting our troops in the middle of a civil war" between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

Calling Bush's proposal to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq a "folly," Kerry asked, "Is there one colleague here who believes that 100,000 more troops will pacify Iraq?"

Saying he was proud of his own record of opposing the Vietnam War after he returned from Navy service there — during which he was awarded a Silver Star and Bronze Star — Kerry said he would press the Senate not just to oppose the president's strategy in Iraq but to cut off funding for the war. "We have to find a way to end this misguided war and bring our troops home," he said.

Kerry's survey of why the war was unwinnable won plaudits from his colleagues, who praised his intelligence and his heroism. "He came within a few votes of becoming president of the United States in one of the dirtiest … campaigns I've ever witnessed," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.). "To try to take away from this man his gallantry as a war fighter was beyond the pale, but they did it."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, the senior senator from Massachusetts, praised Kerry as "a true hero in every sense," and said he knew how difficult it was for his friend to opt out of the presidential race. Those close to Kerry said he would run for a fifth Senate term in 2008.

Kerry Will Not Enter Presidential Race (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who narrowly lost the presidency to President Bush in 2004, announced Wednesday that he would not proceed with a second bid for the White House, saying he preferred to use his position in the new Senate majority to press for an end to American involvement in Iraq.

“We came close, certainly close enough to be tempted to try again,” Mr. Kerry said, invoking his 2004 race, at the conclusion of a 30-minute speech attacking Mr. Bush’s Iraq policy on the Senate floor. “There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I’ve concluded that this isn’t the time for me to mount a presidential campaign. It is the time to put my energy to work as part of the majority of the Senate and do all I can to end the war.”

Mr. Kerry’s announcement, though it came in an unorthodox place, was not a surprise.

He was bowing to a Democratic Party that was clearly unreceptive and had turned its attention to new candidates, in particular Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who both got into the race this month. Many Democrats had said they expected that Mr. Kerry would decide not to run after assessing how much support he had in his party. Already, most of his aides from the 2004 campaign have moved on.

More than that, it appeared to bring to completion a candidacy that for Mr. Kerry never truly ended after that Election Day in 2004 which began with exit polls showing him heading for a solid victory — aides were addressing him as Mr. President — and ended with his making a concession call to Mr. Bush. That experience, friends said, left Mr. Kerry bitter and frustrated and eager for a rematch.

He used his time on the Senate floor to recount his history as a Vietnam veteran who returned from war nearly 40 years ago to become an opponent of the conflict. His voice cracking with emotion, he drew frequent comparisons between the two wars as he made a case against Mr. Bush’s foreign policy in the Middle East.

"The fact is, what happens here in the next two years may irrevocably shape or terribly distort the administration of whichever candidate is next elected president," he said, adding, "I don't want the next president to find that they have inherited a nation still divided and a policy destined to end as Vietnam did."

Mr. Kerry's speech drew tributes from fellow Democrats, including the senior Democrat from Massachusetts, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, who had been pushing Mr. Kerry to make a decision.

Another Democratic senator running for president, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, said: "My initial reaction to Senator Kerry's decision is one of extreme sadness. John Kerry is a major voice in American politics, and the country would be much better off today if he were president."

Mr. Kerry made his announcement at 3 p.m. in a Senate chamber that, other than two senators — Mr. Kennedy and Harry Reid, the majority leader — was almost empty.

Mr. Kerry, 63, intends to run for a fifth term in the Senate in 2008, an aide said.

The senator, in his travels around the country since the election, has argued that he came close to winning in 2004 and would be a better candidate, with extra experience, in 2008.

After being taunted in the 2004 race as being equivocal on the war in Iraq, he had emerged as one of his party's leading opponents to the war, and had renounced his original support for the war resolution that caused him so many problems in the 2004 election.

But Mr. Kerry faced severe obstacles in trying to capture his party's nomination for a second time. For one thing, many of his supporters had made clear that they would not join him again, with many saying he had made mistakes in 2004 that cleared the way for Mr. Bush to win.

Mr. Kerry also faced an unusually strong and deep field of Democratic contenders, including Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and Mr. Kerry's running mate from 2004, John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina.

But Mr. Kerry's hopes were probably most damaged by what he said was a botched joke he told while campaigning on behalf of Congressional candidates in the final week of the 2006 election campaigns.

Mr. Kerry's prepared remarks called for him to say, "Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush." In his delivery, he dropped the word "us."

For many Democrats, the remark was a reminder of instances of ineptness by Mr. Kerry as a campaigner, including his often troubled efforts to explain his changing views on the war in Iraq. Most famously, he said that he had voted for an $87 billion war appropriation "before I voted against it," a piece of videotape that Republicans quickly turned into a defining caricature of him.

In '08, Kerry To Run For Senate Not White House (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) announced yesterday that he will not run for president next year and will instead run for reelection to the Senate.

Speaking with emotion on the House floor and taping a video that was sent to supporters, Kerry said he would forego a bid for a second straight Democratic presidential nomination and pledged instead to devote the next two years to bringing the Iraq war to an end. He would rather leave the next president with a chance at success than run again himself, he said.

"We came close," he said on the floor, "certainly close enough to be tempted to try again. There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now, but I've concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign.

"It is the time to put my energy to work as part of the majority of the Senate, to do all I can to end this war and to strengthen our security and our ability to fight the real war on terror."

Kerry, who has eyed the White House since coming up just short in 2004 and has raised money accordingly, had become a long shot for a repeat bid. He languished in early polls despite high name recognition. While Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) have emerged as frontrunners after announcing their intentions recently, a possible Kerry bid has met with skepticism among pundits.

Kerry damaged his cause with comments shortly before the 2006 midterm elections in which he told students at a rally in California that they had better take their education seriously. Otherwise, he said, "you get stuck in Iraq."

Republicans seized on the comments, which Kerry called a "botched joke." He said it was meant to be a jab at President Bush rather than at men and women who served in the military in Iraq.

Shortly after the comments, his presidential primary poll numbers dipped below 10 percent and have not recovered. He apologized but was scarcely seen on the campaign trail for the rest of the election.

He pledged to lead a battle to set a deadline in Iraq. He will introduce legislation and has set up a website (www.setadeadline.com) where supporters can sign a petition and "co-sponsor" his legislation.

"I intend to work here to change a policy in Iraq that threatens all that I've cared about and fought for since I came home from Vietnam," he said on the floor, choking up. "The fact is that what happens here in the next two years may irrevocably shape or terribly distort the administration of whichever candidate is next elected president."

Bush defeated Kerry by 286 electoral votes to 251 in 2004, a victory secured once Ohio, the decisive battleground state, tipped in favor of the incumbent. Kerry garnered about 48 percent of the popular vote.

Kerry won the Iowa Democratic caucus in 2004 with 38 percent of the vote, defeating former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean in a widely unexpected upset. This set the stage for victories in New Hampshire and other early states. Yet in a Strategic Vision poll of Iowa caucus-goers released Tuesday, Kerry was in sixth place with 3 percent.

Kerry was hurt mainly because voters did not want to risk voting twice in a row for the same losing candidate, said Jeff Link, an Iowa Democratic consultant aligned with the presidential campaign of former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

"Our party has traditionally not been interested in seeing people make a couple runs at the White House," Link said, adding that former Vice President Al Gore, the 2000 Democratic nominee, would probably have faced a similar situation in 2004.

Kerry's decision will allow members of the Massachusetts delegation and his 2004 supporters in Iowa, New Hampshire and other early states to align with other candidates.

The Massachusetts delegation, including senior Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), has been putting Kerry under pressure to make his decision. Kennedy said he would support Kerry if he ran.

Kennedy's office did not return a call about his presidential endorsement by press time. Kerry's decision came less than 24 hours after Obama sat between Kennedy and Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin (D) at President Bush's State of the Union address.

"I have the utmost respect for [Kerry] and the difficult decision he has made," Kennedy said in a statement. "I believe this country would be far better off if he were in the White House today. I know that our country and our state are far better off thanks to his exceptional service in the United States Senate."

Most of the potential 2008 Democratic candidates have already entered the race or formed exploratory committees: Clinton, Edwards, Obama, Vilsack, Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico and Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio).

Gore, Gen. Wesley Clark, the Rev. Al Sharpton and former Sen. Mike Gravel (D-Alaska) are also potential candidates. Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia, Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and former Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) have decided not to run.

Kerry's decision to run for reelection to the Senate in 2008 ends a period of positioning among members of Massachusetts's 10-member, all-Democratic House delegation who had been interested in running for his seat if it became vacant.

With Kennedy just beginning his ninth term and newly elected Gov. Deval Patrick (D) also taking office in January, opportunities for advancement are far off.

Rep. Michael Capuano told The Hill that he recently called Kerry to express interest in running for the seat. Reps. Marty Meehan and Edward Markey have sizeable war chests ($4.9 million and $2.4 million, respectively) and most other members of the delegation have expressed some interest in the Senate in the past.

Kerry Rules Out 2008 Run For President (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts ruled out a second presidential bid yesterday, asserting that he could do more to change the course of Iraq policy in the Senate than by campaigning in Iowa and New Hampshire.

"I've concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," the former Democratic nominee said. "I intend to work here to change a policy in Iraq that threatens all that I have worked for and cared about since I came home from Vietnam."

Since his loss to President Bush in 2004, Kerry had left open the possibility of a return run. He had emerged as one of the most vociferous voices in opposition to the war in Iraq and spent much of the 2006 campaign season traveling the country in support of Democratic candidates. Much of that work was forgotten when, a little more than a week before Election Day, Kerry made a remark that Republicans said was disparaging to American troops in Iraq. He insisted that it was nothing more than a botched joke, but he quickly issued an apology.

Several people close to Kerry said he struggled with the decision over whether to run again, weighing the narrowness of his 2004 defeat against the obvious hurdles presented by a Democratic field filled with popular figures such as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.). Kerry acknowledged as much in his remarks, saying: "We came close, certainly close enough to try again."

The sources said his decision was not motivated by national and state polling that showed him trailing Clinton, Obama and Edwards in hypothetical 2008 matchups. They noted that Kerry has nearly $13 million in the bank, which could have been used to reintroduce himself to voters. But there are real concerns that a second national candidacy could endanger Kerry's standing in his home state.

"Like a very smart fighter, [Kerry] made the best long-term decision for himself and the country by recognizing where the real battlefield is on the Iraq war," said Jenny Backus, a former Kerry adviser who is currently neutral in the 2008 race.

Kerry is expected to run for a fifth Senate term in 2008. He made clear during his speech that he will continue to forcefully oppose the foreign policy course being pursued by the Bush administration.

"It's not enough for Congress to go on record opposing the president's reckless plan," Kerry said. He added that he supports a measure that would require congressional authorization for any further U.S. troop buildup in Iraq.

In an e-mail to past supporters announcing his decision, Kerry unveiled a new online grass-roots effort, which is being run by progressive blog guru Jerome Armstrong. The effort seeks "co-sponsors" to legislation he plans to introduce aimed at forcing Bush to set a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. The proposal mirrors one Kerry offered last April that would have required all U.S. forces be out of Iraq by the end of 2006; it was defeated 83 to 16 in a Senate vote in June.

Kerry's announcement came on the same day that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved a nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of a surge of additional U.S. troops in Iraq. Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), a potential presidential candidate, was the only Republican who voted in favor of the resolution.

Edwards, who was Kerry's running mate in 2004, called the Massachusetts senator a "friend." He noted that "all Americans are fortunate to have John's experience, insight and conscience in the Senate."

Obama was similarly laudatory, predicting that Kerry "will continue to serve his country with honor and distinction in the years to come."

Many Democrats had regarded Kerry's decision as a foregone conclusion because of the competitive field, his baggage from the 2004 election and the historical unwillingness of the Democratic Party to renominate a losing presidential candidate.

Stephanie Cutter, Kerry's national spokeswoman in 2004, praised the senator for the campaign he ran, but she added: "The reality is the 2008 race moved past him months ago, and catching up would have taken much more than another candidate's implosion or last-minute surge."

Kerry's allies said yesterday that he remains a major political force in no small part because of his fundraising ability. In last year's election campaign, they noted, he raised $14 million for 260 candidates, thanks to an e-mail list that contains more than 3 million names.

Kerry To Forgo White House Bid (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, said yesterday that he will not seek the nomination again in 2008, but will instead devote his energies to ending the war in Iraq and bringing American troops home.

Mr. Kerry had intended to make another try for the White House, but a remark he made in the fall while campaigning for Democrats suggesting that only poorly educated Americans ended up fighting in Iraq sparked an uproar of criticism, even from within his own party, that drove him from the campaign trail.

Mr. Kerry said at the time that his comments were nothing more than "a botched joke." But the angry public reaction to his remarks, especially from military voters and veterans, embarrassed his party and, some said, tarnished his image as a presidential prospect.

"I have concluded that this is not the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," Mr. Kerry said from the Senate floor at the end of an address opposing President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 soldiers to Iraq. Instead, with his voice breaking, he said he planned to "put my energy to work as part of the majority in the Senate to do all I can to end this war."

"What happens here in the next two years may irrevocably shape or terribly distort the administration of whichever candidate is elected president," he said.

Mr. Kerry who ruefully recalled that he had voted for the Senate resolution to authorize the war, a vote he called "a mistake" said that as a result of his vote, he now felt "a personal responsibility to bring this war to a conclusion."

"So I say to John Kerry: I love you, John Kerry. And I'm so sorry that things didn't work out for our country. But that doesn't take away from the fact that I will always care about you greatly and remember the times we've spent together," the Nevada Democrat said.

His 2004 running mate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, paid tribute to Mr. Kerry by saying the withdrawal decision must have been tough because "we know his first instinct is always to respond to any call to serve his country."

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, said that from Vietnam to the 2004 campaign, "John Kerry has fought for his country and his ideals and will continue to serve his country with honor and distinction in the years to come."

But Democratic campaign strategists privately have been saying for some time that the senator was no longer a contender in a crowded field of candidates, led by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards.

A Gallup Poll of Democratic voters found last week that Mr. Kerry, who lost to Mr. Bush by a 51 percent to 48 percent margin, drew only 8 percent support among his party's rank and file.

Democratic leaders in the early caucus and primary battlegrounds of Iowa and New Hampshire also said that Mr. Kerry was registering little support in their states, running far behind the front-runners, who already have considerable campaign organizations and fundraising pledges.

Mr. Kerry had more than $12 million in his Senate campaign account, which he could have used for a presidential bid, and a valuable e-mail list of 3 million supporters and donors who backed him in 2004. But aides to the senator said he intends to seek re-election to a fifth Senate term in 2008.

Obama Debunks Claim About Islamic School (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 25, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama fought back Wednesday against an allegation that he was educated at a radical Islamic school as a child in Indonesia, determined to avoid being tripped up by unsubstantiated charges like those that undermined John Kerry in 2004.

Interviews by The Associated Press at the elementary school in Jakarta found that it's a public and secular institution that has been open to students of all faiths since before the White House hopeful attended in the late 1960s.

Obama, who was born in Hawaii, moved to Indonesia at age 6 to live with his mother and stepfather, attending schools in the country until age 10, when he returned to Hawaii to live with his maternal grandparents.

"The allegations are completely baseless," said Akmad Solichin, the vice principal at SDN Menteng 1, who added, "Yes, most of our students are Muslim, but there are Christians as well. Everyone's welcome here ... it's a public school."

A spokesman for Indonesia's Ministry of Religious Affairs said claims that Obama studied at an Islamic school are groundless.

"SDN Menteng 1 is a public primary school that is open to people of all faiths," said the spokesman, Sutopo, who goes by only one name. "Moreover, he studied earlier at Fransiskus Assisi, which is clearly a Catholic school."

The contention that Obama was educated at a radical Muslim madrassa surfaced on the Web site of the conservative Insight magazine the day after Obama announced he was jumping into the 2008 presidential race. Conservative Internet blogs and the Fox News Channel picked up the story and spread the charges just as his candidacy was getting off the ground.

Obama on Wednesday called the reports "scurrilous," and his communications director e-mailed reporters a lengthy memo attempting to set the record straight.

"I think they recognize that the notion that me going to school in Indonesia for two years at a public school there at the age of 7 and 8 is probably not going to be endangering in some way the people of America," Obama said on NBC's "Today" show.

The push-back was a signal Obama would fight to protect his reputation in the presidential campaign.

Many Democrats argued that Kerry's failure to challenge aggressively his critics in the 2004 presidential race cost him in his effort to unseat President Bush. A group with conservative ties, the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, charged that Kerry did not deserve the medals he won in the Vietnam War — despite his combat record of bravery and valor. Kerry announced Wednesday that he will not run again in 2008.

"We will not be swift-boated," said Obama communications director Robert Gibbs. "And we won't take allegations that are patently untrue lying down."

Obama's mother, divorced from Obama's father, married a man from Indonesia named Lolo Soetoro, and the family relocated to the country from 1967-71. At first, Obama attended the Catholic school, Fransiskus Assisis, where documents showed he enrolled as a Muslim, the religion of his stepfather.

The document required that each student choose one of five state-sanctioned religions when registering — Muslim, Hindu, Buddhist, Catholic or Protestant. Gibbs said he wasn't sure why the document had Obama listed as a Muslim.

"Senator Obama has never been a Muslim," Gibbs said. "As a six-year-old in Catholic school, he studied the catechism."

Iis Darmawan, 63, Obama's kindergarten teacher, remembers him as an exceptionally tall and curly haired child who quickly picked up the local language and had sharp math skills. "He wrote an essay titled, 'I Want To Become President,'" the teacher said.

Obama later transferred to SDN Menteng 1 — the elite, secular elementary school at the center of the controversy. The school is public but is very competitive and has exceptionally high standards. It is located in one of the most affluent parts of Jakarta and attracts mostly middle- to upper-class students, among them several of former dictator Suharto's grandchildren.

Indonesia is home to several of the most radical Islamic schools in Southeast Asia, some with alleged terrorist links. But Solichin, who proudly pointed to a photo of a young Barry Obama, as he was known, said his school is not one of them.

Those tied to the school say they are proud to have had a student like Obama, and hope that, if he is elected president, his ties to Indonesia will broaden his world perspective and his views on religion.

Sri Murtiningsih, who retired from Menteng 1 recently after 39 years of teaching, said she has vivid memories of the left-handed boy who followed a standard curriculum of math, writing, and language, together with twice-weekly religious affairs classes and sports.

Murtiningsih said neighbors ran to her house after seeing a television report about his intention to run for president.

"They were yelling, 'Your old student is going to take Bush's job!'" she said. "Tears filled my eyes."

Obama Fires Back (HILL)

By Elana Schor
The Hill, January 25, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) fired back yesterday against Insight magazine and Fox News for purveying a discredited report that he attended a radical Islamic religious school during his childhood years in Indonesia.

In a memo to reporters, Obama communications director Robert Gibbs reiterated that CNN has officially debunked claims published last week in Insight, a property of Washington Times owner Rev. Sun Myung Moon. Fox News picked up the magazine's report, which claimed that the Democratic presidential contender was educated for years in a madrassa, or Muslim school.

Obama attended a secular public school in Indonesia, Gibbs noted, taking Fox News hosts John Gibson and Steve Doocy to task for reiterating the rumor. Aides to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Obama's biggest early rival for the nomination, have made clear that Clinton's camp was not behind the Insight story.

"These malicious, irresponsible charges are precisely the kind of politics the American people have grown tired of, and that Senator Obama is trying to change by focusing on bringing people together to solve our common problems," Gibbs wrote.

Alongside the memo was a letter signed by 11 leaders of Jewish, Baptist, Catholic, Muslim and other Christian groups condemning the Obama news reports as a mean-spirited attempt to drive a wedge between American religious sects.

Obama's Appeal To Blacks Remains An Open Question (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

DOJ_NMG_0121457

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

CHICAGO -- Looking around at the overwhelmingly white audience that was applauding Sen. Barack Obama's luncheon speech on Iraq at a downtown hotel recently, the Rev. B. Herbert Martin expressed both satisfaction and concern.

Martin, who said he was the only black person in the crowd, was thrilled that Obama, the only African American in the Senate, could engender such enthusiasm from a white audience because it offered further proof that the Illinois Democrat would be a formidable presidential candidate. But Martin also worried that in order to run successfully Obama would have to become a different kind of politician than the one who earned the trust of voters on Chicago's mostly black South Side as a state legislator before he was elected to the U.S. Senate in 2004.

"How does he identify himself?" asked Martin, who was pastor to the late Harold Washington, Chicago's first black mayor. "Will he continue to be an African American, or will he become some kind of new creation?"

The question of how Obama chooses to define and approach race looms large as he moves closer to formally launching his campaign next month. Although he rides a wave of enthusiasm among Democrats who like his vision of a different kind of politics and see him as an alternative to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), it is not clear that his multiracial message can excite black voters hungry for affirmation of their top concerns.

Melissa V. Harris-Lacewell, a Princeton University professor who has followed Obama's political ascent, said that he may be forced to choose: "You can be elected president as a black person only if you signal at some level that you are independent from black people" -- a move she said would be "guaranteed" to make black people angry. "He is going to have to figure out whether there is a way not to alienate and anger a black base that almost by definition is going to be disappointed," she said.

Already, that balancing act is causing some strains. Some of Obama's longtime black supporters in Illinois are grumbling about the largely white crowd of advisers who now surround Obama as he gears up his national campaign. "Who does he represent? That is what people are worried about," said Lorenzo Martin, publisher of the Chicago Standard newspapers, a chain of black-oriented weeklies that circulate in the southern suburbs. "When you look and see who is surrounding him, you are not going to see too many brothers. What you see is the liberal left."

Complicating matters is that Obama appears certain to encounter fierce competition for the black vote from the other leading Democratic presidential contenders. Black Democrats prefer Clinton 3 to 1 over Obama, and four out of five of black Democrats view her favorably, much higher than the 54 percent who have a favorable view of Obama, according to combined findings from two Washington Post-ABC polls taken in December and January. Clinton also enjoys close ties to top black elected officials, and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, remains extremely popular among African Americans.

Former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.), who launched his presidential campaign from New Orleans's devastated Lower Ninth Ward to highlight his commitment to attacking poverty, is also expected to make a strong appeal to black voters. And waiting in the wings is another African American, Al Sharpton, a candidate in 2004 who is considering running again.

"If we're talking about the urban agenda," Sharpton asked earlier this month in discussing his possible candidacy, "can you tell me anybody else in the field who's representing that right now?" And, in remarks that were widely interpreted as referring to Obama, he added: "Right now we're hearing a lot of media razzle-dazzle. I'm not hearing a lot of meat, or a lot of content. I think when the meat hits the fire, we'll find out if it's just fat or if there's some real meat there."

Jesse L. Jackson, whose presidential campaigns in 1984 and 1988 created a sensation across black America that swept millions of new voters onto the rolls, said there is no guarantee that Obama could expect the same kind of support. "He faces some real challenges," Jackson said. "First, there will be intense competition for black votes. The other reason is that most black people met him two years ago on television from Boston."

Jackson was referring to the speech at the 2004 Democratic convention that propelled Obama onto the national stage when he was still an Illinois state senator. The contrast with Jackson's own background as a nationally known civil rights leader years before he ever thought of running for president was implicit. But Jackson said he has encouraged Obama to run, adding last week that his "inclinations are really to Barack."

Born to a white mother and a black Kenyan father, reared in Hawaii by his white grandparents and for a few years in Indonesia with his Indonesian stepfather, Obama in many ways embodies the one America he often talks about: He identifies himself as African American, but his experiences are at once those of African Americans, whites, Asian Americans and immigrants.

"I've never had the option of restricting my loyalties on the basis of race, or measuring my worth on the basis of tribe," Obama wrote in his latest book, "The Audacity of Hope," in which he also observed that he has "blood relatives who resemble Margaret Thatcher and others who could pass for Bernie Mac."

Still, Obama chose to build his political career by rooting himself in the black community. In 1983, not long after resigning from a high-powered financial consultant's post in Manhattan, he moved to Chicago as a $10,000-a-year organizer for the Calumet Community Religious Conference. Dressed casually, he would visit barbershops and cruise the main thoroughfares in his used car to get a feel for the South Side.

He left Chicago to attend Harvard Law School and then returned to head a statewide voter-registration effort before joining a small civil rights law firm. In 1996, he was elected to the Illinois Senate from a mostly black South Side district.

Obama and his wife, Michelle, another black lawyer, were married at the predominantly black Trinity United Church of Christ in Chicago. "He had built himself a base among black voters on the South Side," said Timuel D. Black, professor emeritus at City Colleges of Chicago.

Despite his record of grass-roots work, questions about Obama's racial credentials formed a critical subplot for his ill-fated primary challenge of Rep. Bobby L. Rush (D-Ill.) in 2000. Rush, a former Black Panther, appeared politically wounded after failing badly in his campaign to unseat Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley the year before. But Rush trounced Obama 2 to 1, and the congressman was joined on primary night by Jackson, who had endorsed him.

Rush won in part by depicting Obama as a Harvard elitist who was out of touch with the concerns of workaday African Americans. More suspect for some voters was that Obama lived in racially mixed and largely upscale Hyde Park and was teaching law part time at the University of Chicago, which is widely viewed as being disconnected from the poor South Side communities nearby.

"There were elements within the African American community who might have suggested 'Well, he's from Hyde Park' or 'He went to Harvard' or 'He was born in Hawaii, so he might not be black enough,' " Obama told the Chicago Tribune.

Those questions were intensified by Obama's unusual heritage, according to other observers. Kwame Raoul, a Haitian American who now fills Obama's former seat in the state Senate, said he too has encountered skepticism from black voters for his ethnic background and for his name.

"When I first decided to run for office and circulate petitions, people would say: 'Kwame Raoul? I'm not voting for a foreigner,' " he said. "I'm certain that before people knew who Barack Obama was, he had to deal with the same thing."

Four years after losing to Rush, Obama cruised to a lopsided victory during a U.S. Senate run in which the campaigns of his major primary and general election opponents imploded in scandal. Still, the issue of his heritage was raised by Alan Keyes, the black radio host and conservative activist brought in late by the Republican Party to oppose Obama.

During the campaign, Keyes argued that the government should pay reparations to descendants of slaves -- pointedly observing that Obama would not qualify under his proposal. When the question of race was raised in that campaign, Obama frequently responded with a practiced line. "I'm rooted in the African American community," he would say. "But I'm not limited by it."

Keyes's broadside had little effect as Obama won his Senate seat with strong support in many parts of the state, including in the black precincts where he had been drubbed in his race for the House. Now, as Obama moves closer to formalizing his presidential campaign, he is sure to be confronted with more questions about his racial identity. Through his staff, Obama declined to comment.

"This is a question Senator Obama has had to answer many times during his career," said Tommy Vietor, Obama's press secretary. ". . . He's consistently proved that he hasn't forgotten the communities he's worked with so far, and certainly won't in the future."

In Chicago's storied Bronzeville neighborhood, African Americans asked about his candidacy mainly expressed excitement. Browsing through Afrocentric Book Store, Nathan Unger, 63, stopped to say that he wants Obama to run although he harbors few illusions about how much Obama would be able to focus on the concerns of black voters.

"Even if we get 30 percent from Obama, we're not going to get that from anybody else," Unger said. "From white folks, we might get 10 percent. What I worry about is that we might want too much from him. It's not just about us out here; it's about everybody."

Obama On Tightrope In Bid For Black Vote (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama will have a tough time generating support for his presidential bid among key black Democratic leaders -- many of whom are loyal to the Clintons -- and he must guard against undermining his electability by becoming the civil rights candidate, campaign strategists say.

"It will be very difficult for Obama to take those superdelegate votes in the hip pockets of the Clintons. They have a lot of political IOUs with the party bosses and that will be very difficult for Obama to abscond with," said political consultant Sam Riddle, who helped the Rev. Jesse Jackson win Michigan's Democratic primary in his 1988 presidential bid.

"If they back Obama, most of them know or suspect they have very little money coming. But if they back Hillary and garner black voters for her, they know they can get something," he said, referring to the political strength of Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Several strategists said Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, will have to walk the tightrope of wooing black liberal activists, including such polarizing figures as the Rev. Al Sharpton and Mr. Jackson, while avoiding limiting his appeal by leading with his race and running primarily on civil rights issues.

"He has to be really careful not to be labeled 'the black candidate' because it will put him in the position of being linked to Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton," Mr. Riddle said.

Mr. Obama will have his first opportunity to talk with Mr. Sharpton about his candidacy today when the New York minister visits Capitol Hill to meet with Democratic presidential candidates, first with Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, then with Mrs. Clinton, and with Mr. Obama last.

Mrs. Clinton has a similar problem with female voters if she allows liberal feminists to usurp her campaign, said Morris Reid, a former Clinton administration official who is managing director of the political consulting firm Westin-Rinehart Group.

"They are really going to be fighting for the black vote, but also, Hillary will have to fight for the white suburban women's vote as well. Her base, that white-female educated woman, isn't just going to flock to her," he said.

"Isn't it refreshing that Democrats will have to fight for the black and Hispanic vote? I mean, her husband, Bill Clinton, is a god in the black community. But Hillary and Obama will have to measure up to him," Mr. Reid said.

Democratic strategist Donna Brazile said the complexion of the campaign ensures a split vote along every conceivable demographic of the party, particularly the black vote.

"The black vote is up for grabs, and no candidate -- past or present -- can simply rely on their record," she said. "In order to generate support, they will have to reach out, discuss issues of importance to black voters and include them in the campaign as part of their broader strategy in winning the nomination."

Mr. Riddle said Mr. Obama's biggest critics may end up being black political leaders, who view his "de-racialized" campaign -- "diametrically opposed" to every civil rights-focused black candidate who has run for president -- as a potential threat to their political influence.

To this point in the election cycle, with a year before any primary or caucus votes have been cast, the candidates' messages have been broad. They will have ample time to build a detailed message, backed by policy ideas, but for Mr. Obama that deadline is a bit shorter, Mr. Reid said.

"It works for him, and it is helping him right now, when he is speaking to large macro-organizations," he said. But "he will have to dig deep and pick out two or three meaty issues that he can really dig down on, because it is going to get real old real quick if he continues to talk in these general macro tones to the American public."

While Mr. Obama has the influence to do well, his candidacy is considered by some as an effort to secure the vice-presidential nod.

"Two-thirds of the large recipients of his Political Action Committee are members of the Democratic Leadership Council, which was founded by President Bill Clinton," said Glen Ford, executive editor of blackagendareport.com, a politics and social issues Web site.

"He embraces those who are in power and ingratiates with power, and yet, who is the power in the Democratic Party? Two Clintons. So how does that translate to him trying to take over? It doesn't, and I don't see that coming from him."

McCain Trounces Rivals In State Poll, Trails Giuliani Nationally (PBJ)

By Mike Sunnucks

Phoenix Business Journal, January 25, 2007

Arizona Sen. John McCain fared well in a poll of Arizona voters, but trailed former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani among Republicans in surveys taken nationally and in Iowa, a key primary state.

A poll released Wednesday by Arizona State University and KAET-TV 8 shows McCain with a mammoth lead over GOP rivals in a potential Arizona primary.

The ASU survey gives McCain a 54 percent edge. Former U.S. House Speaker Newt Gingrich checks in as the second most popular candidate, favored by 14 percent of respondents, followed by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. The ASU poll did not ask voters about Giuliani.

McCain also was the top choice among state voters -- at 28 percent -- among candidates from both parties. His closest rival was Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., with 20 percent, followed by Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., with 18 percent.

Asking specifically about a Democratic primary in Arizona, the ASU poll gives Obama 29 percent versus 23 percent for Clinton and 15 percent for John Edwards.

McCain's strong showing in the ASU poll comes on the heels his loss in a Maricopa County Republican Party straw poll. Critics say that vote was rigged by conservatives. California Congressman Duncan Hunter, who garnered only 2 percent in the ASU poll, won the straw poll.

A new Rasmussen Reports poll gives Giuliani a 30 percent to 22 percent lead over McCain among GOP voters nationally with Gingrich third and Romney fourth.

A Strategic Vision poll in the early caucus state of Iowa gives Giuliani a 25 percent to 21 percent edge over McCain. Among Democrats, Edwards leads Obama and Clinton in that survey.

Big States' Plan For Earlier Primaries Scrambles Race (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — As many as four big states — California, Florida, Illinois and New Jersey — are likely to move up their 2008 presidential primaries to early next February, further upending an already unsettled nominating process and forcing candidates of both parties to rethink their campaign strategies, party officials said Wednesday.

The changes, which seem all but certain to be enacted by state legislatures, mean that the presidential candidates face the prospect of going immediately from an ordered series of early contests in relatively small states in January to a single-day, coast-to-coast battlefield in February, encompassing some of the most expensive advertising markets in the nation.

The changes would appear to benefit well-financed and already familiar candidates and diminish the prospects of those with less money and name recognition going into such a highly compressed series of contests early next year.

Associates of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the New York Democrat, and Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican, said that should either of them stumble early on, the respective party primaries in California and New Jersey — two states that would seem particularly hospitable to them — could offer an expensive but welcome firewall.

But at the same time, states like New Jersey and California could provide an opening for Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, who faces the daunting prospect of overcoming resistance among social conservatives in the Republican contests in Iowa and South Carolina in January.

And several party analysts suggested that having such delegate-rich states at stake on Feb. 5 could persuade candidates who might otherwise step out after a defeat in Iowa or New Hampshire to press on in hopes of a dramatic recovery on the new Super Tuesday.

"I think this is huge," said John Weaver, a senior adviser to Mr. McCain. "And the unintended consequences could be even bigger."

While officials in both parties are wary of the changes, final say over the calendar rests with the states. Advisers to Republican and Democratic presidential candidates say they have come to view substantial changes as inevitable and they have begun to plan accordingly.

"We don't set the calendar, and we don't control the calendar, but we are going to compete aggressively in all these states," said Patti Solis Doyle, who is the manager of Mrs. Clinton's exploratory presidential effort. "And I will also tell you we have the resources and the organization to compete in all those states."

The developments mark the latest upheaval in a political calendar already in disarray. The Democratic Party voted last year to allow Nevada and South Carolina to move their nominating contests into the narrow period at the beginning of the process that once was confined to just Iowa's caucus and New Hampshire's primary.

But New Hampshire officials, protective of their first-in-the-nation primary status, have responded by saying they will schedule their primary as early as it takes, even before Jan. 1, to protect its traditional role. And no one seems to know where the scramble for influence among the states will end.

"This is completely out of control," said William F. Galvin, the Massachusetts secretary of state. He is the leader of a National Association of Secretaries of State committee that is monitoring this movement and trying to push back against it.

"The issue has been bad," Mr. Galvin said. "But it's never been as bad as it has been this year. In New Hampshire, they are going to be singing Christmas carols and voting."

The developments suggest that the national parties are losing any control they have had over the calendar by which they will nominate presidential candidates in 2008. California, New Jersey, Florida and Illinois are most likely to move their primaries early, probably to Feb. 5, joining at least five smaller states that had already scheduled primaries for that day. Illinois lawmakers are talking about moving their primary to help Senator Barack Obama, a Democratic contender; if history is any guide, it is possible that the other candidates might decline to compete in the home state of one of their rivals.

But final votes have not been taken, and state officials said it was possible they could end up going even earlier. Florida in particular has talked about holding its primary seven days after New Hampshire's, at the risk of sanctions from the Democratic National Committee. And officials said that other states, viewing this surge to the front of the pack, could join in as well.

The Democratic National Committee had adopted a new calendar last year, reducing the once dominant influence of Iowa and New Hampshire, after years of consideration. The Republican Party has so far deferred to Democrats on the changes, waiting to see the outcome of the back-and-forth.

Democrats and Republicans said that the changes would be the latest step in the evolution of a presidential nominating system that increasingly seems resistant to the kind of dark-horse presidential bid that was possible back when small states like Iowa and New Hampshire enjoyed such influence over the nominating process.

It has sowed unease and confusion among campaign staff members as they have tried to measure its implications, and has prompted them to begin making moves now to prepare for a whole different nominating system. While conventional wisdom is that the best-known candidates would benefit, views about how the shift might play out vary among strategists.

Tad Devine, a Democratic consultant who was a senior adviser to Democratic presidential candidates in 2004 and 2000, said the calendar changes, combined with the presence on the Democratic side of three strong and well-financed candidates — Mr. Obama, Mrs. Clinton and, probably, John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator — could mean that the battle for the nomination drags on for months.

"I think there's a very good chance that we are going to be sitting here at the end of next March saying, 'How are people going to put together a majority of delegates with 80 percent of the delegates gone?' " he said. "The nominating process in 2008 is not a little different. It's fundamentally different."

And the campaigns are adjusting accordingly. Mr. McCain recently hired Steve Schmidt, a former Bush campaign operative who managed the re-election bid of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, the California Republican, in no small part because of what he saw as Mr. Schmidt's command of California politics.

Similarly, Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, has turned his attention to Florida, where he sees a strong prospect of knocking out Mr. McCain by appealing to social conservatives, and installed a campaign team that includes two top political advisers to former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida. He is about to announce the hiring of more than six top aides in Florida.

Last weekend, Mr. Romney went to New Jersey, where his aides also think he could make a strong appeal.

"The focus of our efforts publicly have been in Iowa, South Carolina, Michigan, New Hampshire," said Kevin Madden, Mr. Romney's press secretary. "But we are very well organized in Florida."

In the case of Florida, Democrats and Republicans have welcomed the prospect of having to spend heavily on an early primary because that could prove an early investment for the general campaign, as well, considering how competitive that state is. That is not the case in California or New Jersey, two expensive states that have been solidly Democratic in recent presidential races.

And some Democrats disputed the notion that a California victory could help someone recover from a poor showing in the early states. Nick Baldick, a senior adviser to Mr. Edwards, noted that Howard Dean spent heavily in states that held their primaries after New Hampshire and Iowa and never recovered.

"All that mattered was momentum and winning in Iowa," Mr. Baldick said Wednesday. "I would argue that more states on Feb. 5 makes that exponentially more true. That if you don't have momentum going into states like those four big states, then forget it and just go home."

Gingrich Backs English Push As Official Language (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich yesterday announced his support for legislation that would make English the nation's official language in order to combat what he calls "an unprecedented influx of non-English-speaking immigrants."

The Georgia Republican, who is weighing a bid for his party's 2008 presidential nomination, places third in most Republican polls behind Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Mr. Gingrich has said he is speaking out now to infuse his party's presidential primary with ideas and will not make a formal decision about running until September.

"If you are pro-immigration into America, you should be pro-assimilation into the American way of life," Mr. Gingrich said during a press conference in Washington yesterday. "Bilingual education has been stunningly destructive."

Mr. Gingrich denied having an anti-immigration stance. "I am pro-immigration," he said.

He also is for a bill to be introduced by Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, which would make English the official language. Mr. King's bill amassed more than 150 co-sponsors last year but did not become law.

Mr. Gingrich said public pressure ultimately will force lawmakers pass the legislation, even in a Democrat-controlled Congress.

"You find a way to bring it to the floor of the House every two months," he said. "And then those elites in government will be forced to answer, 'Are you with 85 percent of the country or are you against 85 percent of the country?' This is not a Republican or a Democrat issue."

He said previous attempts to pass the legislation failed because of "timidity and [a] rejection of the people's will."

In May, the Senate voted 62-35 for an amendment to the immigration-reform bill that would make English the national language. Supporting it were nine Democrats and all Republicans who voted. Sen. Jim Bunning, Kentucky Republican, Sen. Mel Martinez, Florida Republican, and Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat, did not vote on the amendment.

A Rasmussen Reports survey taken shortly after the vote found that 85 percent of respondents support making English the official language, compared with 11 percent who do not favor the idea.

Mr. Gingrich has outlined a five-step assimilation plan that would: require greater proficiency in English before citizenship is granted, require new citizens to give up the right to vote in their native countries, require that federal documents be in English only, emphasize American history in citizenship courses, and create a program for immersion in English-language training.

"This is a cultural pattern," he said of emphasizing American history and language skills to prospective citizens. "America is a state of mind; it's a way of being."

For Democrats, Bergen County Spells Success (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, January 25, 2007

For Republicans, New Jersey, once a GOP-leaning, anti-tax state, stands as a stark reminder of how things have changed, particularly in the Northeast. But the better example — and warning of things to come — is Bergen County, a suburban bedroom community that has moved away from its Republican roots and toward the Democratic Party.

The county, once bedrock Republican territory and the most populous county in the state, has voted Democratic in the past four presidential elections — twice for Bill Clinton, and more recently for Al Gore and John Kerry.

Even more notably, the county executive and all seven members of the county board of freeholders are Democrats. Republicans lost their last freeholder last year, when incumbent Elizabeth Randall lost her bid for renomination and the eventual nominee lost in November.

But in a development that was more humiliating than substantive, the county party's headquarters was padlocked recently because the Bergen County GOP couldn't pay its rent.

The last remaining county-wide GOP officeholder is County Clerk Kathleen Donovan, a moderate who last year lost a Republican primary for county executive. Donovan, a former state legislator and one-time chairman of the state GOP, is serving her fourth term as county clerk.

No Republican has ever won statewide office without carrying Bergen County, and the last statewide GOP candidate to carry the county was Bob Franks in his losing bid for the Senate in 2000. Last year, Tom Kean Jr. (R) lost the county to Sen. Bob Menendez (D) by 8 points.

Republican Rep. Scott Garrett's 5th Congressional district includes part of Bergen County. He carried the county by only 4,209 votes (51.2 percent), though he won district-wide by 55 percent. The part of Bergen County not represented by Garrett is represented by 9th district Democrat Steven Rothman. Rothman carried the Bergen portion of his district with 71.5 percent of the vote, meaning Bergen County voters voted overwhelming Democratic for Congress last year.

Republicans have three major problems in the county: the national party, changing demographics and a fractured GOP that is being outworked by Democratic strategists.

Many of Bergen County's Republicans are more politically in sync with former Gov. Tom Kean (R) than they are with his son. They are classic Northeast moderates, whose views on cultural issues don't easily fit with Sunbelt conservatives.

DOJ_NMG_0121463

The county itself also is changing. Hispanics and Asians have moved into the county in recent years, as have New Yorkers, many of whom have brought their values and Democratic preference with them.

While these developments would have posed a challenge for the county GOP, they could have been managed had the Bergen County party leaders been smart or county Democratic operatives been inept. Unfortunately for the GOP, neither of those things happened.

Bergen County's Republican organization is being outworked and outfundraised by its Democratic counterpart, which has become a well-oiled machine under the guidance of party Chairman Joseph Ferriero.

While Ferriero helps local Democratic parties raise money and contact voters, Republicans spend most of their time fighting with each other over issues and personalities. Republican conservatives, in particular, seem more interested in isolating and purging moderates than in winning elections. As a result, the county GOP is getting badly outspent in races and losing more and more elections, creating a vicious cycle of defeat.

Bergen Record reporter Scott Fallon noted in a November article that when Ferriero became the county Democratic chief in 1998, Republicans controlled two-thirds of Bergen County towns that had a partisan form of government. After November's elections, Democrats had increased their control to 56 percent of those communities, a dramatic reversal in just eight years. Now, Ferriero has plans to go after sitting GOP state legislators and town officeholders in other previously heavily Republican areas.

Republicans complain that Ferriero is using Democrats' increased political muscle in the county to wring even more money out of companies that want to do business with the county. Odds are that they are right, but so what? That's the way the game is played in New Jersey, and as long as both sides know the rules, nobody is in a position to complain.

Ferriero took a weak county party and built it up, brick by brick. Republicans could do the same thing, if not with immediate success, if they got their act together. And they actually have an issue they could use, both in Bergen County and statewide, to start to rebuild their party: property taxes.

If Bergen were an isolated case, it might not even be worth mentioning. But what's happening there could happen (and indeed has happened) in other northern suburbs. While the GOP has made gains in Georgia, Tennessee and Kentucky, it continues to lose ground in New Jersey, Illinois and southeast Pennsylvania.

Increasingly, Bergen County looks like a model for further Democratic success outside the South. We'll see if the Republicans write it off or take steps to resuscitate their local parties, both in Bergen County and elsewhere in the Northeast.

Gore Film Sparks Parents' Anger (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

FEDERAL WAY, Wash., Jan. 24 -- Frosty E. Hardiman is neither impressed nor surprised that "An Inconvenient Truth," the global-warming movie narrated by former vice president Al Gore, received an Oscar nomination this week for best documentary.

Hardiman, a parent of seven here in the southern suburbs of Seattle, has himself roiled the global-warming waters. It happened early this month when he learned that one of his daughters would be watching "An Inconvenient Truth" in her seventh-grade science class.

"No you will not teach or show that propagandist Al Gore video to my child, blaming our nation -- the greatest nation ever to exist on this planet -- for global warming," Hardiman wrote in an e-mail to the Federal Way School Board. The 43-year-old computer consultant is an evangelical Christian who says he believes that a warming planet is "one of the signs" of Jesus Christ's imminent return for Judgment Day.

The teacher in that science class, Kay Walls, says that after Hardiman's e-mail she was told by her principal that she would receive a disciplinary letter for not following school board rules that require her to seek written permission to present "controversial" materials in class.

The e-mail also pressured the school board to impose a ban on screenings of the film for the district's 22,500 students.

The ban, which the school board says was merely a "moratorium," was lifted Tuesday night, subject to rigorous conditions. Still, the action has appalled the film's producers and triggered a ferocious national backlash.

Members of the school board say they have been bombarded by thousands of e-mails and phone calls, many of them hurtful and obscene, accusing them of scientific ignorance, pandering to religion and imposing prior restraint on free speech.

It has been a terrible ordeal, school board member David Larson said during a long, emotional speech at the board meeting.

"I am here to foster healing in our community," he said, while noting with sadness that "civility and honest discourse are dying in our country."

What the school board had really intended to do, Larson and school board members insisted, was not to stop schools from teaching the science of global warming, but merely to follow long-standing school board rules that require students to be exposed to "other perspectives" when they view a film like "An Inconvenient Truth."

"We do not need to lose balance in order to save the Earth," Larson said.

Exactly what "balance" might amount to, however, was not spelled out.

The National Academy of Sciences, together with nearly all of the world's leading climate experts, have agreed that there is conclusive evidence that human activity is causing the Earth to warm and that there is an urgent need to reduce the amount of carbon being released into the air.

In public comments at the board meeting, several riled-up Federal Way residents argued that "An Inconvenient Truth" was, indeed, scientifically true and that saying otherwise is "deliberate obfuscation."

These residents derisively compared the search for "balance" in the global-warming issue to decades of phony claims by cigarette companies about the lack of "proof" that smoking is harmful to human health.

Before the board meeting started Tuesday night, several residents buttonholed Larson and asked him if there should be a "balanced" presentation of the Nazi Holocaust, because there are many who deny that it occurred.

"The Holocaust happened," Larson said. "We have evidence and photos. The difference between the Holocaust and the global warming is we don't have photos of what will happen 50 years from now."

Sitting in on this conversation was Walls, the seventh-grade science teacher whose class includes Frosty Hardiman's daughter.

"We do have photos of snow melting off Kilimanjaro," Walls said, hopefully.

In the end, though, the board opted for an abundance of balance.

That means that "An Inconvenient Truth" may be shown only with the written permission of a principal -- and only when it is balanced by alternative views that are approved by both a principal and the superintendent of schools.

Hardiman was pleased.

"I am happy they are giving the kids as much information as possible," he said.

His daughter's science teacher, meanwhile, said she is struggling to find authoritative articles to counter the information in the Gore documentary.

"The only thing I have found so far is an article in Newsweek called 'The Cooling World,' " Walls said.

It was written 37 years ago.

Steele To Head GOP Funding Outfit, Start Firm (WT)

By Tom Lobianco

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

ANNAPOLIS -- Former Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele will lead a major Republican fundraising group and start a public affairs consulting firm in Maryland.

Mr. Steele will be the chairman of GOPAC, the national fundraising outfit that former House Speaker Newt Gingrich elevated to national prominence in 1994, and start the Legacy Strategies public affairs firm, he told The Washington Times yesterday.

"I'm really looking forward to it," Mr. Steele said. "It has been a whirlwind challenge. I just finished up four years as lieutenant governor, and I was excited to do it. We'll keep plugging along."

He begins both jobs Feb. 1 and will make a public announcement today.

Mr. Steele also said he likely will write a book about his 30-plus years in politics.

"I've really never shared too much of what it feels like to read words about you in the paper that aren't true, about who has just called you an 'Uncle Tom,' " Mr. Steele said. "I think it speaks to the double standard someone like myself has to live with."

Mr. Steele, 48, was the first black elected statewide in Maryland.

The announcements follow broad speculation about the former U.S. Senate candidate's plans.

Mr. Steele lost his race for a Senate seat in November to Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin. The race attracted national attention as Republicans and Democrats battled for every last seat to control Congress. After Mr. Steele's loss, he was briefly considered to run the Republican National Committee.

He will run his public affairs firm with former Chief of Staff Paul D. Ellington and one or two others, and he expects the firm to grow rapidly.

Mr. Steele said he chose the firm's name based on his belief that minorities need to build "legacy wealth" -- a term that he said means "not just financial legacy, but also the kind of legacy you can't touch."

"I talked a lot about legacy [in the campaign] and very much want to continue that theme in the private sector," he said. "For me, the bottom line is all about building legacy."

After the November elections, Mr. Steele said he was committed to rebuilding the Maryland Republican Party. The GOPAC position allows him to fulfill that promise, Mr. Ellington said.

"GOPAC is kind of a name brand, focusing on the development of state and local candidates," he said. "There will obviously be a Maryland component."

The group was formed in the late 1970s to aid Republican candidates facing a Democrat-controlled Congress and calls itself the Republican Party's "preeminent education and training center."

Outgoing Chairman J.C. Watts Jr. approached Mr. Steele with the offer, based on Mr. Steele's national recognition and his experience running the state Republican Party, Mr. Ellington said.

Mr. Steele's new jobs are good news for state Republicans, said Audra Miller, a spokeswoman for the Maryland Republican Party.

"It's great that Steele will continue to have that presence on the political scene, not only in Maryland, but nationally," she said. "GOPAC has continued to be a strong presence among states and the legislatures for more than 10 years. This will only continue to build upon the great success that they've had."

Reality, At Last, In Richmond (WP)

EYEBALL TO eyeball with a potential electoral disaster in this fall's legislative elections, Virginia Republicans have finally blinked -- a little. They have put forward a transportation funding package that is at least partly serious, which is to say that it relies to a significant degree on new taxes and fees to address the state's most urgent problem. It is an imperfect plan but also a sound starting point for a deal.

Having signed pledges to oppose any new taxes and having torpedoed one funding plan after another, the conservative ideologues who hold sway in the House of Delegates haven't found the courage to raise taxes much themselves. But they have decided to allow the localities where traffic is worst -- in Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads -- to increase their own taxes, particularly on commercial real estate and home sales.

If the local governing boards in Northern Virginia give their assent -- and that remains in doubt in one or two key jurisdictions -- those locally raised taxes would generate some $383 million annually for Northern Virginia. Add that to the state funds the Republicans say they would produce, and the yield is perhaps $500 million a year in new money for roads and mass transit in the region. That's at the low end of what Northern Virginia needs, but it's not bad. It's just part of the story, however.

A primary concern is the portion of statewide funding that would supposedly come from Richmond. In theory, some $250 million of the overall $1 billion in new annual spending for transportation (plus another $100 million annually in debt service) would be siphoned off from the general fund. Translation: It would be taken from existing money for schools, public health, public safety and other priorities that was provided three years ago in the far-reaching tax package enacted by former governor Mark R. Warner (D).

Even if all that money is allocated for transportation, though, there's a catch: Much of the state's portion would be spent not for new construction but to cover soaring maintenance costs. That leaves the locally raised funds -- minus $50 million annually in dedicated funding for Metro -- to widen Interstate 66 or Routes 7, 28 and 29 and other roadways in Northern Virginia. When all's said and done, Richmond is doing the bare minimum itself, and it is leaving the heavy lifting to the Northern Virginia suburbs and Hampton Roads.

We don't mean to dismiss the GOP transportation plan. It's the first serious one offered by House Republicans. And it's encouraging that it includes measures such as raising statewide vehicle registration fees and diesel fuel taxes. All that suggests that the real world facing Virginia's budget makers has begun to make an impression on Republican lawmakers.

Over A Barrel: The Global Scramble For Energy Security (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins, Bhushan Bahree And Patricia Minczeski

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

The past four years have seen the biggest oil-price spike in a generation. That shock has shown energy insecurity to be one of the chief political, economic and military challenges facing the world. 1

The concern from Washington to Beijing -- and a central issue as business and political leaders gather at the World Economic Forum -- springs from a broader-based fear than prices, which have tumbled this month to nearly $50 a barrel after soaring to $77.03 last summer. Rather, the worry is that the geopolitical and economic equilibrium that long enabled the oil industry to smoothly supply customers is a thing of the past. Events in 2007 will test that view.

One concern: Has power permanently shifted to producers? The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel that supplies a third of the world's oil, has seen its market clout soar in recent years as demand grew faster than supply. It cut output twice late last year, and is now pondering additional cuts.

Another worry is turmoil in exporting nations. Nigerian militants are attacking oil facilities almost daily. Russia is renationalizing its oil sector. The U.S. set the stage for trouble in Iraq with its 2003 invasion. Insurgents are sabotaging that country's vast petroleum industry and driving skilled technocrats into exile, threatening to cripple the industry for decades to come. Some experts worry that Iran and Saudi Arabia may be drawn into a proxy war in Iraq. That raises the specter of an energy-doomsday scenario: a conflict among the world's top three oil-reserve holders.

Arguably, the leading culprit is rising demand. The U.S. and China, the two largest consumers, could dramatically shift the balance of power back in their favor by curbing their enormous appetites for crude and developing alternative energy sources.

The quest for energy security, in short, is a global scramble of power, money and ideas. This is a guide to flashpoints likely to shape the outcome of that scramble in 2007.

AP, January 25, 2007

Former U.N. Ambassador John Bolton says the United States may not be able to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons because the Bush administration is following a flawed diplomatic strategy.

In an interview with Fox News airing Wednesday night, Bolton said that contrary to administration claims, the U.N. Security Council resolution against Iran that was approved last month is "very weak."

Bolton stepped down in December after serving as U.N. ambassador for 16 months. He was the point man for the administration in the diplomatic debate over the resolution.

The former envoy said the diplomatic means chosen by the administration to halt Iran's nuclear program may not achieve the desired ends.

"The disjunction between that objective and the diplomacy we have been pursuing is ultimately going to be a problem for the president," Bolton said.

He added that the administration placed too high a priority on achieving unity in the council.

"Pursuing the goal of unity detracts from the substantive goal of preventing Iran from getting nuclear weapons," Bolton said.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Bolton and his U.N. team should take "great pride" in winning the 15-0 council vote against Iran. He said the U.S. would have preferred a stronger resolution but noted that compromise is a central element of international diplomacy.

On Dec. 24, after two months of debate, the council voted unanimously to punish Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment.

The resolution orders all countries to stop supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs. It also freezes Iranian assets of 10 companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

"Is it a good, strong resolution? Yes," McCormack said. "And is it having real effects on Iran and their ability to develop nuclear weapons? I would argue yes to right now, and I think probably even more down the road if they continue down the current line of behavior."

Details On Iran's Activity Pledged (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD — The top U.S. envoy to Iraq said Wednesday that he would soon reveal details he asserted would show Iranian interference in the country, in the latest round of diplomatic jousting between Washington and Tehran.

DOJ_NMG_0121467

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told a group of Western journalists that American officials would provide details "in the coming days" about Iranian officials detained and interrogated in Baghdad and the Kurdish city of Irbil within the last month.

The U.S. military detained five Iranian diplomats in Irbil on Jan. 11, and had detained several others in late December in Baghdad, touching off diplomatic rows and creating tensions with the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

The presentation, Khalilzad said, would include details about who the detained Iranians are and what they were doing in Iraq, as well as information about alleged contraband coming across the Iran-Iraq border.

"We are working to put something together and we will have something for you in the coming days," he said.

The upcoming presentation, he said, is a response to public comments by Iranian Ambassador Hassan Kazemi-Qomi, who this week publicly challenged Americans to show "any shred of evidence that Iran is working to destabilize Iraq," according to Iranian news agencies.

Khalilzad said the U.S. would take up the challenge.

"I know the Iranian ambassador said the Americans do not have anything and if they have something why don't they come up and share it," Khalilzad said. "We're going to oblige him."

Khalilzad said Iranian diplomatic missions and offices in Iraq were providing diplomatic cover for members of the Revolutionary Guard's Quds Force, an elite intelligence and paramilitary organization that answers to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

One of those arrested in a pair of December raids in Baghdad and later released has been identified as a Quds Force "director of operations," he said.

Iran's complicated government includes ordinary state functions such as the Foreign Ministry and the presidency in addition to powerful institutions that grew out of Iran's 1979 Islamic Revolution. The Revolutionary Guard, one of the latter organizations, operates as a parallel army and controls Iran's borders as well as its foreign policy toward neighboring countries such as Iraq and Afghanistan.

Khalilzad said it was time for Iran to change the people who conduct its relations with Iraq.

"Iran has not adapted to the changed situation in that it uses the security instrument as the channel, diplomatically," he said. "Many of the officials that represent Iran diplomatically are Quds Force operatives."

The U.S. has alleged that Iran has been funneling money and weapons to and providing training for armed groups in Iraq. Khalilzad said Wednesday that Iranian elements associated with the Quds Force had infiltrated Iraq's political parties.

He said the Bush administration had made a decision to aggressively confront Iranian networks operating in Iraq, as laid out by President Bush in a Jan. 10 speech on the Iraq troop buildup.

"Operations are aimed at making it harder for them, to make [it] difficult for them to do things they used to do more easily, in the expectation that would change their behavior," Khalilzad said.

"Those [Iraqis] who associate with them also risk being caught, targeted in these operations," he added.

Iran Receives Russian Defense Missiles (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, January 25, 2007

Iranian officials said Wednesday that they have taken delivery of advanced Russian air defense missile systems — weapons intended, according to one Russian news agency, to defend Tehran's major nuclear facilities.

Announcement of the delivery of the Tor-M1 mobile missile launchers came as Iran launched three days of military maneuvers, its first since the U.N. Security Council approved sanctions against Iran on Dec. 23.

"We have had constructive defense transactions with Russia and we purchased Tor-M1 missiles that were recently delivered to us," the official Web site of Iranian state television quoted Minister of Defense Mostafa Mohammad Najjar as saying.

Najjar did not say how many missiles were delivered or when they arrived. Previously Moscow said it would supply 29 of the mobile surface-to-air missile systems to Iran under a $700 million contract signed in December 2005, Russian media has reported.

"It certainly isn't an appropriate signal to be sending a government which is under U.N. sanctions for trying to develop a nuclear weapon," Grenell said.

According to Russia's ITAR-Tass news agency, the weapons were expected to be used to protect major government and military installations such the nuclear facilities at Isfahan, Bushehr, Tehran and in eastern Iran.

ITAR-Tass on Tuesday quoted Sergei Chemezov, the head of the country's state-run weapons exporter as saying that the Tor-M1 missiles had been delivered before the end of December 2006.

It is not clear whether the sale was completed before the Security Council vote. Russian officials have repeatedly said the sale would not violate any international obligations.

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin, current president of the Security Council, did not explicitly confirm the handover. But he said "whatever deliveries may have been carried out," they had "nothing to do" with the U.N. sanctions on Iran over its uranium enrichment.

The United States last year called for a halt to international arms exports to Iran, and for an end to nuclear cooperation with Iran to pressure it to stop uranium enrichment. Israel has also criticized arms deals with Iran.

Iran denies U.S. accusations that it is using its nuclear power program as a cover to develop nuclear weapons. On Monday, Tehran conducted missile tests and said it had barred 38 U.N. nuclear inspectors from entering the country.

Olmert Calls For Action Against Iran (AP)

By Steven Gutkin

AP, January 25, 2007

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert devoted one of his most important policy speeches of the year Wednesday to a single topic — Iran — saying Israel will respond to a nuclear threat "with all the means at our disposal."

Addressing an annual security conference in this seaside city, he said the international community has no choice but to act forcefully against Iran and its president, Mahmoud Ahmedinajad, who has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction.

"When the leader of a country announces, officially and publicly, his country's intention to wipe off the map another country, and creates those tools which will allow them to realize their stated threat, no nation has the right to even to weigh its position," Olmert said.

"It is the obligation of every country to act against this with all its might."

Iran has insisted that its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, but Israel believes its goal is to build nuclear weapons that could threaten the Jewish state's existence.

Olmert has made similar declarations before. But Israel has been vague about whether it would be willing to carry out military strikes against Iran, though it has not ruled them out.

"The Jewish people, with the scars of the Holocaust fresh on its body, cannot afford to allow itself to face threats of annihilation once again," Olmert said.

"Anyone who threatens us, who threatens our existence, must know that we have the determination and capability of defending ourselves, responding with force, discretion and with all the means at our disposal," he added.

Olmert said Israel supports using diplomacy to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions and said there is still time for international pressure to work.

"As serious as the Iranian threat is, the threat of nuclear attack on Israel is by no means imminent," he said.

"The Iranian issue preoccupies me and my thoughts constantly," Olmert said.

Olmert's decision to devote the high-profile speech to Iran reflected his country's growing concern over the issue. The four-day security conference at Herziliya was overwhelmingly about Iran.

Before launching into the Iranian issue, however, Olmert offered a few sentences about Israel's embattled president, Moshe Katsav.

Olmert called on Katsav to resign after the attorney general announced his intention to press criminal charges, including rape, against him.

"Under these circumstances, there is no doubt in my mind that the president cannot continue to fulfill his position and he must leave the president's residence," Olmert said.

Olmert's call for Katsav to step down came minutes after the president finished an emotional address to journalists, insisting that he would not resign unless he is actually indicted.

Olmert himself is under a legal cloud. Police are investigating his role in the 2005 sale of one of Israel's largest banks by the government after allegations that he tried to skew the tender in favor of supporters.

His speech at the Herzliya conference was coolly received, with no breaks for applause, reflecting his loss of popularity because of the inconclusive results of last summer's war in Lebanon.

Outside the hall, a handful of demonstrators called on Olmert to resign because of that war.

U.S. Picks An Inauspicious Time To Restart Mideast Talks (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

HERZLIYA, Israel, Jan. 24 — It would be hard to imagine a less promising moment for the United States to restart serious Palestinian-Israeli peace negotiations.

Six years after the last such talks, the Palestinian government is controlled by Hamas, which preaches Israel's destruction. Approval ratings for the Israeli prime minister are barely in double digits. Gaza and neighboring Lebanon are in turmoil. President Bush is weak.

Yet the administration is holding a meeting on Feb. 2 of the so-called quartet, whose other members are the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, to be followed by "informal talks" between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, with help from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, about the shape of a final peace treaty and the nature of a Palestinian state beside Israel.

The Americans are responding to pleas for re-engagement from the European Union, the Palestinian president and moderate Arab nations.

But expectations are purposely low. Ms. Rice and her Israeli counterpart, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, have borrowed a phrase from frustrated Palestinians and speak only of providing "a political horizon" to the two parties. They have been vague about the content and the path.

The European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, has no doubt what he wants to see.

"It's time to enter final status talks, it's time to enter a discussion of the end of the conflict," he said in an interview. "The crisis-management approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is over. We need to enter the conflict-resolution stage and try to end the occupation of 1967."

But the European Union does not run the quartet; the Americans do.

The main aim, senior American officials suggest, is to increase Palestinian confidence in a two-state solution and thereby elevate those Palestinians who advocate such a solution — Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, and his Fatah movement — and hope to undermine the appeal of Hamas, which rejects a permanent peace with Israel.

Ms. Rice also hopes that new American involvement and leadership will help its Arab allies like Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, let alone the fragile government in Lebanon, which fear the growing influence of Iran and Syria, supporters of Hamas and its Shiite Lebanese counterpart, Hezbollah.

While it is unlikely that either Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, or Mr. Abbas has the political strength to deliver big concessions, "sometimes it's best to try to buy in at the bottom," a senior American official said.

Israelis are nervous about the coming talks, and see them as part of the growing internal rivalry between Mr. Olmert and Ms. Livni, who has said publicly that she is prepared to become prime minister and has become close to Ms. Rice.

Uzi Arad, who had been an aide when Benjamin Netanyahu was prime minister and is now the director of the annual Herzliya Conference here devoted to security issues, said the American initiative was essentially for show, to try to pacify domestic critics on Iraq and nervous Arab allies.

"We all want to do something, but let's see what's doable, to help tranquilize the situation as much as possible and look like progress, without harming our security," Mr. Arad said.

Richard N. Haass, a Middle East specialist who runs the Council on Foreign Relations in New York, said here that "there's a difference between negotiating final status and raising final status." He said the case was strong for doing the latter, which he described as "prenegotiations," starting a process that could only conclude when stronger governments could take serious risks.

"It's important to shape the Palestinian debate and signal to them that there are strong reasons to forgo violence," Mr. Haass said. "If there's a place to go, it puts Hamas on the defensive. It can either strengthen the moderates or help the process of transforming the radicals."

With the Israelis battered by the war in Lebanon, rockets coming from Gaza and a Palestinian power struggle, few Israelis would support large new withdrawals from the West Bank when Mr. Abbas cannot control Palestinian militants and the Palestinian Authority is run by Hamas.

Mr. Olmert is also unwilling now to modify the so-called road map peace plan of 2003, which calls in its first stage for Palestinians to begin to disarm militants and dismantle terrorist organizations while the Israelis freeze settlement building. Final-status negotiations are left to the third stage. But no one in 2003 expected Hamas to be running the Palestinian Authority, and Mr. Abbas has been regularly calling for final-status talks to begin now as a way to provide "a political horizon" and do an end run around Hamas.

These new talks are a compromise — a serious discussion that can clarify a final settlement, including final borders and what will happen to Jerusalem and refugees — without committing either party. If there is a new, all-party commitment to an independent Palestinian state based essentially on 1967 boundaries, it may reinforce the idea of a permanent Israel next to a Palestine, which Hamas, Iran and Islamic Jihad currently reject.

Some Palestinians, too, are skeptical. Moderates welcomed the Rice initiative "because what's important to them is change, even if it is only a facade, that promises a 'positive possibility' for the future," wrote Ali Jarbawi a professor of political science at Birzeit University, on a Web site devoted to an Israeli-Palestinian dialogue, bitterlemons.org.

If the result is "an end to the Israeli occupation and the creation of a Palestinian state on 1967 borders (with minor and agreed-upon adjustments) and solving the issue of refugees according to international resolutions," Mr. Jarbawi wrote, then fine. "But this is not in the framework of thinking of this administration," he said, calling it "hostage to the Israeli perspective," which prefers "a long-term transitional stage."

Salam Fayyad, a former finance minister for the Palestinian Authority, said, "We need an agreed definition of where we're going and how to get there." The current situation is deteriorating, he said, and too much time is wasted on negotiating peripheral issues like roadblocks. "A political horizon is a framework in which internal issues can also be addressed," he said.

David Makovsky, a Middle East expert with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said for the United States the Israeli-Palestinian issue was not central. "The issue is a derivative of getting Arab support for Iraq and Iran policy," he said. "They want a broad front, and this is part of helping those Arab leaders they see as important on these other issues."

Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf said that he had agreed with five Arab leaders to develop a Muslim peace initiative for the Palestinian conflict, which he said lay at the root of worsening violence around the region.

"Destructive violence is going on in Iraq, Lebanon is mired in crisis, and the most dangerous aspects of these two are the visible sectarian undertones which cause a special concern to us in Pakistan," Musharraf told reporters in the United Arab Emirates at the end of a five-nation Middle East tour.

"The core lies in the Palestinian dispute and the core lies in the disharmony within the Muslim world, which is leading to terrorism and extremism," he said.

"This is a time to act and adopt a reconciliatory approach... toward starting a fresh initiative to facilitate peace, a resolution of the Palestinian dispute and bringing harmony to the Muslim world."

Musharraf said there had been a "total consonance of views" on the need for such an initiative among the leaders of the countries he visited -- Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Syria, as well as the UAE.

"We have agreed to undertake this mission in a responsible, pragmatic, but forceful manner," he said, adding that the initiative would have to be a compromise capable of winning broad support.

"The European Union is a very important player, it must be on board. And definitely ... the major players of the world must have faith in this new initiative.

"It has to be a middle course initiative acceptable to both extremes."

The Pakistani president gave no details of how he intended to advance the initiative or how it would mesh with the internationally drafted peace roadmap, which has made next to no progress since its launch nearly four years ago.

US To More Than Triple Aid To Lebanon (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 25, 2007

The United States will offer nearly $770 million to help the fragile democratic government in Lebanon, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday, a tripling of U.S. aid announced a day after deadly protests in Beirut underscored the country's deep political and sectarian divisions.

The donation, which must be approved by Congress, would include $220 million in military aid for the beleaguered Western-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. The money could buy small arms, ammunition, spare parts and Humvees, U.S. officials said.

Lebanon remained tense Wednesday, a day after Hezbollah-led protesters clashed with government supporters across the country, killing three. What had been planned as a peaceful work-stoppage around the country turned into the worst violence since Shiite Hezbollah militants and their allies launched a campaign two months ago to oust the government.

"What you saw yesterday was irresponsible in the violence that erupted," Rice told reporters traveling with her to a 35-nation conference meant to help Lebanon recover from the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah and make a dent in its huge national debt.

The street protests and violence underscore the world's duty to help the democratic government survive in Lebanon, Rice said.

Saniora will also attend the donors' session in Paris, proof that he will not be intimidated by political opponents at home, Rice said.

Although the Saniora government is warmer to the United States than any Beirut government in two decades, he has paid a cost in criticism that he is a puppet of Washington.

Rice will meet privately with Saniora on Thursday, patching up a relationship strained by Saniora's frustration that it took 34 days to get a United Nations cease-fire in the Israeli-Hezbollah war.

The United States was widely viewed as sanctioning Israel's desire to do as much damage to Hezbollah as possible before the campaign stopped last August. The war wasted towns in southern Lebanon, destroying bridges and roads and other structures that neither Hezbollah nor the Beirut government have been able to replace quickly.

Hezbollah, backed by Iran and allied with Syria, is a military and political organization that controlled much of southern Lebanon before the war. The United States considers the group a terrorist organization. Its popularity among many of Lebanon's majority Shiites rose after the war, but the extent of its political clout is uncertain.

Rice did not directly answer a question about whether Tuesday's demonstrations reveal that Hezbollah is strong enough to bring down Saniora. His collapse could re-ignite civil war in a nation of 4 million that has traditionally been a Middle East battleground.

"I assume they would not want to plunge Lebanon into open conflict and to kill lots of innocent Lebanese to pursue their political goals," she said.

The United States and other Western nations that support Saniora see crucial stakes in Lebanon, hoping the country can emerge from years of war as an oasis of stability in the Middle East without interference from countries like Syria or Iran.

The Paris session is expected to bring in pledges of about $5 billion. The government estimates its needs at about $3.5 billion to repair buildings and infrastructure damaged in the summer war. Lebanon owes a staggering $40 billion, some of it dating to the 1970s and the country's long and bitter civil war.

The U.S. money would more than triple last year's pledge of $230 million, and represents a major increase over past years' annual offerings of $30 million to $40 million.

The largest chunk of that money would be a $250 million cash reserve to be meted out as the Lebanese government meets targets for financial and structural overhauls.

About $184 million would go to the U.N. peacekeeping force that is supposed to keep postwar order in southern Lebanon, and $60 million would support internal Lebanese security services.

It is not clear whether any of the money would directly fund efforts to disarm Hezbollah, something the United States insisted must be part of a settlement to end the war but which has never happened.

Donors Gather To Help Lebanon's Government (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 24 — After 50 days of Syrian- and Iranian-backed protests that culminated in Tuesday's daylong standoff in Beirut, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and officials from more than 30 other countries are gathering here to see if they can inject enough money into the Lebanese government to prop up the pro-Western prime minister, Fouad Siniora.

Ms. Rice, demonstrating the level of concern about the deteriorating situation, said Wednesday that the United States would provide close to $1 billion in aid.

In many ways, the donor conference here on Thursday will serve as a snapshot of the larger proxy war between the United States — joined by its Sunni Arab allies and Europe — and Iran and Syria. Lebanon, like Iraq, is a battleground in that war, and Mr. Siniora, a Sunni Muslim, is fighting for his political survival.

The Paris conference is considered central to the survival of his government. Lebanon is badly hobbled after the monthlong war between Israel and Hezbollah last summer, with Hezbollah trying to use the war to strengthen its political role, and reconstruction efforts have been burdened by the country's $41 billion in public debt.

On Tuesday, opposition groups bent on toppling Mr. Siniora's cabinet essentially shut down the country with protests in Beirut.

The protests, initiated by Hezbollah to press its claims, were the latest trial for Mr. Siniora, whose government has survived thus far, Lebanon analysts say, not just because about half of the country supports him, but also because he has strong international support, including from Europe, America and the Sunni Arab countries.

DOJ_NMG_0121472

"Very clearly, Syria and Iran don't want to see this work," said David Schenker, a senior fellow in Arab politics at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, referring to the donor conference. "If the Siniora administration walks away from Paris with sufficient funds, it will return to Lebanon vindicated and strengthened, proving that it can effectively govern and pursue key initiatives without Hezbollah."

Some Middle East experts say that Lebanon needs at least $5 billion in aid to cover reconstruction and debt payments. But even if Mr. Siniora were able to raise that much, he would face political problems back at home.

His government has been under siege for two months now, as he has fought to establish a tribunal that may implicate Syria in the killing of a former Lebanese prime minister, Rafik Hariri, an outspoken critic of Syria.

Syria occupied Lebanon for 30 years until being forced to withdraw its troops after the assassination. The United States has accused Syria and Iran of trying to bring down the Siniora government to wreck plans for an international tribunal to try suspects in Mr. Hariri's killing.

The Paris conference is supposed to focus on ways to stimulate the Lebanese economy, improve living conditions for the people and lower the country's debt over five years.

Just how much money it will take to prop up Mr. Siniora is in question. On Wednesday, the European Commission was the first to announce that it would pledge 400 million euros, or $519 million, at the conference, bringing to 500 million euros, or $649 million, its overall reconstruction money for Lebanon over the next five years. President Jacques Chirac of France, who met with Mr. Siniora in Paris on Wednesday, followed with a pledge of a 500-million-euro loan to Lebanon, which a spokesman for Mr. Chirac said would be extended on "highly preferential terms."

Ms. Rice told reporters aboard her flight that the United States, whose contribution will be watched closely, would provide an additional $770 million in grants, including $220 million for the Lebanese armed forces and additional money for the police and peacekeeping. The grants also will include $250 million in cash transfers directly to the government, which will be tied to certain benchmarks that the Siniora government would be required to meet through economic reform programs. A donor conference for Lebanon that was held in Stockholm last year after the Israel-Hezbollah war brought in $940 million in aid, including about $230 million from the United States.

"You will find that the United States will be very supportive of Lebanon at this conference," C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near East affairs, told reporters in Paris. "Of course, you all know the importance of our political voice; now we are going to put some money behind that."

How much Saudi Arabia and other Sunni Arab countries come up with will also be of interest, analysts say. Saudi Arabia and Qatar, in particular, have been giving money in hopes of influencing Lebanon, as a counterweight to Iran and Syria, which have long given huge amounts to Hezbollah and other Lebanese groups, particularly in the south, where support for Hezbollah is the strongest.

On Tuesday, Mr. Chirac tried to play down the impression that donors at the conference were trying to impose their will on the Lebanese people by propping up Mr. Siniora. "I have no preferences among the Lebanese people," Mr. Chirac said. "I respect all the Lebanese people, but I advise them to obey the general rules of democracy, that is, to wait for normal elections to take place, in order, if that's the case, to change the government."

Lebanon's Pro-Western Premier Seeks Aid (AP)

By Jamey Keaten

AP, January 25, 2007

Lebanon's embattled pro-Western prime minister pleaded for international aid Wednesday to stave off financial ruin in his war-scarred country and counter interference from Iran, Syria and their Lebanese allies. The United States said it would offer $770 millon.

Fuad Saniora said he expected a donors conference Thursday in Paris to provide "very significant" financial support from Arab states and Western countries to help Lebanon become a haven of stability in the Middle East.

The meeting comes as Saniora's U.S.-backed government is locked in confrontation with Iranian-backed Hezbollah and other Lebanese foes while struggling under mountains of debt and facing the task of rebuilding following the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah.

It is the third Paris donor conference on Lebanon since 1998.

Experts predict the funds offered — in the form of debt relief, low-cost loans and aid — will likely total $4 billion to $7 billion. That compares to Lebanon's $40 billion of state debt, equivalent to about 185 percent of its annual economic output.

Although they insist the aid will be for all of Lebanon — not just for one man or his government — the U.S. and other donor nations back Saniora and say Lebanon must be defended from meddling by Iran and neighboring Syria, which occupied Lebanon for nearly 30 years until 2005.

"Not helping Lebanon will be much more expensive than helping it," Saniora told reporters after meeting with French President Jacques Chirac to prepare for the meeting, which is expected to draw about 30 foreign ministers and representatives of the World Bank, International Monetary Fund and European Union.

Already Wednesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the U.S. will offer the Lebanese government nearly $770 million, a tripling of U.S. aid announced a day after deadly protests in Beirut underscored the country's deep political and sectarian divisions.

The donation, which must be approved by Congress, would include $220 million in military aid for Saniora's government. The money could buy small arms, ammunition, spare parts and Humvees, U.S. officials said.

Host France announced plans for a $650 million loan at "very advantageous" terms, while the EU pledged $522 million in aid and loans.

Rice was expected to meet early Thursday with Saniora, who is under mounting pressure at home. Pro- and anti-government factions clashed for a second day on the northern Lebanese city of Tripoli on Wednesday — a day after three people died and 173 others were injured in violence nationwide.

"The government of Lebanon may be stressed by what's going on, but I believe they are strong and will weather this crisis," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State David Welch, the State Department's top Middle East diplomat, told reporters in Paris.

Hezbollah gained new support at home from its 34-day war with Israel and is thought to have doled out millions of dollars in aid to people in areas devastated by fighting. Western nations hope to counter that influence by pouring in even more money.

No Hezbollah representatives were invited to the Paris conference because its six ministers quit Saniora's Cabinet last year. France and other donors said they are dealing only with the elected Lebanese government, and it is up to Saniora to work with his domestic opponents.

But the worsening political turmoil has raised concerns that Saniora's government may be too paralyzed to fully rebuild even with newly injected funds. Many parts of southern Lebanon — a Hezbollah stronghold — remain a wasteland five months after the war despite pledges from the government, Hezbollah and the world to help.

The new aid will come with conditions — mainly assurances that Saniora's government make good on economic and structural reforms announced this month, which have infuriated labor unions and Hezbollah supporters.

U.S. Opposes Iranian, Saudi Meddling In Crisis (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

The United States yesterday criticized Iranian overtures to Saudi Arabia suggesting the two countries cooperate to resolve a political crisis between the Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora and the Shi'ite group Hezbollah.

Tehran's proposal, made during a visit to Riyadh last week by Ali Larijani, head of the Supreme National Security Council, is aimed at giving the Iranian-backed Hezbollah a bigger role in the Lebanese Cabinet, diplomats said.

"We certainly wouldn't support any effort to try to negotiate something over and above the heads of the Siniora government," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

"As for any political arrangements or accommodations that Prime Minister Siniora might come to with the various factions in Lebanon, those are going to be decisions for him to make," Mr. McCormack said. "But we won't work with individual ministers from Hezbollah and we won't meet with them."

Clashes between Hezbollah-led protesters and government supporters this week claimed at least three lives and caused dozens of injuries and property damage in Beirut.

"What you saw [Tuesday] was irresponsible in the violence that erupted," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said as she flew yesterday to Paris, where international donors are expected to pledge billions of dollars to help Mr. Siniora rebuild an economy devastated by last summer's war with Israel.

Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia, whose relations with Shi'ite-dominated Iran are usually tense, was said to be suspicious of Tehran's overture, but diplomats said Riyadh is looking for ways to help Mr. Siniora, whom Washington also supports.

Details of Mr. Larijani's meeting with Prince Bandar bin Sultan, a senior Saudi Foreign Ministry official who was a longtime ambassador to Washington, were not available. However, [a]news agency quoted Lebanese "political sources" as saying that any deal also would address plans for a U.N. tribunal to try suspects in the 2005 slaying of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

Mr. Siniora arrived in Paris yesterday for the donors conference, along with about 30 foreign ministers and representatives of the World Bank, International Monetary Fund and European Union.

"Not helping Lebanon will be much more expensive than helping it," he said after meeting with French President Jacques Chirac.

Mr. Chirac said France would extend a $650 million loan at "very advantageous" terms, and the European Union pledged $522 million in aid and loans.

Miss Rice said the United States would offer $770 million, including $220 million in military aid. Last year, Washington pledged $230 million.

The pledges at the Paris conference are expected to total about $5 billion. The government estimates its needs at about $3.5 billion to repair buildings and infrastructure. In addition, Lebanon's debt is about $40 billion, some of it dating to the 1970s and the country's long and bitter civil war.

Mr. McCormack said Miss Rice was accompanied by chief executives of U.S. companies with plans to invest in Lebanon, although he did not name them.

"Long after direct U.S. government assistance has gone through the pipeline and been delivered, investment by foreign companies and U.S. companies is going to continue to create jobs and opportunity in Lebanon," he said.

US Unveils 770 Million Dollar Aid Plan For Lebanon (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 25, 2007

The United States will pledge 770 million dollars in new aid to Lebanon as part of a major international drive to rebuild the country and bolster the embattled pro-Western government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

Rice said the package, to be formally unveiled here Thursday at an international donors conference, would bring total US assistance to Lebanon to more than a billion dollars since a devastating 34-day war last July and August between Israel and the radical Islamic group Hezbollah.

"The president will request of the Congress 770 million dollars in support for Lebanon," she told reporters accompanying her from Washington to Paris.

She said about two-thirds of the new aid would go to strengthen Lebanon's security forces with training and equipment, and to fund reconstruction projects.

The remaining 250 million dollars will be direct assistance to Siniora's administration, which has just unveiled a controversial five-year economic reform plan to cope with rebuilding efforts and a massive 41 billion dollar public debt.

Before the war, annual US aid to Lebanon averaged between 30 and 40 million dollars per year, officials said.

Lebanese officials have said they need several billion dollars to rebuild villages and infrastructure damaged in the Israeli offensive sparked by Hezbollah's kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid in July.

Rice linked the latest US aid, and other pledges expected during Thursday's 30-nation donors meeting, to efforts to strengthen Siniora's government in a power struggle with Hezbollah and other Syrian-backed parties in Lebanon.

Hezbollah-led protests against Siniora and his reform plan erupted into violence Tuesday that left three people dead and fueled fears Lebanon could slide back into the civil strife that wracked the country in decades past.

"Yesterday's events if anything make more important a message from the international community that it supports the democratically elected government of Lebanon," said Rice, who is scheduled to meet with Siniora early Thursday.

She called the protests and violence "irresponsible" and "an effort to provoke, an effort to intimidate" Siniora.

Hezbollah has denounced Siniora as a puppet of the West and is seeking to topple his government or force a power-sharing deal that would leave the Iranian- and Syrian-backed movement and its allies with veto power in cabinet.

US President George W. Bush accused Syria in his State of the Union speech Tuesday of using Hezbollah to reassert its control over Lebanon, which Damascus occupied for decades until popular protests forced it to withdraw its forces in 2005.

Rice said she hoped the pro-Syrian camp "would not want to push Lebanon into open conflict and to kill lots of innocent Lebanese to pursue their political goals."

The United States has already pledged 231 million dollars in government aid to Lebanon since the summer war, including 39 million dollars to provide vehicles, communications equipment, night vision goggles and training to Lebanon's army.

Under the terms of a UN-brokered ceasefire that ended the fighting, the army deployed for the first time in more than 20 years in south Lebanon along Israel's border and also began patrolling the frontier with Syria.

A senior official accompanying Rice said the direct aid will be tied to "benchmarks" in the implementation of Siniora's five-year reform plan, which calls for raising some taxes and privatising the country's electricity and mobile phone sectors.

Another 280 million will provide training, equipment and small arms to the army and police, while 184 million will help fund international peacekeepers deployed in south Lebanon under the UN ceasefire, the official said.

A group of US corporate leaders, including the chief executive of Intel, will also on Thursday announce major workforce training and telecommunications infrastructure investment projects for Lebanon, another official said.

Rice said she was confident Siniora had the "mettle" to follow through on the reforms, unlike a plan announced by Beirut at the last Paris donors conference in 2002 which never took effect.

My Country Needs Help (WSJ)

By Saad Hariri

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Today, the French capital plays host to an international donor conference whose aim is Lebanon's long-term economic stability. The conference, dubbed "Paris III," will be attended by representatives from approximately 40 countries as well as from international financial institutions. This is a critical moment for the international community to support the Lebanese people's choice for democracy, peace and stability.

The friends of my country who will gather in Paris know how much is at stake. Lebanon is truly at a crossroads; the choices and actions Lebanese government officials and their supporters in the international community make are critical for what my country will look like in the future. This conference will be decisive for the future of Lebanon as a democratic and moderate Arab country with a liberal economy, and as a beacon of coexistence and tolerance for the entire region.

There are two competing visions for Lebanon today: One is a vision of freedom, peace, prosperity, democracy and independence from outside interference; the other is a vision of conflict, economic paralysis, oppression and hegemony by Lebanon's neighbors. The late Pope John Paul II praised Lebanon for the example it set for the world through the peaceful coexistence, brotherhood and cooperation among its various religions and sects. This view was shared by my father, the late Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri, who was assassinated in Beirut on Feb. 14, 2005 -- a despicable act which only served to unite the Lebanese people, who knew that my father dedicated his life to our country's independence and sovereignty.

The Lebanese people chose the vision of peace, independence and unity when they rallied after the assassination of my father. But while the people of Lebanon are free today, we are not free of foreign intervention. Unfortunately, after the devastating Israeli war last summer, the Lebanese people today face another critical challenge fueled by outside interference in our internal affairs. Outside powers are supporting a move by a coalition of Lebanese parties to topple the elected government through street demonstrations and other activities, ostensibly calling for more power-sharing.

But the real goal is to prevent the establishment of the U.N.-endorsed international tribunal which would try those individuals responsible for the assassination of Prime Minister Hariri, and which would finally put an end to a culture of impunity in Lebanon, which has witnessed so many horrific political assassinations that have gone unpunished.

The other goal of the opposition is to prevent the full implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 1701, which demands that the Lebanese government be in full control of the entire country, including southern Lebanon.

At Paris III today the Lebanese government will present its reform program and hopes that an international consensus around Lebanon will help put its economy back on the path to recovery so we can rebuild. In the weeks prior to Paris the government, supported by the majority in parliament, put forth a strategy to continue the country's economic growth and job creation programs as a way forward, despite the political standoff we currently face. We intend to work with our friends in the international community at Paris III to offer the Lebanese people an alternative to the chaos that others seek to sow in Lebanon.

Yet it will not be the first time the international community has come together to help rebuild Lebanon. Three conferences were held previously. The first was the Friends of Lebanon summit in Washington in 1996, hosted by the U.S. State Department. It brought Lebanon much-needed economic aid and political support. The next two conferences, Paris I and Paris II, were hosted by France's President Jacques Chirac in 1998 and 2002. They brought economic aid in the form of grants and projects to help stabilize the Lebanese economy, and thus inject it with enough confidence to generate respectable economic growth and the return of significant international investment.

Paris III is a continuation of the last three conferences and of Prime Minister Hariri's legacy. More importantly, it is a testament to the tremendous work of the democratic Lebanese government and the resilience of the Lebanese people. This resiliency will prevail, and I predict Lebanon once again will be able to extract itself from its difficulties and meet its challenges. Lebanon's greatness lies in its people and its rich history and its values. These are the treasures we are trying to preserve.

There is much at stake at Paris III for all of us. We hope the international community fully understands the historic importance of the path which the Lebanese people have chosen: a path towards true sovereignty, democracy, pluralism and prosperity; and we hope our friends will stand with us.

Mr. Hariri is the majority leader of Lebanon's national parliament.

Hezbollah Won't Topple The Lebanese Government, Its Leader Says (NYT)

By Nada Bakri

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon Jan. 24 — Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader, said Wednesday that Lebanon's opposition movement had decided to stop short of toppling the government of Fouad Siniora, fearing civil strife. He warned, though, that Hezbollah and its allies would continue to ratchet up the pressure on Mr. Siniora in coming weeks and vowed not to back down on their demands.

"The opposition has the political, popular and organizational strength to bring down the unconstitutional government today or tomorrow," Sheik Nasrallah told worshipers commemorating the Shiite holiday of Ashura in Beirut's southern suburbs. "What has so far prevented the fall of the government that is clinging to power is not international support but the patriotic feelings of the opposition and its desire to preserve civil peace."

The speech followed a crippling and violent strike on Tuesday that brought life to a virtual standstill in Lebanon.

Sheik Nasrallah blamed what he called the "government of militias" for Tuesday's violence, insisting that the opposition had respected the rule of law in its protest.

"The war in July showed how many weapons we have," he said. "But we did not resort to those weapons yesterday. Those who insist they have none, however, did use weapons."

He was referring to accusations made on Tuesday by Hezbollah members that their supporters had been protesting peacefully when residents of the area started throwing stones at them.

The police said Tuesday that at least three people died in the violence and that 100 more were wounded throughout the country. It was the worst since Hezbollah began demanding more political power and began a series of protests late last year. For the past two months Lebanon has been gripped by a political crisis pitting the Syrian- and Iranian-backed Hezbollah and its allies against the American- and Saudi-backed government of Mr. Siniora.

Hezbollah has demanded that Mr. Siniora step down or form a government of "national unity" that would give the opposition veto power and hold early parliamentary elections. Mr. Siniora has refused to resign, insisting that the opposition come off the streets and negotiate.

Sheik Nasrallah, at the end of November, called for a huge demonstration in the center of Beirut in an effort to paralyze the government. Hundreds of thousands of people came out on Dec. 1 and began a sit-in. The protesters camped out in tents, and Sheik Nasrallah called for them to remain until the government fell.

The violence began Tuesday when groups of protesters set up roadblocks along major streets leading into Beirut, blocking them with burning tires, trucks and rubble. They set fire to vehicles and attacked cars trying to pass. Many of the clashes in Beirut took place in mixed neighborhoods, where young men on each side shouted epithets and hurled stones at one another.

Some of the most violent clashes took place on a highway north of Beirut, where supporters of Gen. Michel Aoun, leader of the Free Patriotic Movement, a Christian group and a Hezbollah ally, fought with men loyal to Samir Geagea, a government ally.

Lebanon slowly inched back to life on Wednesday as cleaners removed roadblocks and debris from streets across the country and as the Lebanese tried to take stock of the political and social implications of Tuesday's action.

Gunfire broke out again on Wednesday during the funeral of one of two people shot dead in the northern city of Tripoli a day earlier, wounding two mourners.

U.S. Launches New Airstrike In Somalia (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, January 25, 2007

The United States launched an airstrike in Somalia against suspected terrorist targets — the second such attack this month, defense officials said Wednesday.

The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the action was carried out in secret, provided few details about the strike by an Air Force AC-130 gunship earlier this week and were uncertain whether the intended target was killed.

One official suggested that early indications showed that no high-value target was killed or captured.

DOJ_NMG_0121477

At the Defense Department, spokesman Bryan Whitman declined to confirm any new strike but said in general that the United States is "going to go after al-Qaida in the global war on terrorism wherever it takes us."

He said the nature of some military operations, especially those by special operations commando forces, requires that they be kept secret in order to preserve an advantage in future missions.

Lt. Cmdr. Marc Boyd, a spokesman at U.S. Special Operations Command in Tampa, declined to comment.

The U.S. Navy also has had forces in waters off the Somali coast, where they have monitored maritime traffic, boarded suspicious ships and interrogated crews in an attempt to catch anyone escaping the Somalia military operations.

Navy officials said Wednesday that no aircraft from the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower, stationed off the Somali coast, were involved in the latest strike.

Earlier this month, Ethiopian and U.S. forces were pursuing three top al-Qaida suspects but failed to capture or kill them in an AC-130 strike in the southern part of Somalia. A main target that time was Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, one of the three senior al-Qaida members blamed for the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The latest operation came as Ethiopia began withdrawing troops that invaded Somalia last month to help Somalia's government drive out a radical Islamic militia that officials say has been harboring al-Qaida operatives.

In Mogadishu on Wednesday, gunmen launched several mortars at the capital's international airport, killing at least two people and wounding several others, witnesses said.

Abdilkabir Salad, who was at the gate of the airport when the mortars fell, said he saw two corpses. Another witness, Abdi Mohamed, said he saw three young men who were injured by shrapnel.

"Two mortars landed inside the airport and the other outside," said Mohamed.

The attack comes one day after Ethiopian troops, whose military strength was crucial to helping Somalia's government drive out a radical Islamic militia, began withdrawing. The pullout leaves the fledgling government to stand on its own for the first time in this notoriously violent capital.

The intervention of Ethiopia last month prompted a military advance that was a stunning turnaround for Somalia's two-year-old government. Without Ethiopia's tanks and fighter jets, the administration could barely assert control outside one town and could not enter the capital, which was ruled by the Council of Islamic Courts.

Moment Of Opportunity In Somalia (NYT)

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

Thanks to an unusual and probably fleeting set of events, Somalia has a chance to return to the community of law-abiding and legitimate states. For a country that dissolved years ago into chronic clan warfare and became a way station for international terrorists, that would be an enormous gain — and an enormous gain for the rest of the world.

To make the most of this opportunity, Washington needs to move quickly, along with Arab and African leaders, to try to broker a political compromise between responsible leaders of the Islamic Courts Union, which was evicted from power last month by the Ethiopians, and the internationally endorsed transitional government installed in its place.

International peacekeepers will also be needed to replace the Ethiopian force, which is already starting to head home. Ethiopia, Somalia's longtime regional rival, needs to complete that withdrawal quickly to avoid a violent nationalist backlash.

If the transitional government is to survive, it will have to strike a deal with moderate Islamists. The person it needs to talk with is Sheik Sharif Ahmed, who is No. 2 in the movement and by most accounts a reasonable man. He is currently in Kenya after apparently getting an American guarantee that he would not be deported back to Somalia.

The United Nations, which helped create the transitional government, should take charge of organizing a peacekeeping force. The Arab League (Somalia is a member) and the African Union (with headquarters in Ethiopia) need to persuade all sides to come and stay at the table. Unfortunately, none of these organizations are known for operating quickly. The Bush administration needs to press them all to seize this moment. This sudden chance to make peace is not likely to last for long.

AFP, January 25, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sought to play down a report in a British newspaper that North Korea was helping Iran prepare an eventual nuclear test explosion.

"I don't see that it's based on anything that I've seen," Rice said of the report published in The Daily Telegraph.

"I don't see what it's based on," she told reporters accompanying her to a Lebanon donors conference in Paris.

DOJ_NMG_0121478

Citing an unnamed senior European defence official, the newspaper said that North Korea has agreed to share all the data it received from its nuclear test last year as both countries face Western pressures over the development of their own nuclear programmes.

"The Iranians are working closely with the North Koreans to study the results of last year's North Korean nuclear bomb test," the European defence official was quoted as saying by the newspaper.

"We have identified increased activity at all of Iran's nuclear facilities since the turn of the year ... All the indications are that the Iranians are working hard to prepare for their own underground nuclear test."

The official also said that North Korea had invited a team of Iranian scientists to study the results of last year's underground nuclear test.

Rice also said she had spoken with her South Korean counterpart Wednesday and the foreign ministers of China and Japan on Tuesday as part of efforts to hold a new round of six-party nuclear disarmament talks with North Korea.

"We're hoping for an early resumption. I think its' time to do that," she said.

"We've had productive preparatory discussions with all of the parties, including the North Koreans, but there's not going to be an agreement until we're in the six-party format," she said.

The six-nation talks involving China, Japan, Russia and the United States, as well as North and South Korea, started in 2003 but have been repeatedly suspended and have failed to yield concrete results.

The most recent round was held last month in Beijing after a 13-month break and a UN Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea for carrying out its first nuclear test explosion in October failed to make any headway.

US and North Korean negotiators met in Berlin last week and reported progress towards a resumption of the broader negotiations, but no date has been set.

Iran is also under UN sanctions since December for refusing to suspend a uranium enrichment program it says is designed to produce fuel for nuclear power production but that many fear is aimed at making nuclear weapons.

Greek Militants Claim Embassy Attack (AP)

By Derek Gatopoulos

AP, January 25, 2007

A Greek militant group has claimed responsibility for a rocket attack on the U.S. Embassy in Athens earlier this month, blaming American policy in Iraq and the Middle East for the strike.

The far-left group Revolutionary Struggle issued a statement to the weekly Pontiki newspaper, its publisher Dimitris Benekos said Wednesday. He said the statement would be published on Thursday and police said forensic experts were examining the document.

"It is a five-page statement which explains why it chose the embassy as a target, linking (the attack) with U.S. foreign policy in various parts of the world — Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, Palestine and so on," Benekos told The Associated Press.

"The statement was signed by Revolutionary Struggle," he said.

There were no injuries in the Jan. 12 attack, which caused minor damage. The strike using a rocket-propelled grenade alarmed authorities, who fear a possible resurgence of Greek militant attacks that were common in the 1980s and 1990s.

On the day of the attack, a Greek private security firm used by the embassy received a call from someone claiming to be from Revolutionary Struggle. But police could not verify that the caller actually represented the group.

Benekos said the statement also mentioned the names of two government ministers and senior judges in an apparent threat of future attacks.

Revolutionary Struggle, which first appeared three years ago, has claimed responsibility for a failed bomb attack on Greek Culture Minister George Voulgarakis. Nobody was injured in the May 2006 blast.

The group also bombed a U.S. bank, a police station and two government ministries, including a 2005 blast in Athens' main Syntagma Square.

Revolutionary Struggle has sent four statements in the past to Pontiki claiming responsibility for attacks.

"The method in which the statement was delivered and the appearance of the statement itself are similar to the previous cases," Benekos said.

British Defence Ministry Denies Rift With US After Diplomat's Comments (AFP)

DOJ_NMG_0121479

The British defence ministry denied there was any rift with the United States over the two countries' plans for troop levels in Iraq following comments made by the US ambassador to the war-torn country.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the American envoy to Baghdad, had earlier told the BBC that the United States "would like the British to co-ordinate and for us to have a joint plan."

Though the United States is planning a "surge" of about 21,500 troops in Iraq, Britain has said it wants to withdraw "thousands" of its soldiers from the country this year.

"There is no tension between US and UK objectives and activities in Iraq," a spokeswoman for the defence ministry said.

"We are a major member of the Coalition ... our plans are consistent with the Coalition's long-term strategy and the Iraqi government's desire for increased Iraqi security responsibility.

"This is the strategy of transition, which we are working towards, as are the Americans. We always said this was a process and not an event and will happen at a different pace across Iraq."

Khalilzad, who is set to be Washington's next ambassador to the United Nations, earlier said in an interview with the BBC: "It's clear what our preference would be -- the longer we stay together here, the better," adding that he was convinced that a "mutually acceptable" agreement would be reached.

Earlier this month, US President George W. Bush announced a major policy shift for Iraq after nearly four years of escalating violence, saying that he was adding 21,500 soldiers to the 132,000 US troops deployed in the country.

Britain, by contrast, has said it hopes to withdraw thousands of its 7,200 troops in Iraq, most of whom are deployed to the south of the country.

Chinese Leader To Visit Sudan For Talks On Darfur Conflict (NYT)

By Howard W. French

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

SHANGHAI, Jan. 24 — Chinese officials announced Wednesday that President Hu Jintao would visit Sudan in early February and would seek a diplomatic solution to the conflict in the country's western Darfur region, which the United States has described as genocide.

Mr. Hu's visit to Sudan will be part of an eight-country tour of Africa, the latest of a string of high-level visits to the continent by Chinese officials.

In recent months, China has faced widespread criticism for its economic engagement with Sudan at a time when government-allied militias known as the janjaweed have carried out frequent attacks on civilian populations in western Darfur. At least 200,000 people have died in the conflict since early 2003, and many thousands have been forced to flee their homes.

China has played a leading role in building a thriving oil industry in Sudan amid the violence in Darfur, and now imports more than 64 percent of Sudan's oil exports, accounting for nearly 5 percent of China's petroleum imports.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman said that China would use its diplomatic influence to encourage a settlement of the Darfur crisis, but that China would not publicly pressure Sudan or threaten it with sanctions.

"The Sudan issue should be resolved like any other — through peaceful negotiation," Assistant Foreign Minister Zhai Jun said at a news conference in Beijing. "Using pressure and imposing sanctions is not practical and will not help settle the issue."

Mr. Zhai acknowledged China's prominent role as a leading trading partner of Sudan's and said China would sign new economic agreements with the country during Mr. Hu's visit. "With Sudan, we have cooperation in many aspects, including military cooperation," he said. "In this, we have nothing to hide."

China's intense engagement with the continent has brought increasing scrutiny, and very often criticism, from Western governments and from international human rights groups and others who say China ignores questions of governance and of rights as it pursues business opportunities in Africa.

Despite the vow not to pressure the Sudanese government, Chinese diplomatic analysts said the announcement of a diplomatic initiative with Sudan was a turning point in China's foreign policy and in its relations with Africa in particular.

"This is a remarkable change," said Shi Yinhong, an expert in international relations at People's University in Beijing. "It would boost China's image in the West, and would be welcomed in Africa, too."

Mr. Shi said that during the recent China-Africa summit meeting in Beijing, Mr. Hu had pushed the Sudanese president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, in private to cooperate with the United Nations.

"China has begun to follow a different pattern on this issue," Mr. Shi said, adding, "When the world talks about China's rise, naturally that places demands and pressure on China to take on more responsibility."

An expert in African affairs, however, expressed more caution. "China now is showing slightly different tactics, paying more attention," said He Wenping, director of African studies at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, in Beijing. "Hu's visit at least gives a clear signal that China thinks the Sudan issue is important and China wants to play a role. But China's strategy remains the same, and as always, it uses quiet diplomacy to keep a constructive engagement, rather than waving a stick."

In the last two years, Africa has been the focus of a huge push by Chinese diplomats and companies to expand China's influence abroad. Africa's many countries offer China a rich source of support in United Nations votes and help in securing petroleum and other natural resources needed by China's booming economy.

Africa is also a stage of China's bitter diplomatic contest with Taiwan, with China offering large amounts of foreign aid and investment to countries in order to keep them from recognizing Taiwan, which this country regards as a breakaway province.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman, Mr. Zhai, acknowledged that there had been problems in certain countries, like Zambia, where there were riots last year at a Chinese-controlled copper mine after a labor dispute over working conditions. "We are also trying to educate Chinese businesses who have interests in Africa and investments there to respect social conventions and observe local laws and regulations," he said.

Analyst Rebuked Over His Support Of Spy For China (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

A senior U.S. intelligence analyst has been formally criticized for "poor judgment" after writing a letter and e-mails in support of a convicted former Defense Intelligence Agency analyst, U.S. intelligence officials said.

Lonnie Henley, the deputy national intelligence officer (NIO) for East Asia, was given a letter of reprimand several months ago after an investigation within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI).

Mr. Henley, who could not be reached for comment, was a close friend and protege of former DIA analyst Ronald Montaperto, who was convicted in June on espionage charges that included supplying secrets to Chinese military intelligence. Mr. Henley wrote a letter to the judge supporting Montaperto, and an e-mail that criticized the FBI investigation of the former analyst.

DNI spokesman Carl Kropf declined to comment on the reprimand, noting that it was an administrative matter.

"The issue has been appropriately addressed within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence," Mr. Kropf said.

Montaperto pleaded guilty in June to charges related to illegally storing classified documents. As part of a sting operation that led to his conviction, Montaperto admitted passing "top-secret" and "secret" information to two Chinese military intelligence officers. He was sentenced to three months in prison.

Montaperto's admissions of passing highly classified data to the Chinese coincided with the loss of a major U.S. electronic eavesdropping operation against China in the late 1980s, U.S. officials said.

Mr. Henley is in line for promotion to the top post of NIO for East Asia, but the appointment could be derailed by the reprimand, officials familiar with the internal inquiry said.

Mr. Henley is favored for the job by National Intelligence Council Chairman Thomas Fingar, who officials say shares the views of Mr. Henley and Montaperto on China.

The current NIO for East Asia, James J. Shinn, is set to take a job in the defense secretary's office.

The letter of reprimand was similar to the punishments received in two other cases of bad judgment within the National Intelligence Council, of which NIOs are a part.

Lawrence K. Gershwin, NIO for science and technology, and retired Army Maj. Gen. John R. Landry, NIO for military issues, were reprimanded for their role in the 2002 National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

The cases are expected to be raised during Senate intelligence committee hearings on the nomination of retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell to be the next director of national intelligence.

Mr. Henley first got into trouble after writing a private e-mail in June to a closed group of more than 100 China specialists known as "Chinasec" that included several high-ranking CIA and other U.S. intelligence officials and private China affairs specialists.

The two-page e-mail criticized the FBI for investigating Montaperto. Mr. Henley stated that he had spoken with Montaperto and that he regarded his passing of secrets to Chinese intelligence as inadvertent and minor security violations.

Mr. Henley also compared Montaperto in the e-mail to fired FBI Agent James J. Smith, a senior counterintelligence official who was convicted of lying to the FBI as part of the Chinese spying case of Los Angeles businesswoman Katrina Leung.

Montaperto's conviction was a blow to the influential group of China affairs specialists in the U.S. government and private sector who share similar benign views of China. The group has been called the Red Team by critics and are known to harshly criticize or discredit anyone who questions or criticizes China's communist government and its activities.

Blackmailing By Journalists In China Seen As 'Frequent' (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

SHENZHEN, China -- At 9 p.m. in a dark Shenzhen parking lot, Bai Xiuyu handed over a plain brown envelope containing 15,000 Chinese yuan, the equivalent of nearly $2,000, in what was supposed to be a discreet blackmail payment to a local reporter.

Hidden in Bai's car, Gou Hua, Shenzhen bureau chief for the Southern Metropolitan Daily, watched the scene unfold and recorded the transaction with his cellphone camera. His interest was more than journalistic; the reporter receiving the payoff was Zhou Yu, a 29-year-old newcomer to Gou's own bureau.

To his consternation, what Gou saw the evening of Sept. 21 was another instance of the blackmail journalism metastasizing through China's news media. Bai's money was supposed to buy silence on alleged wrongdoing at her health clinic in this southern Chinese city. But more generally, journalists and officials say, Chinese reporters are demanding such hush money with increasing regularity from businesses and government agencies in exchange for the withholding of unfavorable news.

"It's very, very frequent," said Ma Yunlong, an editor whose newspaper exposed an instance of extravagant extortion in central Henan province in 2005. Ma said the case involved 480 reporters and others pretending to be reporters who asked for "shut-up fees" to keep news of a mine flood out of the public eye.

In many ways, blackmail journalism grew naturally out of a system in which Communist Party censors control the news rigorously, barring reports that could be seen as unfavorable to the party or contrary to the government's political goals. If the ruling party distorts the news for political reasons, blackmailing reporters have concluded, why wouldn't they do it themselves for financial reasons?

In addition, local party officials, long used to manipulating information, have been complicit in the payoff system when it suits their needs. In the everybody-does-it atmosphere, even non-reporters have found ways to get in on the take by posing as journalists.

After the August 2005 mine disaster, for instance, reporters and their friends in Henan province dispatched a flurry of cellphone messages as soon as they heard the news -- not because they were eager to report on it, but because they knew local officials would be eager to hush it up.

By the time Fan Youfeng of the Henan Business News arrived at the mine, in a village in Jiliao county, local officials said they had already given money to so many reporters and phony reporters that the coffers were dry. But still more people showed up, Fan wrote, and the officials sought more cash, pressing the mine owners to chip in.

Journalists and poseurs lined up to get their handouts, he said, with some pushing and jumping the queue. Over several days, the extortionists carried away 200,000 yuan, or more than $25,000, he reported, quoting officials and a list signed by those who got the cash.

Encouraged by Ma, his editor, Fan wrote a story for the Henan Business News about what had happened. It was the first open discussion of what had become a widespread if secretive practice, Ma said with a note of pride.

As a result, however, an official from the central government propaganda department visited from Beijing and accused Ma of publishing an "inappropriate" and "false" story. The newspaper was suspended for a month, Ma was forced to retire and Fan was reprimanded, Ma said. The death toll from the mine disaster was never reported, he added.

"This kind of thing has an important impact on the success of local officials," Ma explained, "so they always want to cover it up."

More recently, some blackmail targets have started striking back. More than 40 people were arrested last month in Shanxi province on charges of impersonating reporters and trying to extort money from local officials and business owners, according to the official New China News Agency.

"People can't help but ask, 'Why are these fake reporters so savage?' " the news agency said in a Dec. 12 editorial.

Zhou Yu, a slight man with sharp gestures and a ring in his left earlobe, said the lure of money was not what motivated him to take Bai's payoff envelope that evening in Shenzhen. "I was trying to help," he said in an interview. "It was out of friendship."

Zhou said Bai, a physician, had telephoned him earlier in the day asking for advice because, she said, two reporters had warned her they were about to write a story accusing her Jianmin Clinic of providing services it was not certified to perform, including abortions. Bai turned to him, Zhou explained, because a year earlier he had written what he described as a critical but objective story about her clinic.

"If I can help a friend, I think I should help," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0121482

The two reporters who went to Bai's office were Hua Kejian of the Nanfang Daily and Liang Yongjian of Zhou's own Southern Metropolitan Daily, both owned by the prestigious Nanfang publishing house based in nearby Guangzhou, according to Zhou and others involved. A third reporter, Song Yi of the Yangcheng Evening News, joined the pair later in the day, they said.

"Their motive was very apparent," Zhou said.

After contacting the reporters, Zhou told Bai she would have to come up with 15,000 yuan to buy silence for her clinic, according to Zhou and the other sources. Zhou said he did not plan to pocket any of the money himself, only to pass it along to the other reporters.

"I thought this would be okay with my newspaper," he added, "because I was just a go-between."

The sum demanded was high, even for a boomtown such as Shenzhen. Most blackmail payouts to reporters are counted in the hundreds of yuan, according to Chinese reporters and editors. Acting on the advice of another acquaintance, therefore, Bai sent a cellphone message to Zhou complaining that the price was unreasonable. But Zhou responded that there was no way to reduce it, Bai's acquaintance said in an interview.

Zhou told Bai the cash should be divided into three packets of 5,000 yuan each and arranged for the handover to take place in the parking lot near his bureau on a leafy boulevard in central Shenzhen, according to several people involved.

At that point, Gou, the bureau chief, received a troubling telephone call. The acquaintance of Bai's, outraged at the amount demanded by Zhou, called to say Gou's reporters were involved in a blackmail scheme and that, as bureau chief, he should do something about it, according to Gou and the acquaintance, who described his role on condition of anonymity.

"As soon as I heard about it," Gou said in an interview, "I wanted to verify what was going on."

Gou, 32, arranged with Bai to be in her car that evening as a witness.

When Bai got out of her car and approached Zhou, the two exchanged pleasantries for several minutes, and Zhou patted her on the shoulder. But when Zhou looked inside the envelope, he complained because she had not divided the cash into three bundles as requested, according to Zhou and others.

Zhou, in the interview, said he showed up alone to collect the money because the three other reporters were busy and he wanted to do them a favor. Gou, the bureau chief, said that "a lot is unclear" about what was really going on. In any case, Gou got out of the car after taking the photographs and confronted Zhou, who promptly handed the envelope back to Bai.

Returning the money was not enough, Gou said, and ordered Zhou to follow him to the office. Once inside, Gou started writing a memo about what had occurred and demanded to see Liang, the other reporter from his paper.

Liang reported to Gou's office looking embarrassed, witnesses said. "There's nothing wrong with my reporting," he maintained, according to the witnesses. For his part, Zhou said that the ringleader was Nanfang Daily's Hua Kejian and that he himself was only trying to help Bai get through a difficult time.

Unmoved, Gou fired Zhou. Liang was spared for lack of evidence, he said, and continues to work in the bureau. Hua Kejian and Song Yi also remain at their jobs.

At the bureau's regular weekly meeting on Oct. 10, Gou told his staff that the Zhou Yu case was a "shame" for himself, the bureau and the newspaper, besmirching its "glorious history," according to a record of the meeting.

After investigating, Gou told his reporters that he was convinced this was a unique case; he threatened to fire any others caught engaging in such conduct. "If anyone feels he can only make a living by blackmailing people, he should leave," Gou said, according to the record. "This is not the place for you."

But he also acknowledged that Shenzhen has an "unhealthy environment" in which such corruption can flourish. One of his own reporters has asked him repeatedly to withhold certain news, he complained.

Shenzhen journalists said that, in addition to blackmailing, reporters and editors regularly receive payments from businessmen and officials in exchange for publication of favorable articles. Instances range from the 300,000 yuan paid to a newspaper recently for an article praising Shenzhen's city government to "red envelopes" containing "transportation money" for reporters who show up at news conferences. The practice is encouraged, they added, by a system in which reporters are also responsible for selling advertising and subscriptions to the institutions and businesses they cover.

The payoffs have become so accepted that a reporter who showed up this month at a news conference called by an Internet software company here complained loudly and walked out when he discovered he would be given only a bottle of mineral water, according to other reporters present.

"I would say there are problems in the Chinese media world," one of them commented.

Zhou, meanwhile, said he feels betrayed by Bai for denouncing him to his boss. He no longer has any contact with his former colleagues Liang, Hua and Song, he said. His girlfriend seems to be the only one who believes his version of what happened that evening, he complained. His dreams of being a great journalist have dimmed, he added, and now he plans to start a trading company.

DOJ_NMG_0121483

"I'm not thinking of the news business anymore," he said, smiling. "This had too much of an impact on me."

Debris In Space (WSJ)

By Bruce Berkowitz

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

China's foreign ministry acknowledged on Tuesday what the world press had reported for almost two weeks: a test of an anti-satellite weapon in space. The danger now is that partisans and pundits will overreact. Some will claim the launch represents a new threat to the United States. Others will warn of the militarization of space.

They are both wrong. The real threat is that Washington will miss an opportunity to move China along the path to more diplomatic openness and democracy, and deter it from aggression against its neighbors and American interests.

It helps to begin with a few facts. First, it is not especially difficult to make a "killer satellite." If a country can build a satellite, it is easy to build one that can approach another satellite and destroy it. Modern guidance technology is widely available and more accurate than ever, so this step is not difficult. Conversely, it is impossible to ban killer satellites without banning all satellites. Even if a country did not build a dedicated killer and train its operators, the skills for space rendezvous, docking and refueling (like the Russian "Progress" vehicle used to supply the International Space Station) are the same.

Second, because these technologies and skills are interchangeable, it is impossible to verify a ban on killer satellites. Unverifiable treaties are worse than no treaties at all because they offer the illusion of control where none exists.

Third, the Chinese test is not a major step in "militarizing space." Space is already heavily militarized. Most major military powers use satellite-based systems for communications, navigation and imagery. It's all available from commercial venders. The U.S. may operate more satellites than any other country, but it is not uniquely dependent on them.

Fourth, even if one were to somehow ban killer satellites, there are many other ways to deny an adversary the use of space -- for example, by bombing an enemy's ground stations or jamming the radio links he uses to command satellites. So even if a ban on killer satellites were possible, it would not solve the vulnerability problem.

In short, anyone concerned with the ability of the U.S. to use space should be concerned less by the fact that China tested a weapon, and more by the kind of weapon it tested.

Press reports say that the Chinese killer satellite was a "kinetic" weapon, similar to the kind the U.S. and the Soviet Union tested 20 years ago. These satellites destroy targets by ramming into them at high velocity, or by shooting their victim with a mass of pellets, like buckshot. Either way, the result is a huge amount of debris in orbit, creating a hazard to other satellites. Most of this debris remains in space for several decades -- or longer.

According to NASA, there are already approximately 11,000 objects larger than 10 centimeters circling the Earth. The number of objects smaller than that -- mainly unused rocket fuel, exhaust waste and flecks and chips from routine operations -- is so great as to be practically incalculable.

In time, an accumulation of this debris could make space operations extremely difficult. The material orbits the Earth at seven kilometers per second or more, depending on its altitude. At this velocity, even minute objects can cause enormous damage to satellites. This is why U.S. space operators are required to minimize debris under regulations administered by NASA.

Since the Chinese have ambitions of their own to use space, they have as much interest as the U.S. to limit debris. Washington should use this test as an opportunity to discuss an international convention on the subject. These discussions could codify the guidelines that Russia, Japan, the European Space Agency and the U.S. already follow, and would bring China into the fold.

There is a precedent for an agreement on space debris: the Incidents at Sea Agreement America signed with the Soviet Union in 1972. At the time, U.S. and Soviet warships were playing an aggressive game of intimidation, stunting and near-misses as each shadowed the other's exercises. Neither wanted to give in, nor allow the game to go too far.

In talks over the course of a year, the two navies agreed to guidelines for avoiding collisions. The agreement was negotiated largely at the working level, where naval officers dealt with each other on a professional basis to achieve a practical understanding.

If Washington simply protests the anti-satellite test or ignores it, the U.S. will tell the Chinese military that there is no penalty for their actions, nor any real desire abroad to stop them. On the other hand, if there is any discussion or disagreement among Chinese leaders on this subject, America can at least let Beijing know the test will affect U.S.-China relations.

Minimizing space debris is just like protecting intellectual property and setting a market value for the renminbi. It's an obligation China must meet if it expects to take part in the free market. We'll never demilitarize space. But we can make it a safer place to work, and in the process move America's China policy along, too.

China's Missile Message (WP)

By Elizabeth Economy

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

China's successful anti-satellite missile test has sparked a political firestorm, as analysts have tried to ascertain who in China knew what when and to what end. Were China's diplomats in the dark about the missile strike? Was it all a gambit to force a reluctant United States to the negotiating table for a ban on space-based weapons? While interesting to China watchers and nonproliferation experts, this discussion risks obscuring the real message of the test: Chinese rhetoric notwithstanding, China's rise will be as disruptive and difficult as that of any other global power.

Officials in both Beijing and Washington have worked hard to sketch out an alternative reality. China's leaders have traversed the globe, preaching the gospel of the country's peaceful rise, often to great effect: China will do things differently than the United States and earlier European powers did, not polluting the environment, not colonizing countries to gain access to their natural resources and not infringing on the sovereignty of other countries. For their part, senior U.S. officials, with a growing list of challenging issues on their China agenda, are reluctant to focus for too long on the reality of China's rise. Doing so would only make cooperation more difficult and provide support to an often obstreperous anti-China lobby in Congress. It is easier to paint China's rise as a work in progress -- one that the United States has the ability to influence.

Yet the truth is that China, with its rapidly growing economy and large population, already exerts an unsettling and often negative impact on the world. China is the largest or second-largest contributor to many of the most vexing global environmental problems, including climate change, the illegal timber trade, ozone depletion and marine pollution in the Pacific. It is squeezing manufacturing industries from South Africa to Thailand to Mexico, placing stress on economies ill-equipped to compete. And its weak public health infrastructure but strict media regulations rank it at the top of potential incubators for the next global health pandemic.

While such effects might be excused as unintentional consequences of China's rapid growth, others cannot be so easily dismissed. China's insistence that it doesn't mix business with politics in its foreign relations, while sounding benign, has the perverse effect of contributing to violence and repression throughout much of the world. Its political and financial support for regimes in Sudan, North Korea, Zimbabwe and Burma, among others, cannot in any way be construed as contributing to global peace and stability. Moreover, China's export of unsavory environmental and labor practices in countries where it is aggressively extracting natural resources has contributed to anti-Chinese demonstrations from Peru to Zambia.

The missile strike also underscores perhaps the greatest challenge of China's rise as a global power: The lack of transparency, official accountability and rule of law that defines China on the domestic front plays poorly on the international stage. Chinese leaders' inability to be forthcoming on matters of international importance -- whether SARS, the Harbin pollution disaster or this missile strike -- erodes whatever goodwill and trust they earn from their tireless sojourns abroad and suggests that they are not ready for prime time.

If this is the reality of China's rise, then the United States has work to do, the most important being to change the way it does business. If we want China to be a responsible world power on issues such as energy security, climate change, human rights and even space-based weapons, we need to step up and lead. We can and should condemn China for not respecting the international rules governing these issues or negatively affecting other countries' well-being, but we must be prepared to play by the same rules. While other powers may have granted American exceptionalism in the past, China is not inclined to do so. Indeed, China is more likely to seek its own "exceptional" status.

Even if we get that far, there will still be a tough road ahead. The transparency, accountability and rule of law that responsible world leadership entails are nascent and under constant threat in China. This is where Washington has it right. We need a strong commitment -- from the federal government as well as the private sector -- to helping, if not pushing, China in the right direction, and we need to do so with a long-term perspective.

If there is a silver lining to this missile strike, it may be that we can finally stop talking about China's peaceful rise or the Washington consensus vs. the Beijing consensus. The only consensus that matters is one rooted in a clear understanding of China's rise and the urgency it brings to the need for real U.S. leadership.

Russia Hits U.S. Anti-missile Plans (WT/AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121485

NEW DELHI -- Russia's defense minister yesterday harshly criticized U.S. plans to deploy missile-defense sites in Central Europe, saying Moscow doesn't trust the U.S. explanation that they are intended to counter missile threats posed by Iran and North Korea.

Sergei Ivanov, speaking during a trip to India where he co-chaired a bilateral commission on military ties, said neither Iran nor North Korea has or will have a capability to build missiles that can reach Europe.

"They don't and won't have intercontinental ballistic missiles," Mr. Ivanov told reporters. "And a question comes: whom it's directed against?"

U.S. authorities said Monday they had told Polish leaders that the United States wants to open formal negotiations on the possibility of locating ground-based interceptor missiles in Poland.

Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek of the Czech Republic also said Washington had asked to base a radar station in the country that would serve as another part of the system.

Both Poland and the Czech Republic are former Soviet satellite nations that are now NATO members.

Mr. Ivanov said yesterday that the deployment of U.S. missile-defense facilities in Poland and the Czech Republic was a decided issue despite official claims that talks were still ahead.

"It's done mostly to assuage domestic public opinion," he said. "The decision already has been made, and the talks serve simply as a cover. Like other new NATO members, the Czech Republic and Poland want to show their loyalty."

Russian military officials have said they see the U.S. system as a threat that would upset the security balance and have warned of unspecified measures in response.

Asked about how Russia could respond to the U.S. move, Mr. Ivanov said there was no need for any quick retaliation. "Our strategic nuclear forces ensure national security under any scenario," he said.

Russia's criticism of the U.S. move comes just days after the United States and other allies raised concerns over the rising militarization of space after a successful test by China of an anti-satellite weapon.

China confirmed the test on Tuesday but didn't provide details. Aviation Week, which first reported the test, said the satellite was hit by a "kinetic kill vehicle" launched from a ballistic missile.

Analysts said the test represented an indirect threat to U.S. defense systems by raising the possibility that its spy satellites could be shot down. The threat wouldn't affect the anti-missile system.

Putin In India: Visit Is Sign Of Durability Of Old Ties (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

NEW DELHI, Jan. 24 — A new nuclear accord, booming trade and an ever closer partnership with the United States notwithstanding, the guest of honor this week at India's Republic Day ceremony, an annual display of military pomp, will be a symbol of New Delhi's newest old friend: President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia.

Mr. Putin's two-day visit to this country, starting Thursday, is his fourth since becoming president and is seen as testament to the enduring ties between India and Russia. Battered by the end of the cold war and challenged by India's warmer relations with the United States, those links have been revived by the strategic demands of a prospering India, namely energy and arms. In both areas Russia stands to be an important partner.

Asked about the visit's significance, one Indian government minister took pains to point out that his country's old camaraderie with Moscow ought not to alarm its new friends in Washington.

"Our relationship with Russia is not directed against the United States, and our relationship with the United States is not at the expense of our continued engagement with Russia," said Jairam Ramesh, India's junior commerce minister.

For starters, India wants to expand its access to investment in Russia's vast oil reserves. On the agenda during Mr. Putin's visit, Indian officials have said, is a proposed joint venture to explore for oil in Siberia. India's $1 billion stake in an existing project called Sakhalin I is this country's largest foreign investment.

Reliance Industries, an Indian energy company, has floated the idea of investing in a Russian refinery.

And according to Indian officials, Russia has expressed interest in investing in a pipeline that would carry natural gas from Iran through Pakistan to India. The Bush administration has repeatedly expressed reservations about the project.

India's current oil imports from Russia, or indeed from anywhere outside the Middle East, are negligible, primarily because of transportation problems.

Far more important, analysts pointed out, Moscow is already New Delhi's largest defense partner. Paradoxically, when the India-United States nuclear deal opens the door for New Delhi to buy nuclear technology to expand its civilian nuclear program, Russia may benefit.

Kanwal Sibal, India's ambassador to Russia, predicted that Russia would be "among the first, if not the first, to walk in."

India would be allowed to purchase nuclear fuel, reactors and other technology on the world market, but only after it gained approval from the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group, which regulates international atomic energy trade.

Russia is already building two nuclear reactors in this country. This week, the Interfax news agency quoted the Russian defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, as saying his government was prepared to build additional reactors here.

Likewise, India has Moscow to thank for a variety of conventional weaponry, from tanks to an aircraft carrier and fighter jets. Russia remains India's biggest military partner, though New Delhi's utter dependence on Moscow during the cold war has been complicated by new entrants, most prominently Israel.

The Indians and the Russians have jointly produced a short-range missile called the Brahmos, which, contrary to Russian objectives, India wants to sell on the private market. And India's ambitions for space research — particularly in light of China's successful testing of an antisatellite missile last week — rely heavily on Russian cooperation.

"Russia continues to be as important an ally as before and will remain that way, but the contours of this relationship have changed," said Ashok Mehta, a retired general.

Best of all from an Indian perspective, Russia has displayed none of the compulsions that the United States has, for instance, to maintain good relations with India's neighbor and rival, Pakistan.

Gauging Russia's future importance to India is a matter of debate. If India is allowed to shop on the world nuclear market, Russia is likely to face competition from France, C. Raja Mohan, the strategic affairs columnist of The Indian Express, argued, and from the United States and Israel on conventional weapons.

Russia's soft power in this country has all but collapsed. Where once there were state-sponsored performances of the Bolshoi Ballet in New Delhi and Russian literature flooded Indian libraries, there are now only a handful of relics of Russian romance left: a statue of Lenin at a public park here in the capital or a prominent politician in the south named after Stalin.

Trade with Russia has plummeted. At roughly $2.5 billion, it now represents a little more than a tenth of India-China trade. In an effort to fix that, a trade delegation is expected to come to India next month.

Smuggler's Plot Highlights Fear Over Uranium (NYT)

By Lawrence Scott Sheets And William J. Broad

New York Times, January 25, 2007

TBILISI, Georgia, Jan. 24 — Last January, a Russian man with sunken cheeks and a wispy mustache crossed into Georgia and traveled to Tbilisi by car along a high mountain road. In two plastic bags in his leather jacket, Georgian authorities say, he carried 100 grams of uranium so refined that it could help fuel an atom bomb.

The Russian, Oleg Khinsagov, had come to meet a buyer who he believed would pay him $1 million and deliver the material to a Muslim man from "a serious organization," the authorities say.

The uranium was a sample, just under four ounces, and the deal a test: If all went smoothly, he boasted, he would sell a far larger cache stored in his apartment back in Vladikavkaz, two to three kilograms of the rare material, four and a half to six and a half pounds, which in expert hands is enough to make a small bomb.

The buyer, it turned out, was a Georgian agent. Alerted to Mr. Khinsagov's ambitions by spies in South Ossetia, Georgian officials arrested him and confiscated his merchandise. After a secret trial, the smuggler was sentenced to eight and a half years in prison.

The case has alarmed officials because they had thought that new security precautions had tamped down the nuclear black market that developed in the 1990s, after the Soviet Union collapsed.

Until now, all but the vague outlines of the case have remained secret. But an examination of the episode, and a similar one in 2003, suggests that the region's political instability and culture of rampant corruption continue to provide a fertile breeding ground for illicit commerce in atomic materials.

Interviews with Georgian and American officials, along with a review of confidential government documents, provide a glimpse into a world of smugglers who slip across poorly policed borders and the agents who try to stop them.

The illicit trade — not just in atomic goods but also in everything from stolen cars to furs to counterfeit $100 bills — thrives especially in Georgia, where tiny separatist regions have broken away to become lawless criminal havens.

This latest uranium seizure, said the American ambassador here, John F. Tefft, "highlights how smuggling and loose border control, associated with Georgia's separatist conflicts," pose a threat "not just to Georgia but to all the international community."

What is most worrisome about the two most recent case, nuclear experts say, is the material itself: in large enough quantities, it could provide a terrorist with an instant solution to the biggest challenge in making a nuclear weapon, obtaining the fuel.

The uranium seized in both 2003 and 2006 had been enriched to nearly 90 percent U-235, according to Russian and American government analyses obtained by The New York Times. Though the quantities were too small to make a bomb, that level of purity is ideal for doing so.

Both cases appear to fit a broader profile: virtually all of the nuclear materials seized since the Soviet breakup are believed to be Russian in origin, according to American government reports.

In these two episodes, the individuals arrested testified that they had obtained the uranium through a web of Russian contacts and middlemen of various nationalities.

An American government laboratory's analysis of the 2006 material — which, among other things, disclosed traces of two rare forms of uranium, U-234 and U-236 — provides "a strong case" that it indeed came from Russia, said Thomas B. Cochran, director of the nuclear program at the Natural Resources Defense Council, a private group that monitors atomic arsenals.

However, a confidential memorandum from the Russian intelligence service, the F.S.B., to the Georgian government said a detailed analysis had been unable to pinpoint the material's origins, though it did not rule out Russian provenance. It also estimated that the uranium had been processed more than a decade ago.

Officials in Georgia, locked in a cold war with Moscow, say the cases underscore their concerns over borders, security and the fate of the breakaway regions.

Georgia's chief nuclear investigator, Archil Pavlenishvili, said that while Russia cooperated in the early stages of the 2003 investigation, in 2006 it had hardly helped at all, beyond taking a sample of the seized material for analysis. He said the Georgians had informed the Russian Embassy here in Tbilisi of Mr. Khinsagov's detention, and had offered to let diplomats speak to him. But the Russians, he said, never responded.

The Georgian interior minister, Ivane Merabishvili, said the cases illustrated the grave risk posed by nuclear trafficking, especially in an age of terrorism. The biggest danger, he said, were the people "in Russia and Georgia and everywhere else, even in America, who will sell this radioactive material" for millions of dollars.

The Russian Interior Ministry and the intelligence service did not respond to requests for comment.

Murat Dzhoyev, the foreign minister of South Ossetia, one of the separatist regions in Georgia, denied that any nuclear smuggling had taken place in his region.

"As concerns their claims that contraband, or moreover, the laughable claim that nuclear materials are going through South Ossetia, that's just funny," he said in an interview. "I hope not a single serious person in the world takes this seriously."

On Friday the United Nations International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna is expected to make the first official announcement with details about the 2006 case.

The old Soviet empire had a vast network of nuclear facilities. After its breakup, as managers abandoned plants and security fell apart, the West grew alarmed as many cases of atomic smuggling came to light.

In 1994 alone, two seizures involved more than five kilos — 11 pounds — of highly enriched uranium. The I.A.E.A. listed more than a dozen cases of illicit trade in highly enriched uranium, along with dozens of seizures of highly radioactive material.

Since 2000, however, the amounts and purity of the seized material has declined as former Soviet republics set up new security precautions, often financed by the United States.

For instance, Washington provided thousands of hand-held devices meant to detect radiation, and planned to spend a total of $570 million to install small and large radiation detectors, according to recent government reports. In short, the threat seemed to recede.

"People said, 'Hey, the situation's improved,' " said William C. Potter, a leading authority on nuclear smuggling at the Monterey Institute of International Studies in California. The seizures in Georgia, he said, suggest something else: that the trade may simply "have gone under the radar."

The smuggler in the first case, an Armenian named Garik Dadayan, was arrested on June 26, 2003, at Sadakhlo, a muddy village where Georgia meets Armenia and Azerbaijan. With Armenia and Azerbaijan at war over territory, the village had become neutral ground for the trading of tea and cognac, illicit caviar, cheap light bulbs and smuggled gasoline.

When apprehended, Mr. Dadayan, who described himself simply as a businessman, was carrying a tea box that held 170 grams, about seven ounces, of highly enriched uranium. According to the Georgian officials, he said the uranium had come from Novosibirsk, in Siberia, the site of a major Russian nuclear complex that processes vast quantities of highly enriched uranium.

Mr. Pavlenishvili, the Georgian investigator, said the Russian intelligence agency confirmed that before his trip into Georgia, Mr. Dadayan had twice traveled by railroad from Moscow to Novosibirsk.

The smuggler told the authorities that he intended to sell the material to a Turkish middleman named Teimur Sadik; its ultimate destination, he said Mr. Sadik had told him, was "a Muslim man."

DOJ_NMG_0121488

Mr. Dadayan was handed over to the Armenian government, tried and sentenced to two and a half years in prison. Mr. Sadik, Georgian authorities say, is now in custody of the Turkish secret services.

Since that episode, the United States has spent millions of dollars to help the Georgians strengthen nuclear security, especially along the borders.

Two years later, Georgian authorities learned that highly enriched uranium was again being offered for sale, this time in South Ossetia, a rugged and beautiful land no bigger than Long Island, with few border controls on either the Russian or Georgian side. People and contraband move freely through its fields and along its mountain roads. The United States says it has discovered counterfeit $100 bills traceable to South Ossetia circulating in at least four American cities.

The man trying to sell the uranium, Georgian officials say, was Oleg Khinsagov, a shabbily dressed 50-year-old trader who specialized in fish and sausages.

Eventually he came into contact with four Georgians who were already under government surveillance. The four men went to North Ossetia, a neighboring region within Russia, and arranged to smuggle the uranium into Georgia. It was at that point that the Georgian authorities set their trap.

They arranged for a Georgian operative who speaks fluent Turkish to meet with the middlemen and tell them he represented a Muslim man from "a serious organization." Mr. Khinsagov and several of his cohort entered Georgia in late January 2006, and on Feb. 1 they were arrested in a two-room apartment on the eighth floor of a crumbling Soviet-style building in a lower-class district of Tbilisi.

"We got that 100 grams and put it into a box and were very afraid," said Mr. Merabishvili, the interior minister. Where the smuggler got the uranium and whether he actually had more remains unclear.

The Georgians called for help from American diplomats, who sent in experts from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department of Energy, American officials say. Mr. Merabishvili said the Americans shocked them by taking the uranium and simply putting it "in their pocket." Uranium in that form emits little radiation and presents little or no danger to its handlers.

When it was analyzed at the Energy Department's laboratory in the Pacific Northwest, it was found to have a U-235 purity of 89.451 percent, "suitable for certain types of research reactors, as a source material for medical isotope production, and for military purposes including nuclear weapons."

Death Of Spy Who Ingested Polonium Spurs Drug Makers (WSJ)

By Steve Levine

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Chemet, a drug developed by Ovation Pharmaceuticals Inc. of Deerfield, Ill., to treat the symptoms of radiation exposure, wasn't getting much attention until last November. But that month, a rare radioactive isotope was used to murder former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko, and a week later, Ovation got a call from the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases: Could the company brief the agency on Chemet?

Ovation is one of a few U.S. drug companies and laboratories that are attracting new attention because of Mr. Litvinenko's death in London from poisoning by polonium-210. In the case of Ovation, the company hasn't received federal funding but thinks its chances have dramatically improved.

The federal government's interest precedes Mr. Litvinenko's murder, and is linked with the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the U.S. In 2003, the Bush administration launched Project Bioshield, a federal program to obtain drugs against nuclear, biological and chemical agents. One of the program's aims is to prepare for a possible attack on the U.S. by terrorists using a "dirty bomb" -- a conventional explosive laced with a lethal chemical, biological or nuclear agent.

Last fall, the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases in Bethesda, Md., and the Pentagon separately offered funding for research into promising radiation-injury treatments. The institute is looking for remedies for civilians, while the Pentagon is seeking to prolong the lives of soldiers irradiated by nuclear weapons.

Now, pharmaceutical companies are giving notice that drugs they have developed, or are developing, for cancer and other diseases can also be used for exposure to radioactive elements, including possibly polonium-210. Most must be taken within hours of exposure to be effective.

British authorities haven't completed their investigation of Mr. Litvinenko's murder, but say that his killers may have slipped the isotope of polonium-210 into his drink or food Nov. 1, when his first symptoms appeared. He died Nov. 23 in a London hospital after weeks of agony.

Radioactive elements attack the body by damaging the DNA in blood cells. The cells stop dividing and die, and the body ends up short of the blood cells it needs to survive. Chemet (pronounced KEM-et) works by accelerating the evacuation of heavy-metal isotopes from the body. It works by binding with the isotope and moving it from the bone marrow -- essential to produce blood cells -- to the kidney, says Jason Bradt, Ovation's executive director of medical affairs. The movement away from the marrow "increases survivability," he says. Kidney damage can be dealt with later.

Cleveland Biolabs Inc. takes a different approach with its drug Protectan. The Cleveland-based company developed the drug as a cancer treatment, but in November it said it was responding to a Department of Defense announcement seeking a radiation-treatment drug. Andrei Gudkov, the company's chief scientific officer, says that he was inundated with questions after Mr. Litvinenko became an international news story.

Protectan works by preventing cells from self-destructing, thus giving "them a time window to repair the damage," Mr. Gudkov says. "You give the cells the metaphorical equivalent of antidepressants."

Mr. Gudkov says he can't be sure that Protectan, meant to work against gamma rays, will be effective against polonium-210, which emits another kind of energy called alpha particles. Gamma rays pass through solid objects; Alpha particles travel only a short distance, can't penetrate the skin, and only cause damage if ingested or inhaled. Inside the body, alpha particles bombard and punch holes in organs. "I tell them we can't say [Protectan] will work with alpha particles" until it's tested on a nonhuman primate, says Mr. Gudkov.

A third possible antidote for polonium-210 is being developed by Hollis-Eden Pharmaceuticals Inc. of San Diego and the Pentagon. The drug, Neumune, treats radiation by promoting the growth of bone marrow.

But a drug like Neumune starts working only after an isotope like polonium-210 is expelled from the body, says Dwight Stickney, Hollis-Eaton's vice president for medical affairs.

So one idea would be to combine drugs. One like Chemet, for instance, would remove the isotope from a victim's body, or isolate it in a lethally nonthreatening place like the kidney; a drug like Protectan could stop the cells from committing suicide; and one like Neumune could promote production of more blood cells.

"There could be multiple cocktails that could have a synergistic benefit," says Ovation's Mr. Bradt.

Just How Good Is Globalization? (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

The business and political leaders who gather every year at the World Economic Forum have long shared a creed: Globalization is good.

That still is generally true. But this year, many of them are questioning whether it is good for the ordinary wage-earning people they employ -- or in many cases, no longer employ -- at their companies.

A new refrain is emerging in Davos this year: Globalization isn't working for everyone. Stagnating wages and rising job insecurity in developed countries are creating popular disenchantment with the free movement of goods, capital and people across borders. If unchecked, popular fears could turn into a political backlash that could lead to protectionism -- or at least make broad free-trade agreements harder to achieve in the future.

"The anxiety is there, because we have competitors that didn't exist 10 or 15 years ago," German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who arrived in Davos yesterday, said in an interview last week. Governments in the developed world, she said, have to persuade their own middle class -- a group used to a relatively stable economy in the postwar decades -- to embrace a life of constant change and challenge.

In theory, less-developed countries win from globalization because they get jobs making low-cost products for rich countries. Rich countries win because, in addition to being able to buy inexpensive imports, they also can sell more sophisticated products like machine tools or financial services to emerging economies.

"The first win is there, but the second win is going to the owners of capital rather than labor," says Stephen Roach, chief economist at Morgan Stanley.

Many companies in the U.S. and Europe have been able to squeeze workers' pay increases by threatening to move production abroad. In the past decade, real labor incomes in the U.S. have grown at roughly half the rate of labor productivity, Mr. Roach says.

The reason for this is simple: With the emergence of China, India and countries from the former Soviet bloc, companies from the established economies of North America, Europe and Japan have more choices on where to invest. That puts them in a stronger bargaining position with workers in their home countries.

"There is compression of wages as a result of the number of workers competing for jobs," says Laura Tyson, dean of London Business School. As a result, an ever-larger share of national income in the U.S., Japan and Western Europe is going to company profits. The share that flows to workers is dwindling, which explains why worker anxiety is becoming an election issue in the U.S. and elsewhere.

Others at Davos say the problem isn't capital versus labor, it is that changing technology and trade patterns put high-skilled workers increasingly in demand, reducing the demand for less-skilled workers. "Skilled workers are enjoying rapid wage increases, but unskilled workers have had very slow wage rises in recent decades," says Ken Rogoff, a professor of economics at Harvard University.

To be sure, many businesspeople in Davos believe the problem is one of perceptions, and that fears about trade undermining living standards in developed countries are misplaced.

"What can we do to educate politicians to the reality that a rising tide floats all ships?" asks E. Neville Isdell, chief executive of Coca-Cola Co. In politics, the voices of interest groups can outweigh the wider good, he says. "We have to develop a less academic approach to explaining the benefits of globalization."

Mr. Isdell hopes governments will make the case that when U.S. companies move some jobs to China, the resulting gain in productivity can create a larger number of new jobs at home. The irony of heightened anxiety over job security, he says, is that it comes at a time of low unemployment in the U.S. and other advanced economies such as the United Kingdom.

The problem, many participants agree, is that workers in the West aren't equipped for today's pace of change, in which jobs come and go and skills can quickly become redundant.

"You have to have a better education system from preschool onward," says William McDonough, vice chairman of Merrill Lynch & Co. He recognizes, however, that improved education is a long-term remedy that won't help those feeling the pressure of rising global competition today.

"A shorter-term strategy is to have more assistance for workers who are laid off," Mr. McDonough says. "I think we need to be much more helpful as a society to people who are the victims of globalization." Such aid should be supported by the state, he adds.

Others support programs like the Scandinavian-style retraining of workers who lose their jobs. "Paradoxically, we need a bigger role of the public sector in the economy to make markets work better," says Nouriel Roubini, chairman of Roubini Global Economics, an online economic-advisory service.

Liberians Love Their Iron Lady, For Now (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

MONROVIA, LIBERIA — Liberians call her "da woma," in their soft patois where the word endings seem to die in the steamy West African heat.

"Da woma', she tra' her bes'," they tell you earnestly, if you inquire about the state of affairs in a country shredded by a 14-year civil war. "She tra'." She's trying.

At times, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Africa's first elected female head of state, seems like a mild, smiling, grandmotherly figure. Diminutive and bespectacled, she travels about the country wearing jeans and a baseball cap. She can't resist hurrying over to speak to small children who catch her eye.

Yet the 68-year-old president also is a feisty, ambitious economist trying to turn around one of the most damaged and traumatized countries on Earth, with a ferociousness that has earned her another nickname: the Iron Lady. Friends say she's so strong she didn't even cry out during childbirth.

"Ellie, she don't cry," said Gibson Jerue, publisher of the independent newspaper Public Agenda, who once fled Liberia fearing for his life after he wrote an article headlined "Charles Taylor's Days Are Numbered," on the warlord who was then Liberia's president.

Today, nearly 3 1/2 years after the war ended with Taylor's exile and a year after Johnson-Sirleaf took office, the most visible progress in this grimy, bullet-pocked capital is a few wan strings of fairy lights draped on dilapidated street awnings.

After years without electricity, some shops have thrown up a yard or two of the lights, which look more like an afterthought than a celebration. Still, as the winking bulbs struggle against Liberia's velvety darkness, their glow exudes sweet optimism.

Johnson-Sirleaf is under no illusions: A few more months or a year without bringing jobs and her people's love and admiration will themselves blink out. But for now she offers hope of a new beginning to a nation torn by war's atrocities, many of them committed by doped-up children who fought in drag and believed magic could protect them from the bullets.

When she changes into colorful Liberian costume for official functions, Johnson-Sirleaf seems to blossom like a tropical flower. Her raspy, charismatic voice rises powerfully as she addresses the crowds.

She is divorced with four sons and six grandchildren, and comes from a pious family. As a student, her only ambition was to be a schoolteacher like her mother. Both her grandmothers, one of whom had a market stall, were illiterate.

She played soccer with the boys, a rarity in those days. She was a lethal volleyball player, leaping up and whacking the ball two-handed across court, a shot that almost never failed.

After studying in the United States, she returned home to become finance minister under President William Tolbert in the early 1970s. After she was jailed by the regime of Samuel Doe in 1985 and was charged with treason under Taylor in 1997, she went into exile. She worked for the World Bank, Citibank, the International Monetary Fund and other organizations.

High standards

Johnson-Sirleaf has a fierce sense of probity: As finance minister, she was livid when close friend Clavenda Bright-Parker, who had a pharmacy business, told her that she had paid a $25 bribe to the ministry to speed up a check that was slow in coming.

"She got so upset with me," recalled Bright-Parker, still a friend and supporter. "She said I should know better than that — I am ruining her ministry. She has a standard she wants to maintain. She said, 'I should send your name in.' "

Johnson-Sirleaf has known for more than two decades, since elections in 1985, that the presidency could be hers. That year she was elected a senator.

"Once I got into my real first election, then of course the die was cast," she said. "At that point I knew that my popularity could take me to the presidency."

She withstood pressure from Doe to get out of politics before the elections and to not serve as senator.

"At that time, I became a folk hero for doing those things," she said in a recent interview in her Monrovia office.

After a coup attempt against Doe later that year, there were arrests and reprisal killings. A group of drunken soldiers seized her in what was to become her worst ordeal.

"I was taken to the military prison," she said. "In fact, as we were going, they told me they were going to take me to the beach and bury me alive. They started in that direction, changed their minds, put me through tortures, put matches to my hair. They said, 'We're going to burn your hair off,' but didn't do it. They would come as close as possible. It clearly was just meant to terrorize me.

"That particular night in prison, anything could have happened."

At one point, all the men in the cell with her were taken out, and she heard gunshots. She waited in terror, convinced the soldiers would come to shoot her next. Then a soldier came to open her cell with what seemed a clear intent to rape her.

He was interrupted. A senior officer, who happened to be from her father's tribe, saw him and barked, "As you were," an order to desist. The officer sat outside her cell all night to protect her.

"And I don't know him until now," she said. "He's never made himself known to me."

Later, soldiers brought a woman to the cell, naked.

"I started a great plea with the soldiers that they couldn't do this. Think of their mother, think of their sister, would they like someone to do that to their mother? After a while, they brought a cloth to cover her up."

But Johnson-Sirleaf said she never begged or broke down, a strength she attributes to her family's strong Christian faith.

"I never did cry, no. I've been through some difficult political times … and I guess I just developed a thick skin, and that inner strength is something that's hard to explain," she said. "I guess it comes from one's childhood, it comes from one's life experiences. It comes from one's faith and your family values."

A daunting task

Liberia today seems a country of slogans, acronyms and good intentions. Crudely painted notice boards tell the population (more than half of which can't read) how to live: "Stop mob violence; use the law." "Say no to cigarettes, pipes and chewing tobacco." "Raped? Get help." Some are slapped up on walls by indignant residents: "Only dogs urinate here."

The acronyms of dozens of international nongovernmental organizations litter the country, proclaiming their intended sites for schools and clinics.

In Monrovia, the capital, a teeming population jostles and hustles. The smell of sewage pervades some streets. The city seems to exhale grime, leaving a grubby sheen upon the skin.

The hip-hop song about Johnson-Sirleaf is called "A Letter to the President."

Hello, Ma. See, what we need is change, a change from suffering, a change from poverty. You can make it, Ma. We trust you; that's why we voted for you.

To help jump-start the economy, Johnson-Sirleaf is relying on an end to diamond sanctions imposed by the United Nations, a revival of the rubber and timber industries, and an iron ore project by Mittal Steel offering more than 3,000 jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0121492

A key donors conference is to be held in February. And moves to resolve the country's IMF debt are crucial if Liberia is to borrow from countries such as China, which wants to invest $1 billion thanks to Liberia's abundant resources.

Hounded by a question

One big step for Liberia was the arrest of Taylor in March, which sent a shudder of relief through the country.

When the former president was in exile in Nigeria, which granted him asylum after the war ended in 2003, the question of his extradition on international war crimes charges dogged Johnson-Sirleaf everywhere — especially on a trip to the United States, which had pressed for his arrest. Hoping her cooperation would attract donor funds, she asked a reluctant Nigeria to hand him over.

Then came the news: Taylor had escaped.

"At first I thought: 'How could this be? Was this with the knowledge of the Nigerian government? Were they setting him free? What would be the implications for our whole peace here? Would he end up here?' And the implication of that was serious. But then, when he was caught, I realized that Nigeria has its own ways of solving problems," she said, laughing wryly.

Later she had to face the fury of Taylor's greatest supporter, Libyan leader Moammar Kadafi. In a meeting in Tripoli, the Libyan capital, Kadafi thrust out his wrist at her, displaying a flashy watch. Look at it, he told her. Charles Taylor gave it to me. Then he berated her over the decision to hand Taylor over to a U.N. war crimes tribunal.

Taylor allies still circulate in Liberia, and Johnson-Sirleaf's security force has reported several assassination plots.

"If someone's willing to give his life to kill you, he'll probably kill you," she said. She eschews a heavy security presence.

"I don't want to be that kind of president," she said. "I like to remain what they call me, the people's president."

Johnson-Sirleaf has drastically cut the civil service, restored power and water to parts of Monrovia, pursued corrupt former officials and pressured the international community to help the country by lifting the diamond sanctions and forgiving its unsustainable level of debt.

Her government is admired abroad — in Washington, she won a standing ovation at a joint session of Congress last year — but is often lambasted in the independent local press. To her opponents, her famous tough exterior translates as vindictiveness; to supporters, it shows she's the only one strong enough to save Liberia from itself.

Even giving birth, she amazed her mother-in-law with her toughness, friend Bright-Parker said. There was no crying from the labor pains.

But at times her eyes do mist up. Perhaps it's when she asks a child in the street why he's not in school and hears there is no money.

"I cry quicker for the simple things than for the tougher things," she said. She recently visited the family of a well-known young journalist who had died of unexplained causes.

"He had two little children, and the little boy came to me and put his head in my lap and said, 'You know my father was everything to me.'

"Those things will break me a lot quicker than a soldier threatening me."

OPEC President Takes In Stride Decline In Prices (WSJ)

By Adam Smallman

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland -- OPEC's new president said that he would like higher oil prices than current levels, but that the long-term outlook was more important than a near-term price slide.

Mohammed al-Hamli, president of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries and oil minister for the United Arab Emirates, said he would be at ease if the cartel's reference basket of 11 of its members' crude oils was about $55 a barrel.

OPEC on Tuesday pegged the basket of crude-oil types it watches at $49.52 a barrel, and that basket typically fetches prices $5 a barrel or more below the benchmark U.S. price.

Benchmark U.S. oil prices peaked at about $77 a barrel last summer and have declined since, as the increase ate into demand in parts of the industrialized world. In addition, the U.S. is awash in heating oil, an unusually mild winter has dashed global consumption expectations, and new oil fields entering production are easing long-held supply concerns.

"I was worried when we lost 12% on these prices," said Mr. al-Hamli on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum here. "People panicked when they took a collective slide. So, we are concerned -- but not very concerned." OPEC, he said, prefers a long-term view, adding that "we don't react to today's and tomorrow's prices."

His remarks underscore some of the uncertainty OPEC faces amid the volatile oil prices of recent weeks. Late last week, Ali Naimi, the influential Saudi oil minister and OPEC's de facto leader, said the global oil market is in a "very healthy condition."

Speculators also contributed to the rapid decline in prices, their faith in a drop buttressed by what appeared to be slack OPEC discipline in meeting its agreed-upon cuts.

Mr. al-Hamli, who succeeded Nigerian oil minister Edmund Daukoru as cartel president this year, is convinced the market has underestimated the strength of the cartel's compliance. "They can think whatever they like. We're happy with the compliance" to the group's first tranche of cuts, he said, adding that the additional Feb. 1 cut was necessary to respond to falling oil prices.

With an eye toward swelling global crude and product stockpiles, and the seasonal downturn in demand that occurs in the quarter that ends in June, OPEC's 10 members with quotas, excluding Iraq, agreed in October to cut their output 4%, or 1.2 million barrels a day, to about 26.3 million barrels a day. In December, OPEC met again and tacked on a further cut of 500,000 barrels a day commencing Feb. 1 -- lowering output, on paper at least, to 25.8 million barrels a day.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Says The Constitution Doesn't Guarantee Habeas Corpus (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer
San Francisco Chronicle, January 24, 2007
Attorney general's remarks on citizens' right astound the chair of Senate judiciary panel

One of the Bush administration's most far-reaching assertions of government power was revealed quietly last week when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testified that habeas corpus -- the right to go to federal court and challenge one's imprisonment -- is not protected by the Constitution.

"The Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right of habeas," Gonzales told Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Jan. 17.

Gonzales acknowledged that the Constitution declares "habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless ... in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." But he insisted that "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution."

Specter was incredulous, asking how the Constitution could bar the suspension of a right that didn't exist -- a right, he noted, that was first recognized in medieval England as a shield against the king's power to dispatch troublesome subjects to royal dungeons.

Later in the hearing, Gonzales described habeas corpus as "one of our most cherished rights" and noted that Congress had protected that right in the 1789 law that established the federal court system. But he never budged from his position on the absence of constitutional protection -- a position that seemingly would leave Congress free to reduce habeas corpus rights or repeal them altogether.

Gonzales did not propose any such drastic rollback and devoted most of his discussion to fending off senatorial attacks on a law signed by President Bush last October. That law included a provision stripping federal courts of authority to hear habeas corpus suits by noncitizens classified by the government as "enemy combatants." Specter and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the Judiciary Committee chairman, are sponsoring legislation to undo the restriction.

But critics on both ends of the ideological spectrum said the attorney general was claiming a broader and more chilling power.

"This is the key protection that people have if they're held in violation of the law," said Erwin Chemerinsky, a Duke University law professor who has criticized the administration's actions on civil liberties. "If there's no habeas corpus, and if the government wants to pick you or me off the street and hold us indefinitely, how do we get our release?"

Chemerinsky was joined by Douglas Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor and former Justice Department official under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

If Gonzales' view prevailed, Kmiec said, "one of the basic protections of human liberty against the powers of the state would be embarrassingly absent from our constitutional system."

DOJ_NMG_0121498

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said this week that Gonzales stood by his remarks but was asserting only that the text of the Constitution does not guarantee habeas corpus. The attorney general recognizes, Roehrkasse said, that the Supreme Court has declared "the Constitution protects (habeas corpus) as it existed at common law" in England. Any such rights, he added, would not apply to foreigners held as enemy combatants.

Habeas corpus was recognized in English law at least as early as the Magna Carta, in 1215, and perhaps earlier. In the United States, it refers to bringing a prisoner's case before a federal judge, who has the power to order the government to release anyone who is being held illegally.

It has become an issue in Bush's efforts to hold military captives at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, with little or no access to civilian courts. The Supreme Court ruled in 2004 that that those prisoners could file habeas corpus claims in court, rejecting the administration's argument that inmates held outside the United States had no such right. That ruling was based on the court's interpretation of laws passed by Congress and did not discuss whether Guantanamo inmates had a constitutional right to habeas corpus.

The distinction is potentially crucial, because Congress, in the law signed last October, prohibited federal courts from reviewing habeas corpus suits by Guantanamo prisoners or any other noncitizens held as enemy combatants. The law's validity depends on whether the Supreme Court concludes that the prisoners' constitutional rights are being violated.

The issue of habeas corpus came up during last week's hearing when Specter asked Gonzales how a congressional statute could withdraw the right "when there's an express constitutional provision that it can't be suspended and an explicit Supreme Court holding that it applies to Guantanamo alien detainees?"

The court ruled only on the right to habeas corpus that was created by statute, Gonzales replied. He then asserted that the Constitution does not contain any express right of habeas corpus, only "a prohibition against taking it away."

The issue extends far beyond Guantanamo.

The Supreme Court has interpreted federal judges' powers of habeas corpus to apply to prison systems around the nation and the legality of convictions in state as well as federal court.

For example, federal judges, who are appointed for life, regularly invoke habeas corpus when overturning convictions or death sentences of state inmates, overruling decisions by elected state judges.

Bruce Fein, a former Reagan Justice Department attorney who has become an outspoken critic of the Bush administration, noted that the day before his Judiciary Committee appearance, Gonzales had denounced "activist judges" and advised them to stay out of national security matters.

Gonzales' comments to the committee on habeas corpus, Fein said, contained a message that "Congress doesn't have to let them (judges) decide national security matters."

"It's part of an attempt to create the idea that during conflicts, the three branches of government collapse into one, and it is the president," Fein said.

What Gonzales, Specter said

Excerpts from the exchange between Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Jan. 17:

Gonzales: There is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution. There's a prohibition against taking it away. ...

Specter: Wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away except in cases of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus unless there's an invasion or rebellion?

Gonzales: I meant by that comment, the Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas. Doesn't say that. It simply says the right of habeas corpus shall not be suspended except...

Specter: You may be treading on your interdiction and violating common sense, Mr. Attorney General.

Op-Ed: Specter V. Gonzales (WEEKST)

By Adam J. White

Weekly Standard, January 25, 2007

Senator Specter still misunderstands habeas corpus.

FOR ARLEN SPECTER, limits on the right of Guantanamo prisoners to petition for the writ of habeas corpus in federal courts have long been a sore point. When Alberto Gonzales appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee last week, Pennsylvania's senior senator grilled him on two interrelated subjects: whether the Constitution expressly guarantees the right to petition federal courts for writs of habeas corpus, and whether the Supreme Court's recent Rasul decision affirmed such a constitutional right.

On the former question, Specter received Gonzales's answers with flippant incredulity, but in fact both sides of the argument enjoy substantial support. And on the latter question, Specter's ire was completely inappropriate, for his description of Rasul bore absolutely no resemblance to the Court's decision.

WITH ITS ROOTS IN ENGLAND'S Magna Carta and Habeas Corpus Act, the writ of habeas corpus--"the Great Writ"--affords fundamental protection against unlawful detention. The writ is referenced by name in Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

Specter pressed Gonzales on the constitutionality of Congress's 2005 elimination of habeas corpus rights for Guantanamo prisoners. In answering that the 2005 law did not destroy any rights afforded detainees by the Constitution (rather than by mere statute), Gonzales stated, "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution. There's a prohibition against taking it away."

Specter responded in disbelief:

Wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away except in case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus unless there's an invasion or rebellion? . . . You may be treading on your interdiction and common sense, Mr. Attorney General.

Not exactly. Gonzales's answer, though not unassailable, enjoys much historical support. Although the Constitution expressly provides that the writ of habeas corpus may only be "suspended" in certain circumstances, it does not expressly provide that the writ is implemented in the first instance without an affirmative enactment by Congress.

Specter takes what may well be the more intuitive reading of the Constitution's provision: that Article I, Section 9 presumes that the privilege of habeas corpus exists absent a valid suspension. (Indeed, it's phrased in a manner similar to the First Amendment: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech," clearly presumes that there is a freedom of speech.)

But history suggests that Gonzales (whom Rolling Stone promptly deemed the "Human Constitution Shredder") may well be correct. At the 1787 constitutional convention, the first habeas provision, proposed by South Carolina's Charles Pinckney, not only limited habeas's suspension, but also expressly created the writ. The final version, though, included only the former provision; when it was presented to the States for ratification, four States criticized the lack of an express habeas grant, and proposed alternatives resembling Pinckney's.

Shortly thereafter, the first Congress enacted the Judiciary Act of 1789, expressly granting Supreme Court justices and other federal judges the authority to grant the writ. If, as Specter suggests, the Constitution itself granted the writ, then such a statute would seem utterly superfluous.

Two decades later, in Ex Parte Bollman, Chief Justice John Marshall wrote for the Court that even if Congress "felt" a Constitutional "obligation" to provide for the writ, "the power to award the writ by any of the courts of the United States, must be given by written law." The writ would be available only where, "by any statute . . . the power to award a writ of habeas corpus . . . has been given to this court."

What, then was the value of the Suspension Clause under this theory of Framer intent? Theories vary but, as constitutional scholar (and no friend of the Bush administration) Erwin Chemerinsky noted in 1987 (emphasis added), William Duker's "authoritative" history of habeas "conclude[d] that the 'provision was designed to restrict Congress from suspending state habeas for federal prisoners.'"

None of this is to say that Specter is, in the end, certainly wrong. Specter's reading of the provision certainly enjoys as much--if not more--support than Gonzales's. Again, the Constitution's mention of the writ appears to imply its existence. Furthermore, in Federalist 84, Alexander Hamilton reassured his readers that the Constitution included the "establishment" of the writ, thereby suggesting that further statutory provision was unnecessary.

Justice Scalia appears to share Hamilton's view, writing in the 2004 Hamdi case that "[t]he writ of habeas corpus was preserved in the Constitution--the only common-law writ to be explicitly mentioned." The Supreme Court's four "war on terror" cases make clear that a majority of the Court shares Specter's view that the Constitution itself does create some basic level of habeas corpus protection for some or all prisoners.

Surely the issue is due to be debated for another 200 years. In the meantime, it's probably premature for either Specter or Gonzales to declare victory.

IMMEDIATELY BEFORE CLASHING over the terms of the Constitution, Specter and Gonzales debated the Supreme Court's 2004 decision in Rasul v. Bush, where the Court held that 18 U.S.C. s. 2241, the habeas corpus statute, extended the writ to foreigners held at Guantanamo (before Congress, responding in 2005, amended the statute).

DOJ_NMG_0121500

Gonzales disagreed with Specter's assertion that in Rasul the [word deleted] Court held that the Constitution--not merely the statute--created the habeas rights of Guantanamo prisoners. Gonzales suggested that Rasul was merely a statutory--not constitutional--interpretation.

Specter tartly replied, "[w]ell, you're not right about that. It's plain on its face they're talking about the constitutional right. . . . When did you last read the case?"

But if anyone needs to re-read the case, it's Specter. The Court went to great pains to make clear that it was merely interpreting the statute, and not the Constitution. And for good reason: To turn Rasul into a constitutional question, the Court would have had to overrule Eisentrager, the 1950 case in which the Court held that the Constitution's writ did not reach prisoners held outside the United States.

Persons detained outside [U.S. territory] no longer need rely on the Constitution as the source of their right to federal habeas review. . . . Eisentrager plainly does not preclude the exercise of [Section] 2241 jurisdiction over petitioners' claims.

This was no surprise to the litigants because, as Justice Scalia noted in his dissent, the prisoners agreed at oral argument that the case involved no Constitutional right. The briefs of the petitioners, Rasul and Al Odah, raised no constitutional arguments. Specter couldn't have been less correct.

The Hair-splitter In Chief (FWST)

By Linda P. Campbell

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, January 25, 2007

But loyalty to George W. Bush increasingly seems to be one -- at least in the way that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales reads the Constitution.

Even if you believe, as I do, that the Bush administration has upset the balance among the three branches of government by arrogating excessive authority to the executive branch, you can understand that the president's lawyers would zealously defend his power.

When Gonzales switched from White House counsel to attorney general, though, he presumably became the people's top lawyer, defender of our rights. Instead, he sounds all too often like the evader in chief, the astounder, the contradicter, the rationalizer extraordinaire.

Just last week, he told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that White House officials had discussed whether a secret wiretapping program unilaterally ordered by the president could be conducted under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which is supposed to govern that kind of information gathering.

Those discussions were had, Gonzales testified, because of "concerns raised" and "questions asked here in this committee." Odd that he should say that. Because he also has claimed that he started looking into bringing the wiretapping program under FISA as soon as he became AG in 2005, well before public disclosure of the program triggered alarms and questions from the Judiciary Committee.

But if that inconsistency eluded attention, his stubborn obtuseness about the Constitution did not.

Gonzales and Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, got into a did so/did not debate about whether the Supreme Court's 2004 ruling in Rasul v. Bush dealt with the statutory or constitutional right of habeas corpus.

(That's the right of accused persons to have the government justify holding them in custody. The Bush administration insisted that "enemy combatants" held at the Guantanamo Bay prison had no right to challenge their imprisonment -- until the Supreme Court said in Rasul that, indeed, they could get into federal court.)

Gonzales one-upped Specter by declaring that "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution. There's a prohibition against taking it away."

"Wait a minute," Specter replied. "The Constitution says you can't take it away except in cases of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus ... unless there's an invasion or rebellion?"

Gonzales just dug deeper: "The Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States, or every citizen, is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas. It doesn't say that. It simply says the right of habeas corpus shall not be suspended except. ..."

Later in the hearing, a perturbed Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., pointed out that many key rights in the Constitution are written in terms of not what people can do but what government can't ("Congress shall make no law ..."; "... the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.").

At that, Gonzales backtracked, calling habeas corpus "one of our most cherished rights" and demurring that he was "simply making an observation as to the literal language of the Constitution."

Well, the literal language in Article I, Section 9 is this: "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it."

And in the Rasul ruling, Justice John Paul Stevens recognized the long history and fundamental importance of the right: "Habeas corpus is, however, 'a writ antecedent to statute, ... throwing its root deep into the genius of our common law.' ... The writ appeared in English law several centuries ago, became 'an integral part of our common-law heritage' by the time the Colonies achieved independence, ... and received explicit recognition in the Constitution."

Gonzales was right that the court based its ruling on statutory law: The justices said that the law gives federal courts jurisdiction to hear the prisoners' claims of unlawful detention.

Well, we'll just get that written out of the law, the Bush administration countered -- and did, last year.

Maybe Gonzales' hard line stems from an honest belief in a stingy reading of the Constitution -- unless, of course, provisions dealing with presidential power are involved.

Maybe he sees nothing to lose from continued myopic allegiance to the president he has served since their Texas days -- though it's questionable how much sway Gonzales has anymore. Jan Crawford Greenburg writes in her new book, Supreme Conflict, that Gonzales tried, and obviously failed, to warn Bush away from nominating fellow Texan Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court.

With his own Supreme Court ambitions certainly dashed, maybe Gonzales considers it a badge of honor to be lampooned on Comedy Central's Colbert Report.

That might be good for late-night guffaws, but it's hardly the promising future he took to Washington with him.

Judge: Lawyer Leaked Padilla Transcripts (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, January 25, 2007

A lawyer for suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla violated a court order by leaking his wiretapped phone conversations, a judge found Wednesday while not imposing a penalty.

Instead, U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke ordered all defense lawyers in the case to sign papers indicating they understood and would follow rules barring disclosure of certain evidence.

Cooke also said she might hold in contempt anyone who receives such prohibited material, and she specifically mentioned several reporters attending Wednesday's hearing.

"The lash is about to fall on all," Cooke said. "We're going to have a trial, as much as possible as we can, a trial on the evidence, and not on anything else."

The leaked transcripts documented seven telephone conversations on which Padilla's voice is heard that were intercepted under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Defense lawyers have said that Padilla is never overheard discussing any violent acts and that many of the conversations involve family matters, casting doubt on the strength of the government's case.

The transcripts are not classified but were covered under Cooke's order barring disclosure.

Michael Caruso, one of three Miami-based public defenders on Padilla's defense team, acknowledged that one of them was responsible for providing the material to The New York Times, which published the story Jan. 4.

The leaker was identified in a sealed court filing to Cooke, but it was not made public and none of the lawyers would name the person responsible.

"This was a simple misunderstanding, an honest mistake, and it has been rectified," Caruso said. "Your honor can rest assured that this matter is at an end. There have been no further disclosures."

Prosecutors had wanted Cooke to begin a formal investigation of the disclosure.

"What was the point? It was clearly calculated to influence the jury of public opinion and try this case there," Assistant U.S. Attorney Brian Frazier said. "It was a deliberate violation."

The Times has declined to comment.

Padilla, 36, is accused along with two others of being part of a North American cell that provided cash, supplies and recruits to Islamic extremist causes worldwide. Padilla, a U.S. citizen, was accused after his 2002 arrest of being on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city, but those allegations are not part of the Miami case.

Padilla was held without charge for 3 1/2 years at a Navy brig after President Bush designated him as an enemy combatant. He was added to the Miami case in late 2005 amid an escalating legal battle over the president's powers to indefinitely detain Padilla and others during wartime.

Padilla and his co-defendants have pleaded not guilty. Trial is scheduled to begin April 16, and that could hinge on whether Padilla is found competent. His lawyers say he is suffering mental problems stemming from his long, isolated military confinement.

Georgian Sting Seizes Bomb Grade Uranium (AP)

By Desmond Butler

AP, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON - It was one of the most serious cases of smuggling of nuclear material in recent years: A Russian man, authorities allege, tried to sell a small amount of nuclear-bomb grade uranium in a plastic bag in his jacket pocket.

The buy that took place last summer, it turned out, was a setup by Republic of Georgia authorities, with the help of the CIA. Their quiet sting operation - neither U.S. nor Georgian officials have publicized it - is an unsettling reminder about the possibility of terrorists acquiring nuclear bomb-making material on the black market.

No evidence suggests this particular case was terrorist-related.

"Given the serious consequences of the detonation of an improvised nuclear explosive device, even small numbers of incidents involving HEU (highly enriched uranium) or plutonium are of very high concern," said Melissa Fleming of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency.

Details of the investigation, which also involved the FBI and Energy Department, were provided to The Associated Press by U.S. officials and Georgian Interior Minister Vano Merabishvili.

Authorities say they do not know how the man acquired the nuclear material or if his claims of access to much larger quantities were true. He and three Georgian accomplices are in Georgian custody and not cooperating with investigators.

Georgian attempts to trace the nuclear material since the arrest and confirm whether the man indeed had access to larger quantities have foundered from a lack of cooperation from Russia.

Merabishvili said he was revealing the story out of frustration with Russia's response and the need to illustrate the dangers of a breakdown in security cooperation in the region.

A message left with the press office of the Russian Embassy was not returned. A duty officer at the Russian Foreign Ministry told The Associated Press that there was no one authorized to comment Wednesday night.

Russia has tense relations with Georgia, like Russia a former Soviet republic. Georgia has been troubled by Russia's support for separatists in two breakaway Georgian border regions, Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

The sting was set up after Georgian authorities uncovered extensive smuggling networks while investigating criminal groups operating in the breakaway republics, Merabishvili said.

"When we sent buyers, the channels through Abkhazia and South Ossetia began to expand, and we started seeing a huge flow of materials," he said. "Sometimes it was low-grade enriched materials, but this was the first instance of highly enriched material."

According to his account, during an investigation in South Ossetia, a Georgian undercover agent posing as a rich foreign buyer made contact with the Russian seller in North Ossetia, which is part of Russia.

After the Russian offered to sell the sample, the agent rebuffed requests that the transaction occur in North Ossetia, insisting the Russian come to Tbilisi, the Georgian capital.

At a meeting in Tbilisi, the man pulled out from his pocket a plastic bag containing the material.

"He was offering this as the first stage in a deal and said he had other pieces, Merabishvili said. "We don't know if that was true."

Uranium has a low level of radioactive emission and can be transported more safely than other radioactive materials.

The man was arrested and sentenced to eight to 10 years in prison on smuggling charges. His accomplices were sentenced on lesser charges.

Russian authorities took a sample of the material but failed to offer any assistance despite requests for help from the Georgians, Merabishvili said.

"We were ready to provide all the information, but unfortunately no one arrived from Russia, not even to interview this person," Merabishvili said. "It is surprising because it is in Russian interests to secure these materials. There are terrorist organizations in Russia who would pay huge amounts of money for this."

The Georgians asked for U.S. assistance. Agents from the FBI and the Energy Department took the material back to the United States, where it was tested by the Energy Department's National Nuclear Security Administration.

"The material was analyzed by agency nuclear experts and confirmed to be highly enriched uranium," said Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the agency.

Fleming, of the IAEA, said the agency was aware of the Tbilisi seizure and was expecting formal notification from Georgia soon.

The CIA would not comment on the case, and the FBI confirmed its involvement in the investigation but nothing more.

Merabishvili, who was visiting Washington this week, said he did not have some details of the investigation, including the exact date the arrest was made or the full name of the suspect. Further efforts to clarify with the Georgian Embassy were not successful.

None of the U.S. officials would confirm the weight of the seizure or its quality, but Merabishvili said it was about 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of uranium enriched by more than 90 percent.

A nuclear bomb of a design similar to the one exploded over Hiroshima in 1945 would require about 50 kilograms (110 pounds) of uranium enriched at over 90 percent, according to Matthew Bunn, a senior research associate who focuses on nuclear theft and terrorism at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government. Bunn said that a more sophisticated implosion type nuclear bomb would require 15 to 18 kilograms (33 to 40 pounds).

According to an IAEA database, there have been 16 previous confirmed cases in which either highly enriched uranium or plutonium have been recovered by authorities since 1993.

In most cases the recoveries have involved smaller quantities than the Tbilisi case. But in 1994, 2.72 kilograms (6 pounds) of highly enriched uranium intended for sale were seized by police in the Czech Republic. In 2003, Georgian border guards using detection devices provided by the United States caught an Armenian man with about 170 grams (5 ounces) of HEU, according to the State Department.

Fleming said examples of stolen or missing bomb-grade nuclear material, including highly enriched uranium and plutonium, are rare and troubling.

David Albright, a former U.N. weapons inspector and head of the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security, said that lacking help from Russia, the CIA may be looking to other allies to help identify who has access to lost nuclear material.

"Russian cooperation in answering these questions is critical, but it has not been forthcoming," he said. "One way to identify who is active in trading these materials is to conduct sting operations."

Georgia Says It Blocked Smuggling Of Arms-Grade Uranium (NYT)

By Lawrence Scott Sheets And William J. Broad

TBILISI, Georgia, Jan. 24 — Georgian authorities intercepted an illicit shipment of highly enriched uranium last January, the second seizure of weapons-grade material here in two and a half years, officials here say.

The interior minister, Ivane Merabishvili, said in a recent interview that agents had arrested a Russian man carrying 100 grams of uranium, a little under four ounces, into Georgia from Russia. The authorities had previously reported that they had arrested a man in 2003 trying to cross the border between Georgia and Armenia with 170 grams of uranium.

Although nuclear experts said neither episode involved enough material to build a nuclear weapon, the two seizures raised concerns about illicit trade in material from the nuclear operations of the former Soviet Union. These cases are believed to be the first involving smuggling of highly enriched uranium in the region in at least five years.

Russian officials did not respond to requests for comment.

This activity “in the worst-case scenario could be very detrimental to international security,” said John F. Tefft, the American ambassador to Georgia. Georgia and the United States have focused on detecting smuggling of radioactive materials across the borders of former Soviet republics like Russia and Armenia.

The 2006 smuggling case, which has not been previously reported, is expected to be noted in a report from the United Nations International Atomic Energy Agency on illicit nuclear activities, agency officials said. That report is expected to be released this week.

Georgian and American officials said United States law enforcement and nuclear experts had been involved in the investigation of the second seizure. Richard J. Kolko, an F.B.I. spokesman, confirmed that the bureau had taken part in the inquiry but declined to elaborate.

In addition to the two cases involving enriched uranium, Mr. Merabishvili said, Georgian authorities intercepted an illicit shipment of raw uranium, or yellowcake, in August 2006.

That case involved 2.2 pounds of raw uranium that the authorities said was being smuggled from the separatist region of Abkhazia. One man was arrested, said Archil Pavlenishvili, Georgia’s chief investigator for nuclear trafficking.

He said that agents had learned about the raw uranium from sources in the criminal underworld and that the investigation was continuing.

The Georgian officials said they believed that corrupt law enforcement officials in Abkhazia had helped ensure the safe passage of the shipment. Officials in Abkhazia said they had not been informed about the arrest, but they promised to assist in any investigation.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Pleads Not Guilty To Running Over People In UNC Attack (AP)

AP, January 25, 2007

HILLSBOROUGH, N.C. -- A man accused of trying to kill students at the University of North Carolina by driving through campus in an attack he said was intended to avenge the treatment of Muslims by the United States pleaded not guilty Wednesday.

Mohammed Taheri-Azar, 23, said three weeks ago that he wanted his case to conclude as soon as possible and had said previously he intended to plead guilty to the charges stemming from the attack in March.

James Williams, Taheri-Azar's court-appointed lawyer, declined to discuss specifics about the case. But when asked after the brief hearing why his client pleaded not guilty, he said only, "That's a very good question."

Taheri-Azar, an Iranian native who grew up in Charlotte, faces nine counts of attempted first degree murder and another nine counts of felony assault.

Nobody was seriously injured in the March incident, when investigators say Taheri-Azar, a UNC Chapel Hill graduate, drove a rented SUV through a popular campus gathering spot, hitting nine people. Minutes after the attack, Taheri-Azar called 911 to surrender.

During the 911 call, Taheri-Azar told an emergency dispatcher he wanted to "punish the government of the United States for their actions around the world." He later told investigators he intentionally rampaged through campus to "avenge the deaths of Muslims around the world."

Taheri-azar also sent dozens of letters to local media organizations. Orange County District Attorney Jim Woodall said Wednesday he may ask some of the reporters who received letters to testify in the case.

"The issue is not confidentiality," Woodall said. "The media is still just a witness if you do something publicly."

Taheri-Azar said last June that he planned to plead guilty and wanted to represent himself. He has since accepted Williams as his public defender.

Taheri-Azar is now in Raleigh's Central Prison with bond set at $5.5 million. He is due to return to court for a motions hearing March 27.

Screening Provisions Unlikely To Survive (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin

AP, January 25, 2007

House-passed requirements for intensified screening of cargo on passenger aircraft and ship-borne goods heading toward the U.S. are unlikely to survive in the Senate, a House leader on security issues conceded Wednesday.

The provisions were part of a House bill that was ballyhooed as the first legislation to pass in the Democratic-controlled Congress this year. Approval was meant to signal the new leadership's priorities in pushing through security recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee, told reporters that two key provisions of the House bill are unlikely to make it through the Senate.

"With the exception of ports and cargo screening," he said, "everything else should go through."

In addition to the cargo-screening measures, the House bill provided funds to improve emergency communications systems, make it harder for terrorists to obtain nuclear weapons, and improve information-sharing between federal, state and local agencies.

Thompson said his staff has heard from Senate staff members about what's realistic to expect as the Senate considers the House-passed homeland security bill. It is uncertain when the Senate will begin considering its version of the measure.

The Bush administration and other opponents of the two screening proposals have said the technology does not exist to scan all U.S.-bound cargo in foreign ports for radiation, and all air cargo loaded onto passenger planes for explosives.

Critics have further complained that implementing the measures would slow global commerce to a crawl.

Homeland Security Department officials contend that through a variety of methods, they now screen all high-risk cargo, but only a small percentage is actually physically inspected.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, believes his panel's bill "will be compatible with the goals and spirit of the House bill," Lieberman spokeswoman Leslie Phillips said in a statement.

Thompson also indicated to reporters that the Senate may balk at the percentage of homeland security grants guaranteed to states as a bare minimum, before any consideration is given to the risk of a terrorist attack.

In the House bill, that percentage was agreed to as 0.25 percent. Thompson said the figure might go up to 0.50 or 0.75.

Since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration and the House have generally supported spending more money based on risk. The Senate, where many leaders come from smaller or rural states, have been more inclined to support traditional funding formulas that guarantee some share of the pot to all, irrespective of risk.

Thompson also indicated he hopes that by the mid-March anniversary of the Madrid, Spain, train bombing of 2004, his committee will be able to introduce legislation in the House to provide rail security grant funding.

"We clearly do not do nearly enough to secure passenger-rail traffic," he said.

Meanwhile, a Government Accountability Office report on progress made since the Sept. 11 attacks found potential weaknesses in the handling of radioactive materials.

During an undercover test, a small amount of radioactive material was carried across the border by GAO investigators with phony documents. GAO is Congress' investigative arm.

Even though the radiation monitors properly signaled the presence of radioactive material, the investigators were able to enter the U.S. because of fake documents that customs inspectors failed to check for authenticity.

Bill Would Raise Taxes To Fund Security (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Legislation proposed by a key Democrat this week would raise taxes to fund billions in new Homeland Security spending on more police officers, interoperable communications equipment and 100 percent screening of cargo entering the United States.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said by rolling back President Bush's tax cuts that up to $50 billion could be generated over five years for security improvements.

"To protect our homeland, we have to radically reorder our priorities," said Mr. Biden, who did not specify which tax cut would be eliminated, only that it affected people who make more than $1 million a year.

Mr. Biden's Homeland Security Act of 2007 calls for "scanning" 100 percent of cargo containers, development of new "screening" technology and the hiring of 50,000 new police officers and 1,000 FBI agents.

"This is all about setting the right priorities for America. Instead of giving a tax cut to the richest Americans who don't need it, we should be focusing on the security of all Americans," Mr. Biden said.

Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and ranking member of the House Homeland Security Committee, called the bill a "gimmick."

"Money is not the only issue; the fact is many cities have not come up with real plans to make it work. He's creating a false problem," Mr. King said. "He is making a class warfare argument to raise money on an issue without any knowledge of the issue."

The Homeland Security Department has allocated $2.9 billion for interoperable communications efforts, but hundreds of cities have yet to agree on which system they want to use.

As chairman of the committee last year, Mr. King passed legislation to address port security, which already requires 100 percent cargo screening through manifest checks and other procedures put in place by the Coast Guard at ports overseas.

"We want to scan it or X-ray it overseas before it reaches our ports, where it can blow up," Mr. King said.

More than $60 million from the Homeland Security Department and the Energy Department has been set aside to install radiation portal monitors at U.S. ports.

Since 2004, $10 billion has been spent on port security.

Lockheed Chosen For ID Contract (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The Transportation Security Administration has decided to award a closely watched contract to supply high-tech identification cards at ports nationwide to Lockheed Martin of Bethesda, according to sources familiar with the choice.

The initial value of the contract, which involves issuing ID cards to 850,000 maritime workers, was estimated at $70 million. The contract could prove far more valuable, however, if it leads to other, related deals for the firm: Identity technology is a fast-growing sector for government contractors, and the Transportation Worker Identification Credential, known as TWIC, is the first of many identity contracts slated to be announced in the next few years.

The program, a key element of the government's attempts to secure the nation's ports, was initially supposed to provide transportation workers with ID cards embedded with microchips by the end of 2003. But it has been bogged down with technology glitches and privacy concerns, and now Lockheed will have 18 months to finish rolling out its cards.

Darrin Kayser, a TSA spokesman, would not confirm yesterday that the agency had made its decision but indicated that an announcement is imminent. "It is fundamental to our nation's security that individuals who pose a security threat do not gain access to our nation's ports," Kayser said. "The TWIC contract, which will be awarded in the coming days, allows us to move forward and begin enrollment at selected ports in March."

A spokeswoman for Lockheed Martin, Leslie Holoweiko, referred all questions to the TSA, as did other competitors for the contract. "We haven't heard anything yet," she said.

However, multiple sources familiar with the decision, who spoke on condition of anonymity because it had not been made public, said Lockheed is the winner.

The company, which is the Defense Department's biggest contractor, beat out a relatively large field of competitors to win the work. The TSA had narrowed the competition late last year to eight finalists.

Among the finalists was BearingPoint of McLean, which had held the contract to run a prototype program. This is the second time in three months that BearingPoint has been disappointed on an identity contract. In November, the General Services Administration opted to rebid a deal to supply federal employees with new ID cards rather than renew a contract it had awarded to BearingPoint just two months earlier.

The new security card program is likely to come under scrutiny from Congress.

"History tells us that large security programs emanating from the Department of Homeland Security have a tendency to be fraught with waste and poor management," said Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, in a statement. "Important security initiatives like TWIC provide no room for error."

Edward Wytkind, president of the AFL-CIO's Transportation Trades Department, said labor unions worry the government will require that workers foot the bill for new credentials, which some have estimated will cost $150 per ID. "The technology issues are still being reconciled," Wytkind said. "So for us, it's a $150 tax on our members with no real measurable security results."

New Orleans Looks Beyond State Of The Union Snub (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — Mayor C. Ray Nagin is way beyond caring whether President Bush mentioned New Orleans in his State of the Union address Tuesday night.

"We're 18 months into this thing. I'm tired of complaining and bellyaching," Nagin said Wednesday when asked about the speech at a news conference.

The city continues its struggle to recover from Hurricane Katrina, which pummeled New Orleans in August 2005, and some observers thought the absence of Katrina recovery from Bush's speech was telling.

Nagin was unfazed. "We're going to take whatever nickels we have, whatever pennies we have, whatever dollars we have, and we're going to stretch it, and we're going to make this recovery work," he said.

The mayor made his remarks as he announced a two-year pilot program that would offer loans — interest-free for six months — to homeowners waiting to receive aid from the sluggish Road Home recovery initiative, a state program that distributes federal funds. Almost 101,700 families have applied to the program, but as of Monday, money had been made available to 258.

City officials and residents are frustrated by the slow pace; many homeowners doubt they will ever receive Road Home assistance.

Other Louisiana lawmakers and residents took exception to the omission of the state's continued plight from Bush's speech, which focused on Iraq and domestic issues such as healthcare reform and energy consumption.

"Last year we were disappointed that the administration mentioned Katrina almost as an afterthought," Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), said in a phone interview. "This year … we are shocked that there was no mention at all of it, as if the problem has been solved, or simply gone away."

Also Wednesday, Jefferson and other Louisiana lawmakers introduced a bill that would allow the federal government to forgive loans made to local governments after disasters.

"I guess the pain of the hurricane is yesterday's news in Washington," Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco told a news conference in New Orleans, according to the Associated Press.

"But for us, it's still very real, very real, and it's something that we live with every single day."

Nagin's "gap-loan" plan — which is funded by $11 million in federal grants and will be administered by Chase and Liberty Banks — will initially allow up to 1,000 homeowners who lived in Orleans Parish when Katrina hit to borrow up to $50,000, interest-free for six months, while waiting for Road Home grants. The fund would gradually be replenished as homeowners received Road Home grants and paid off their loans, Nagin said.

Among the eligibility requirements, loan applicants must agree to live in their renovated home for at least three years after it has been repaired.

La. Gov.: Bush Forgetting Katrina (AP)

By Cain Burdeau

AP, January 25, 2007

Gov. Kathleen Blanco angrily criticized President Bush on Wednesday for not mentioning 2005's destructive hurricanes in his State of the Union speech, and said Louisiana is being shortchanged in federal recovery funding for political reasons.

"I guess the pains of the hurricane are yesterday's news in Washington," Blanco said.

"But for us it's still very real, very real, and it's something that we live every single day," the governor said. "But we will continue to fight, and we will continue to come on, and we will effect a recovery."

Mayor Ray Nagin echoed Blanco's disappointment at Bush's omission of New Orleans' recovery from Hurricane Katrina, but he cautioned against reopening political rifts that developed after the storm.

"We're 18 months into this thing. I'm tired of complaining and bellyaching," the mayor said. "We're going to take whatever nickels we have, whatever pennies we have, whatever dollars we have, and we're going to stretch it, and we're going to make this recovery work."

The White House had no immediate comment on Blanco's remarks.

Blanco accused the White House of repeatedly delivering less money than Louisiana has needed to repair the damage to housing, schools and hospitals. She said Mississippi has received much more help.

"I just want an end to the disparities, once and for all," the governor said.

She said Louisiana's unfair treatment set the state's recovery back by six months.

Big Easy Makes Way For New Recovery Czar (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2007

NEW ORLEANS

Ed Blakely, the planning guru hired to steer New Orleans out of its muddle, is like the Forrest Gump of disaster recovery.

California earthquake? There he is, amid wrecked interstates. Tsunami? That's him touring rebuilt villages. Terror attacks in Manhattan? When the dust settles, the distinguished-looking African-American man is at the center of a phalanx of planners. His arrival in New Orleans two weeks ago as the city's new recovery czar may be the biggest challenge for the "master of post-disaster," as his hometown paper, the Los Angeles Times, calls him.

Though largely unknown outside the circle of urban planners, Mr. Blakely is becoming a household name in New Orleans. Nearly 18 months after the storms, returnees have slowed to a trickle, the city is borrowing truckloads of money it has little hope of repaying, and actual recovery dollars from Congress have tightened from promises of billions to less than $10 million received.

What happens in the next year under Blakely's tutelage, experts say, will affect the city for decades to come.

"All of us are saying that this is a big one to take on, and it'll be either the culmination of his career or it's going to be a disaster," says Juliann Allison, associate director of the Edward J. Blakely Center for Sustainable Suburban Development in Riverside, Calif.

Brusque, yet funny, Blakely is one of the most effective planners in America today, his friends say. He's hypereducated with both an MBA and a PhD. Coming from a poor background in San Bernardino, Calif., Blakely went on to make enough money as a developer by age 30 to be able to retire. Blakely is known for balancing economic, environmental, and social interests in projects, including the "green" village of Dos Lagos in Corona, Calif., according to his friend, L.A. developer Ali Sahabi.

Civic duty drives the former college football star, who once lost a race for mayor to former California Gov. Jerry Brown in Oakland. "It's like the old adage about the fire horse: When there's a fire, he wants to get going," says Robert Yaro, president of the Regional Plan Association in New York, who came to know Blakely during the 9/11 recovery effort. "[New Orleans] is clearly the biggest planning challenge in America right now. Ed ... doesn't inspire a lot of warm huggies. But he has a remarkable ability to pull people together, to inspire confidence, grit, and determination."

Blakely's plans in New Orleans are straightforward: Encourage a smaller, more dense city by offering landowners in wrecked neighborhoods the opportunity to swap their land for lots on higher ground. Get pilot projects launched by summer. Build community centers. Begin to generate private investment. Last week, the new recovery czar led a delegation to Wall Street and was "warmly received" by bankers.

Blakely will conduct "charettes," or public planning sessions, with neighborhoods, but won't have meetings behind closed doors, he says. And as he always does when he arrives in a new city, he will "buy a bike for a few hundred bucks and ride around, talking to the cab drivers, garbage men, and even the prostitutes," he says, to get an unvarnished look around.

"The planning job here is relatively easy," says Blakely in a phone interview, "because the city pretty much shows you how to plan it. But what's happened is fragmentary leadership and ad hoc [planning] well before Katrina killed the opportunity structure. It has lost its structural identity and that's what has to be restored. This city has great bones, but you forget that she had a great face."

So what should be done now? "We have to go to scale – I have to start building 1,000 houses a day," he says.

Since hurricane Katrina bowled over the Gulf Coast and sunk most of New Orleans under the surface of Lake Pontchartrain, recovery is piecemeal, contested and, some say, myopic. Only half the residents of New Orleans, perhaps 200,000, have returned.

Much of the problem lies with sunken neighborhoods, where pockets of people have come back to a rotting wasteland of homes from Gentilly Woods to the Lower Ninth Ward. Plans to discourage people from returning to the lowest-lying areas failed after Mayor Ray Nagin put forth a "laissez-faire" rebuilding effort in his campaign for reelection last year. The concept was to leave things alone for a year and see which neighborhoods came back and which didn't. But the city is growing restive.

Elvira Robertson is one of the 20 percent of people who returned to Pontchartrain Park, the city's first black suburban-style subdivision. It was soaked by breaches in both the London Canal and Industrial Canal after Katrina hit. Now, in the middle of a residential wasteland, she has created an oasis of green lawn and flowers, a feeble attempt to not only create normalcy but also urge others to return. "We need people; we need a lot of people," she says.

Her frustration is widespread, observers say. "New Orleans has lacked leadership on these issues. People have had it with the let's see what happens, and let's muddle through approach," says Mr. Yaro.

It's the kind postdisaster malaise that Blakely handled in New York. As part of the Civic Alliance, he envisioned a Lower Manhattan as a better place than it was before 9/11. Similarly, Katrina has given New Orleans an opportunity to become a wealthier and less provincial city, experts say.

From rebuilding housing to establishing services, Blakely can help "to bring the public and private sectors together, to leverage resources and to paint a vision of hope for the future that's realistic and uplifting," says Sen. Mary Landrieu (D) of Louisiana, in an e-mail.

But unlike in New York after 9/11, there is no "unified politics" behind New Orleans's struggle. Divisiveness still rules at City Hall, a situation that will test Blakely's skills, critics say.

"He's just an appointee; he's not the mayor," says John McIlwain, of the Urban Land Institute in Washington. "As smart as he is, he's not smarter than the hundreds of planners who have been talking about this. Ed can give the right recommendations, but will the city back him up? Nobody knows."

"We'll be watching him very closely," says Mary Louise Johnson, one of the returnees to Pontachartrain Park. "Right now, he's our best hope."

Flood Coverage Tough To Enforce (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, January 25, 2007

Nearly a year and a half after Hurricane Katrina, federally regulated lenders are still struggling to comply with a requirement that they force homeowners in high-risk flood zones to buy flood insurance.

By law, homeowners in flood-prone areas — such as along the coast — must buy such a policy if they get a mortgage from a federally regulated lender. Government-issued flood insurance covers homeowners for up to $250,000 in flood damage to property and $100,000 to contents. (Unlike homeowners insurance, though, it doesn't insure against rain or wind damage.)

Katrina raised awareness of the need for flood insurance. While lenders and regulators have made progress in requiring homeowners to buy polices, "We're still not there yet," says David Maurstad, an insurance administrator at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which oversees the flood-insurance program.

One problem: Some homeowners who buy a flood insurance policy drop it later. Lenders "do a fairly good job of finding out whether someone is in a flood plain, but they don't do as good a job of tracking if you lose (flood insurance)," says J. Robert Hunter, director of insurance at the Consumer Federation of America.

After Katrina, critics blamed banks' sometimes lax enforcement of the flood-insurance rule for homeowners' inability to recoup losses. Vicki Vidal of the Mortgage Bankers Association argues, though, that "lenders who are required to mandate flood insurance as a condition of making loans are doing so."

Still, last year, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., which regulates lenders, fined banks $297,815 for flood-insurance violations, an 82% increase from 2005. Other regulators, such as the Office of Thrift Supervision and the Federal Reserve, levied fewer fines on banks last year than in 2005. Yet, "the (lower) numbers probably show that … if anything, the hurricanes significantly raised awareness for institutions" about the need for flood insurance, says Kevin Petrasic, an OTS spokesman.

Getting homeowners to buy flood insurance "sounds easy, and it should be, but you're dealing with customers, and some of them don't understand that they have to have it," says James Clayton, chairman of Planters Bank and Trust in Indianola, Miss.

Some lenders are changing their computer systems to more closely track flood insurance sales. United Bank of Parkersburg, W.Va., says it did so last year to make it easier to determine whether homeowners had flood insurance on second as well as first mortgages.

Others are taking advantage of a provision in the law that lets them expand their flood-insurance requirement. Eureka Homestead, of Metairie, La., now requires that all homeowners below Interstate 12 — north of New Orleans — get this policy. That includes homes outside flood-prone zones.

As banks increasingly enforce the flood insurance requirement, affected homeowners will have to pay more to insure their homes. But, "The fact that it's more expensive to buy an unsafe house is not necessarily a bad thing," Hunter says. "It's a way of warning a buyer, 'This house has risk.' "

WAR NEWS:

Biden Seeks Wider Support For Measure Against 'Surge' (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved a nonbinding resolution that challenges President Bush's Iraq policy and will provoke a major floor debate next week, when Democrats hope to get more Republicans to buck the administration.

The 12-9 committee vote gives Chairman Joseph Biden (D., Del.) a solid foothold from which to begin talks with Republicans who share his concern about sending more U.S. troops to try to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Chief among these is Sen. John Warner (R., Va.), former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who last evening introduced an alternative resolution also challenging the increased commitment of 21,500 troops. Merging the two to achieve a larger consensus is the Democrats' goal and the quickest route may be to embrace much of Mr. Warner's proposal with some changes.

"It's pretty good, but it's not perfect," said Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.).

Mr. Reid will play an increasing role with Mr. Biden in trying to reach some common ground, but he must walk a fine line. The new Senate majority is quickly learning what a rocky road it can be en route to building the bipartisan relationships it promised to nurture.

Among the 10 Republicans on Foreign Relations, only Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel supported the committee resolution, for example. And the vote followed a 54-43 roll call on the Senate floor in which just five Republican senators joined an effort to bring to a vote a House-passed bill raising the federal minimum wage.

Just as Republicans appeared wary of challenging the president following his State of the Union address, Democrats faced criticism for being too intent on having their way.

Regarding the minimum-wage bill, for example, Republicans complained that Mr. Reid was backtracking on promises to couple $8 billion of tax breaks with the measure, which would gradually raise the minimum wage $2.10 an hour over the next two years. Yesterday's vote makes it almost certain such a bill will now emerge from the Senate, but Minority Leader Mitch

McConnell (R., Ky.) complained that it is "somewhat hypocritical" for Democrats to argue "that we ought to have a bipartisan package and then vote to eliminate it."

As for Iraq, the Biden-Hagel alliance was crucial to jump-starting the Senate debate, but the White House hopes to keep Mr. Warner out of any talks that could lead to the strongest slap yet by Congress of the president's Iraq policy.

"I'm a free man," Virginia's senior senator said in an interview yesterday, but he is cautious about negotiations. "At the moment I see no basis for me to alter it," he said, and Republican moderates will defer to his judgment. "John Warner is going to set the strategy," said Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine.)

In an interview with CNN, Vice President Cheney was dismissive of the Senate debate, saying Mr. Bush "has made his decision...We need to get the job done."

Mr. Cheney's attitude could compound Democratic fears already that Mr. Warner's resolution is too deferential to the president in its tone. And if the Virginian becomes a one-man standard of what's "bipartisan" he could insist on conditions that make it harder for Mr. Reid to hold onto his liberal members.

Nonetheless the Republican's proposal actually goes further than Mr. Biden on military matters -- even addressing the rules of engagement for U.S troops in Iraq. And the administration also can't ignore the growing skepticism among Foreign Relations panelists who stood with the president yesterday.

Indiana Sen. Richard Lugar, the ranking Republican, said some of the assumptions in the president's plan were "dubious." And on a 13-8 vote, the panel rejected an effort to add language committing the Senate to never cut off funds for the war.

"It is an inverted political logic for people to basically say that we have to continue doing this for the good of the troops," said Sen. James Webb (D., Va.). "We are not continuing this war for the troops. The troops are fighting this war on our behalf because we are continuing it."

Bush Iraq Plan Is Condemned By Senate Panel (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — One day after President Bush implored Congress to give his Iraq strategy a chance to succeed, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved a resolution on Wednesday denouncing the plan to send more troops to Baghdad, setting up the most direct confrontation over the war since it began nearly four years ago.

The full Senate is poised to consider the nonbinding, yet strongly symbolic, repudiation of Mr. Bush as early as Wednesday. Democratic leaders agreed to tone down the language in the resolution, hoping to make it more acceptable to Republicans in an effort to send a strong, bipartisan rebuke to the White House.

“This is not designed to say, ‘Mr. President, ah-ha, you’re wrong,’ ” said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., a Delaware Democrat and chairman of the committee. “This is designed to say, ‘Mr. President, please don’t go do this.’ ”

Even as the White House delicately worked to persuade some Republicans to consider the president’s approach, the administration also said Congressional action would not interrupt the plan to send more than 20,000 American troops to Iraq. In a television interview on CNN, Vice President Dick Cheney declared, “It won’t stop us.”

The Foreign Relations Committee approved the resolution by a vote of 12 to 9, with a Republican senator, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, joining 11 Democrats in supporting it. But even Republicans who opposed the resolution, including Senator Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, expressed deep doubt about whether the troop increase could succeed and suggested it was time for a new direction.

The committee rejected amendments that would have strengthened or softened the resolution, which described Mr. Bush’s plan to increase troops as contrary to the national interest.

Some Republicans expressed reluctance to support the legislation because they feared it could be seen as a political attack on Mr. Bush, but left themselves open to backing a similar plan offered by Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican.

The Foreign Relations Committee tends to carry a more centrist outlook than the Senate as a whole, but Democrats say they believe that at least 8 of the 49 Republicans might join with nearly all Democrats in embracing a resolution — Mr. Biden’s or Mr. Warner’s — critical of the president’s troop increase plan.

Senator George V. Voinovich, an Ohio Republican, said he was disappointed that the administration had failed to extend an olive branch to Congress. He said he told a White House official at the State of the Union address on Tuesday that the stalemate in Iraq was threatening to consume the Bush presidency.

“It’s time to recognize that if you keep going the way you are, you are never going to achieve what you want to achieve,” Mr. Voinovich said. “And, beyond that, it’s going to fall over on your domestic initiatives and make your presidency uneventful and not have meaning.”

Hours after the hearing on Wednesday, the effort led by Mr. Warner was gaining ground, with six Democrats and three other Republicans signing on as co-sponsors of his proposal, which also bluntly opposes sending more troops to Iraq. Mr. Warner was declining offers from Democratic leaders to merge his proposal with theirs, saying he wanted to keep his plan as neutral as possible, so it could attract wide bipartisan support. “It’s not a question of who is the most patriotic or who is trying to set up a confrontation with the president,” Mr. Warner said, speaking from the floor of the Senate. “To have a vote all on one side or all on the other side will not help.”

While details of the two resolutions vary somewhat, their message is the same: many members of Congress do not support the plan to expand the military operation in Iraq.

The White House is shying away from an overt lobbying effort to thwart the Iraq resolutions, as it might do more harm than good. Instead, the administration is leaving it mainly to the Republican leadership, including the Senate Republican leader, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, and the Republican whip, Trent Lott of Mississippi, to work toward an alternative.

Still, the White House has sought to head off overwhelming votes against the president in both the Senate and the House. Since Mr. Bush delivered his Iraq speech on Jan. 10, the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, and his deputy, J. D. Crouch, have met with members of both parties. Officials, aware that a majority of senators are likely to vote in favor of the Warner resolution, say those meetings will continue. But the remarks by Mr. Cheney on Wednesday suggested that the White House was not focused on the resolutions. “We are moving forward,” Mr. Cheney said in the CNN interview. “The Congress has control over the purse strings. They have the right, obviously, if they want, to cut off funding. But in terms of this effort, the president has made his decision.”

A preview of next week’s full debate on Iraq unfolded Wednesday in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, with senator after senator recounting the stories of troops from their states who had died in Iraq. Under the new Democratic majority, the committee has held nearly daily hearings on Iraq.

Senator James Webb, a Virginia Democrat who fought as a marine in Vietnam, urged his colleagues not to draw a link between the Iraq and Vietnam wars. Such comparisons, he feared, could force people away from backing the Iraq resolutions.

“I think there are parallels and there were many people at this table who opposed the Vietnam War, but some of those parallels are superficial,” Mr. Webb said. “We’re losing the support of a lot of people who supported the Vietnam War and who have problems with this if we try to lump it together.”

Mr. Hagel, who also served in Vietnam, has derided the president’s Iraq strategy as the worst foreign policy since Vietnam. Yet on Wednesday, Mr. Hagel took a different approach as he addressed fellow Republicans — from the administration or the Congress — who have questioned the motives of those who have spoken critically of the war.

“I think all 100 senators ought to be on the line on this. What do you believe? What are you willing to support? What do you think? Why were you elected?” Mr. Hagel said, his voice booming. “If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes.”

Bush Rebuke Advances (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Senate Democrats rebuked President Bush yesterday over his handling of the war in Iraq with a rare wartime vote condemning the commander in chief's plan to add troops to the battlefield.

"Our resolution of disapproval is not -- I emphasize not -- an attempt to embarrass the president. It is not an attempt to demonstrate isolation," Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said before his panel declared Mr. Bush's proposal as "not in the national interest."

"It's an attempt to save the president from making a significant mistake with regard to our policy in Iraq," Mr. Biden said.

Hours after the 12-9 vote, which fell nearly along party lines, Sen. John W. Warner went to the Senate floor and offered his own amendment condemning Mr. Bush's "surge" proposal. The Virginia Republican said his nonbinding resolution is less politically combative than the Biden resolution and has the support of three fellow Republicans and six Democrats.

"We have put a greater emphasis on urging the president to consider other options, given that we have a general disagreement with the very significant level of troops that are specifically set forth in the president's plan," Mr. Warner said. The Warner proposal was offered as a substitute for Mr. Biden's.

Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska was the only one of the panel's 10 Republicans to join all 11 Democrats in favor of the nonbinding Biden resolution.

Mr. Hagel, Mr. Biden and three other committee members supporting the resolution yesterday were among those who voted on Oct. 11, 2002, to authorize the war in Iraq. The others were Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts, Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Bill Nelson of Florida, all Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0121512

"Most of our colleagues understand this is a mistake," said Mr. Kerry, who as a soldier returned from Vietnam to protest the war and testify before Congress about atrocities he said were committed by fellow Americans.

"I asked the question in 1971: How do you ask a man to be the last man to die for a mistake?" he said yesterday on the Senate floor. "I never thought that I would be reliving the need to ask that question again. We are there."

Sen. Richard G. Lugar, Indiana Republican, warned that the resolution could demoralize the troops and embolden insurgents in Iraq.

"Usually, nonbinding resolutions are designed to show unity on an issue or to highlight an issue that few members know about," he told his colleagues. "In this case, we are laying open our disunity without the prospect that the vehicle will achieve meaningful changes in our policy. This vote will force nothing on the president, but it will confirm to our friends and allies that we are divided and in disarray."

Mr. Hagel disagreed. "This is not a defeatist resolution," he said. "This is not a cut-and-run resolution. We are not talking about cutting off funds."

Mr. Kerry was more resigned. "We all want success," he said, but "we can't achieve the kind of clean and simple victory that the administration promised."

Mr. Hagel, who is considering a run for the White House, was among the most vociferous critics of the Bush administration.

"There is no strategy," he said. "This is a pingpong game with American lives. These young men and women that we put in Anbar province, in Iraq, in Baghdad are not beans. They're real lives. And we better be damn sure we know what we're doing, all of us, before we put 22,000 more Americans into that grinder."

Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, said she was relieved to have voted against the war in 2002.

"I thank God I voted the way I did: against it," she said. "I thank God every single time I sign a letter to the families who have lost a loved one. And unfortunately, in California, we have lost the most."

Democrats offered few specifics about how to proceed. Mr. Kerry urged more diplomacy, which he compared to riding a bicycle.

"As long as you're riding, even if you're going around in circles, you're OK. You don't fall off," he said, citing an analogy by former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright. "But if you stop riding, you fall off."

Sen. John E. Sununu, New Hampshire Republican, echoing a word often used on the subject, warned against "micromanaging" the war.

Earlier this month on NBC's "Meet the Press," Mr. Biden said, "I think it is unconstitutional to say, 'We're going to tell you you can go, but we're going to micromanage the war.' "

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat and a panel member who has begun a presidential exploratory committee, said in November 2005: "I have neither the expertise nor the inclination to micromanage war from Washington."

Political evolution on the war has emerged elsewhere.

Mr. Kerry, appearing on "Meet the Press" in 2004, said: "I believe the following very deeply. No. 1, we cannot fail. I've said that many times. And if it requires more troops in order to create the stability that eliminates the chaos, that can provide the groundwork for other countries, that's what we have to do."

Mr. Biden said the resolution will not be the final word on the war.

"I assure you -- and I know you know this -- oversight will be consistent, maybe even daily," he told members of his committee. "And we will have not only the hearings you had, but we will have continuous hearings on this issue."

Senators Say 'No' On Bush Iraq Plan (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — The stage is set for a dramatic debate in the Senate next week on President Bush's Iraq war policy following a vote of no-confidence Wednesday by a key committee.

"All 100 senators should be on the line on this," said Sen. Chuck Hagel, a Nebraska Republican who co-sponsored a resolution opposing the president's planned increase in troop levels. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes."

Hagel's resolution, which he wrote with two ranking Democrats, declares Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Baghdad and Anbar province "not in the national interest."

Congressional efforts to redirect military policy are not unprecedented. The House and Senate voted to remove U.S. troops from Somalia in 1993, Haiti in 1994 and Bosnia in 1997.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee vote was 12-9, with Hagel the only Republican in favor. Indications are the floor vote may be more bipartisan:

DOJ_NMG_0121513

·Hours after the Foreign Relations Committee voted, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the top-ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, introduced a resolution that calls on Bush to reduce troop levels; Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Gordon Smith of Oregon are co-sponsors.

·The four-hour committee debate produced far more consensus than the roll call indicated, exposing deep misgivings in both parties about Bush's plans.

Only Sen. David Vitter, R-La., said he backed the president's policy. He said he is doing so "as a final attempt" to bring stability in Iraq. Other Republicans who opposed the resolution made it plain their vote should not be interpreted as support for Bush's plan.

"I'm more skeptical about what we're doing than I have ever been," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio. Coleman called it a "bad idea" to send more troops to Baghdad. "Iraq is a mess," he said.

Sen. Bob Corker, R-Tenn., said that while he opposed the largely symbolic "sense of the Senate" measure, he's reserving the option to vote for a binding resolution to change direction in Iraq.

A number of alternatives are likely to be offered during the Senate debate, including Warner's, which urges Bush to reduce force levels in Iraq. Possible proposals run the gamut from capping troop strength in Iraq at the current levels to mandating a phased withdrawal.

In an interview with CNN on Wednesday, Vice President Cheney called a suggestion that some Republicans had lost faith in the administration because of blunders in Iraq "hogwash." He said a congressional resolution "won't stop us."

In order to pass the Senate, any anti-war resolution may need 60 votes: Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky is threatening a filibuster.

Senate Committee Approves Resolution Against Troop Surge (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

Washington — A Senate committee approved a toughly worded resolution Wednesday to oppose a troop buildup in Iraq, moving Congress a step closer to an official repudiation of President Bush's leadership of the increasingly violent four-year-old war.

In a sign of how partisan the debate over Iraq remains, only one Republican joined Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to support the resolution, which bluntly declares "it is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq."

But the vote -- the day after the president asked Congress to give his proposal "a chance to work" -- followed hours of criticism of the latest Iraq policy by Democratic as well as Republican lawmakers. Not a single senator on the committee endorsed the White House plan.

And with that resolution headed to a debate on the Senate floor as soon as next week, momentum also continued to build behind a second, more bipartisan resolution opposing the Bush Iraq plan.

As support builds for some legislative action, it appears increasingly likely Bush could face the equivalent of a no-confidence vote.

Both resolutions are nonbinding and stop well short of limits that Congress has used to scale back other unpopular military operations, including the Vietnam War. But they mark a sharp departure from the largely deferential posture the Republican-led Congress assumed after Bush sought and won approval for the invasion in 2002.

The resolution passed 12-9 on Wednesday by the Foreign Relations Committee is sponsored by Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and Carl Levin, D-Mich.

The second resolution, championed by veteran Virginia Republican Sen. John Warner, has now attracted four GOP co-sponsors and six Democratic co-sponsors. And several Republican senators who voted against Biden's resolution in committee expressed interest in the measure.

One of Warner's co-sponsors, Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said Wednesday evening that the measure's authors are talking with even more lawmakers about joining onto the resolution.

Warner's stature as a former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and a former Navy secretary has helped draw Republican support. His proposal also is not complicated by presidential politics. Both Biden and Hagel have expressed interest in running for the White House.

The Warner resolution "disagrees" with the president's plans to send 17,500 additional troops in Baghdad, noting the rising sectarian violence in the capital and the poor record of Iraqi cooperation with U.S. initiatives.

But it also includes deferential language recognizing the president's authority as commander in chief and accepts the possibility that the 4,000 additional troops the president wants in Anbar Province may be needed.

DOJ_NMG_0121514

The Biden measure is broadly similar, although it does not distinguish between Baghdad and Anbar, a hotbed of Sunni insurgent activity.

Nearly all the Democrats on the Foreign Relations Committee said they hoped the resolution would be only the first step in a congressional drive to start bringing the war to an end.

"Kids are dying over there," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., another presidential hopeful and vocal war opponent. "We need to do something meaningful."

Dodd offered two amendments to cap the number of troops in Iraq and force the president to seek congressional authorization for further troop increases. The amendments failed.

But Biden, who chairs the committee, assured senators that he is also interested in additional legislation to force the president to start withdrawing troops. "We should be drawing down forces," Biden said. "We need a radical change in course."

Hagel, a Vietnam veteran and longtime war opponent, pointedly chided his Republican colleagues for their hesitation.

"The Congress has stood in the shadows ... for four years," he said. "I think all 100 senators ought to be on the line on this. What do you believe? What are you willing to support? ... If you want a safe job, go sell shoes."

The harangue did not move any of the nine other GOP lawmakers on the committee, many of whom are uncomfortable with the tone of the Democratic opposition to Bush's Iraq plans.

Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., a widely respected moderate who used to chair the committee, said he did not believe any resolution opposing the president's policy would be productive.

"It is the wrong tool for this stage in the Iraq debate," Lugar said, warning that it would be divisive and unlikely to affect the president's thinking.

Other Republican senators expressed concern that it might send the wrong message to American troops and that it fails to spell out any alternative to the president's plan.

"We all have a right to be against a plan. I also think we all have a responsibility to be for a plan. This resolution is clearly not a plan," said Sen. David Vitter, R-La., who has called for specific benchmarks to measure progress in Iraq.

The Republican opposition to the resolution did not stop the GOP lawmakers from criticizing Bush's plans, however.

"I'm more skeptical about what we're doing than I ever have been before," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, who noted that the more he has learned from Bush administration officials about the buildup the more concerned he has become.

After Wednesday's committee vote, aides to Sens. John Sununu, R-N.H., and Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, both of whom voted against the Biden resolution, said the lawmakers were more comfortable with the language in the Warner resolution.

Biden and his co-sponsors, as well as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., have expressed the desire to work with Warner to reach a compromise.

Hagel, who has already had several lengthy discussions with Warner, said he anticipates more. "We'll be doing a lot of talking," he said.

Senators Rebuff Bush On Troop Plan (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

A day after President Bush pleaded with Congress to give his Iraq policy one last chance, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee rebuffed him by approving a nonbinding resolution declaring his troop increase in Iraq to be against "the national interest."

The committee voted 12 to 9 to send a resolution of disapproval of the president's Iraq policy to the Senate floor next week, setting up what could be the most dramatic confrontation between Congress and the Bush administration since the war was launched four years ago. Many Republicans voiced anguish over the president's policy, but only one, Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), a co-sponsor, voted in support of the resolution.

While some lawmakers and antiwar activists have dismissed the resolution as largely meaningless, senior Republicans and White House officials have worked furiously to minimize Republican defections, worried that a large, bipartisan vote would have significant political and international repercussions.

"In an open democracy, we voice our agreements and disagreements in public, and we should not be reticent to do so. But official roll-call votes carry a unique message," said Sen. Richard G. Lugar (Ind.), the Foreign Relations Committee's ranking Republican. A vote for the resolution "will confirm to our friends and allies that we are divided and in disarray," he said.

But Hagel implored his colleagues to take a stand after four years of docile acquiescence.

"What do you believe? What are you willing to support? What do you think? Why were you elected?" he asked. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes. This is a tough business."

But the committee's partisan divide belied the deep undercurrent of GOP misgivings, as one Republican after another spoke out against the deployment of 21,500 additional troops to bolster the faltering government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Lugar called the Bush strategy "dubious" even as he denounced the resolution as "the legislative equivalent of a sound bite." Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) said additional troops should not be deployed until the Iraqi government showed more resolve. Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) said she opposed the president and was not afraid to tell him so. And Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) said he had delivered a tough message to the White House personally: "You are not listening."

"Congress has allowed this war to go on without anyone having a stake," said an exasperated Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.). "We passed the debt on to future generations. Nobody has sacrificed but the military men and women and the families."

Republican leaders' efforts in the House to placate their members with calls for tougher oversight also appeared to be faltering. Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) introduced his own resolution of disapproval yesterday, calling for the administration to adopt in full the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, recommendations that Bush has largely rejected.

Democratic divisions were also on display, with the most ardent antiwar voices pleading for more dramatic action. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) tried to amend the nonbinding resolution with firm legislative language capping troop levels in Iraq at January levels, around 137,500.

"This is not a time for legislative nuancing," said Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.). "This is not a time for trying to forge a compromise that everybody can be a part of. This is a time to stop the needless deaths of American troops in Iraq."

But the Dodd amendment was defeated, 15 to 6, with five Democrats joining all Republicans in opposition.

The committee's partisan vote strengthened the hand of Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) and a bipartisan group of senators backing a less forceful resolution of opposition.

Warner and his co-sponsors, Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine), went to the Senate floor last night to introduce their resolution of opposition, brandishing a raft of new co-sponsors, including Democrats Ken Salazar (Colo.), Mary Landrieu (La.), Claire McCaskill (Mo.) and Bill Nelson (Fla.), as well as Republicans Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Norm Coleman (Minn.).

Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Hagel said negotiations with Warner would begin immediately to try to find common ground on a resolution that would attract far more Republican support.

But they said that whatever language is sent to the floor will have to include the policy prescriptions that are in both resolutions: a statement against further deployments; a call for U.S. troops to be re-deployed to guard Iraq's borders, focus on counterterrorism and speeding up the training of Iraqi troops; and a call for diplomatic efforts to engage Iraq's neighbors in the pursuit of a political settlement to the war.

Yesterday's debate foreshadowed what could be wrenching deliberations next week, haunted by the ghosts of Vietnam and the more than 3,000 U.S. dead in Iraq. The Foreign Relations Committee featured three decorated combat veterans of Vietnam, Hagel, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Sen. James Webb (D-Va.), all of whom voted for the resolution of opposition.

Webb warned yesterday against drawing what he called superficial parallels between the Iraq and Vietnam conflicts, but Kerry evoked the same language he had used in the early 1970s as an antiwar activist: "How do you ask a man to be the last to die for a mistake?"

While Republicans called for lawmakers to support the troops in Iraq, Kerry and Dodd recalled a meeting they had before Christmas with Capt. Brian S. Freeman, a 31-year-old Californian who had sought them out on an Iraqi helicopter landing pad to express his frustrations with the war. Freeman was on his way home on a short leave to visit his 14-month-old daughter and 4-year-old son.

He was killed last weekend in an insurgent attack in Karbala.

"How many times are we going to repeat that before we accept our responsibility to get it right?" Kerry asked.

Opponents did not so much defend the president's policies as castigate the Democrats' chosen method of confrontation.

"We do not need a resolution to confirm that there is broad discomfort with the president's plan within Congress," Lugar said. "In fact, a vote on this resolution is likely to reveal far less discomfort than actually exists, since some members will vote against it because of its format."

But several Republicans indicated they would vote for a resolution of opposition if the language were toned down. Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), a presidential candidate, said he was in talks with Warner on a resolution he could embrace. Others were still awaiting some sign of compromise from the president.

"I have been waiting for the administration to extend an olive branch in an attempt to forge a compromise -- a compromise that clearly expresses our concerns while leaving no doubt in the minds of our troops as well as our enemies that we stand united as a nation," Voinovich said.

Bush Fails To Stem Erosion Of Authority (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

Although it had been billed as one of the most important speeches of his presidency, there were few signs on Wednesday that George W. Bush's State of the Union address had succeeded in stemming the rapid haemorrhaging of his authority.

A number of leading Democrats, including Barack Obama, a front-runner for the 2008 presidential campaign, evinced cautious welcomes for Mr Bush's modest proposals to address global warming and healthcare reform.

But most Democrats and several prominent Republicans remained fixed on Mr Bush's unwillingness to listen to his growing army of critics over the war in Iraq, to which he devoted about a quarter of the 50-minute speech on Tuesday night.

In spite of an impassioned plea for Congress to give his Iraq strategy a chance, Mr Bush failed even to sway waverers within his own party.

Several leading Republicans, including John Warner, the former chairman of the senate armed services committee, plan to go ahead with resolutions that oppose Mr Bush's 21,500 troop "surge" to Iraq.

"If people like John Warner, who represents the southern and military heart of the Republican party, are now abandoning Mr Bush over Iraq then he is going to come under acute pressure to reverse course," said Bruce Riedel at the Saban Centre for the Middle East in Washington DC. "His speech failed to dent those defections."

On domestic policy, meanwhile, the Democratic leadership in both houses dismissed Mr Bush's proposals as either too timid or irrelevant. Mr Bush was also criticised for failing to mention reconstruction in New Orleans following the devastation of Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

"We were very surprised last night when the president talked about the city of Baghdad that he did not mention the city of Detroit or Louisville or Minneapolis or, most importantly, the city of New Orleans," said Debbie Stabenow, Democratic senator for Michigan.

In contrast to his six previous State of the Union addresses, Mr Bush appealed to Congress, which turned Democrat last November for the first time in his presidency, to work "across the aisle" in a bipartisan way in order to "achieve big things for the American people". But the already-weak prospects for a fruitful White House legislative agenda over the next 18 months appear only to have waned further.

"If you want to see bold bipartisan action between now and 2008 you should look to America's democratic laboratories at the state level where states like California and Massachusetts are showing the way on issues like healthcare and global warming," said Ted Halstead, president of the Centre for the New America Foundation, a centrist think tank in Washington.

As authority drains from the White House, Washington is also increasingly looking to the large and growing field of 2008 presidential candidates – most of whom are in the Senate – to provide a lead on big policy ideas, such as healthcare, Iraq and climate change. With the exception of John McCain, who dutifully welcomed Mr Bush's restated Iraq plan, almost all others were either critical or lukewarm.

Hillary Clinton, who entered the race last weekend, spoke for most Democrats when she opposed Mr Bush's proposal to put a cap on employer-provided health benefits and extend higher subsidies to individuals. The former first lady said it would do very little to bring in the 47m Americans who have no health insurance.

Likewise on global warming, Mr Bush's ideas were dismissed as too little too late. "In last year's State of the Union, Mr Bush said we were addicted to oil and nothing happened," said Evan Bayh, Democratic senator for Indiana. "Doing little or nothing on this issue is not good enough any more."

But it was Jim Webb, the newly elected Democratic senator for Virginia, who best summarised Mr Bush's prospects when he gave his party's response straight after the president's speech on prime time television.

Mr Webb, a Vietnam veteran, called on the president to follow the lead of some of his most illustrious predecessors who had changed course dramatically in mid-stream. "If he does, then we will join him," said Mr Webb, "If he does not, then we will be showing him the way."

Senate Committee Repudiates Bush On Iraq (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 25, 2007

In a calculated snub of President Bush, the Democratic-controlled Senate Foreign Relations Committee dismissed plans for a troop buildup in Iraq on Wednesday as "not in the national interest" of the United States.

"The president has made his decision," Vice President Dick Cheney fired back, a response that made it clear the administration would go ahead anyway. "We need to get the job done."

DOJ_NMG_0121517

The committee vote, 12-9 along party lines, capped hours of debate in which Republicans and Democrats vented their frustration and anger — both with the administration and their own past unwillingness to change the course of a war that has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. troops.

"There is no strategy. This is a pingpong game with American lives," said Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

"This Congress was never meant to be a rubber stamp," added Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., "Read the Constitution. The Congress has the power to declare war. And on multiple occasions, we used our power to end conflicts."

Hagel was the only one of 10 committee Republicans to support the nonbinding measure. Several of the panel's 11 Democrats said they favored stronger legislation to register their opposition to the war.

In the wake of midterm election losses, Bush announced two weeks that he would order an additional 21,500 troops into the war zone. In Tuesday night's State of the Union address, he implored skeptical lawmakers to give the strategy a chance.

Bush got his answer in less than 24 hours, the timing dictated by Democrats, and Sen. Joseph Biden. D-Del., the panel's chairman, said tougher measures were likely to follow.

"Unless the president demonstrates very quickly that he is unlikely to continue down the road he's on, this will be only the first step. ... I will be introducing ... constitutionally legitimate, binding pieces of legislation. We will bring them up," he said.

Taken together, the committee's vote and Cheney's response suggested the Democrats and the White House were on a collision course — lawmakers drafting ever-stronger measures to change policy in Iraq, and the president exercising his prerogatives as commander in chief — and his veto pen.

"We are moving forward," Cheney said in an interview with CNN in which he was asked about the troop buildup. "The Congress has control over the purse strings. They have the right, obviously, if they want, to cut off funding. But in terms of this effort, the president has made his decision."

The vice president added: "We've consulted extensively with them. We'll continue to consult with the Congress. But the fact of the matter is, we need to get the job done."

Inside the Senate committee, all Republicans but Hagel opposed the measure, denying Democrats the strong bipartisan vote they had sought.

Biden, who has announced he intends to run for president in 2008, said the legislation is "not an attempt to embarrass the president. ... It's an attempt to save the president from making a significant mistake with regard to our policy in Iraq."

Democrats intend to bring the measure to the Senate floor for a vote next week, and Biden said he is willing, in the interim, to make changes in the hopes of gaining additional Republican support.

Some committee Republicans sought unsuccessfully to temper the measure before it was approved. Additionally, more than a half-dozen GOP lawmakers in the Senate have signaled interest in an alternative that merely expresses disagreement with the president's policy rather than deeming it not in the national interest.

"The thing that I'm deeply concerned about is putting American troops in the middle of this — the cross-hairs of this sectarian battle before the Iraqis" deliver on a series of promised reforms, said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn.

While he said he opposes deploying additional troops in Baghdad, Coleman added he wants to leave open the possibility of a bigger force in the Anbar province in the western part of the country.

Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, the committee's senior Republican, readily conceded he was not sure Bush's new policy would succeed. But he voted against the measure, saying, "It is unclear to me how passing a nonbinding resolution that the president has already said he will ignore will contribute to any improvement or modification of our Iraq policy."

Lugar also said sponsors of the measure were underestimating their power to force a change.

"We have the ability to require weekly updates from our diplomats and military commanders about the status in Iraq. We should be engaging the administration on almost a daily basis concerning the mission and needs of our troops," he said.

"We should demand of the president precise explanations of his political and diplomatic strategy. We should conduct what amounts to a continuous audit of our economic assistance, to ensure that we are maximizing results."

Some of the most emotional rhetoric of the day came as committee members challenged one another to take a stand.

"If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes," said Hagel.

"This is a tough business. But is it any tougher, us having to take a tough vote, express ourselves and have the courage to step up on what we're asking our young men and women to do?"

Senate Panel Passes Iraq Resolution (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 25, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121518

Senate Democrats won committee passage yesterday of their leadership-backed resolution renouncing President Bush's plan for more troops in Iraq, but it is unclear whether the measure will overcome anticipated obstacles on the floor as presidential rivals continue to muddy the debate.

The Foreign Relations Committee approved a resolution co-written by its chairman, Joseph Biden (D-Del.), and second-ranked Republican, Chuck Hagel (Neb.), asserting that a new military commitment in Iraq "is not in the national interest" of the nation. Yet the resolution failed to win over another panel Republican despite public criticism of the troop "surge" by several GOP senators, setting up a Senate floor showdown unless the Foreign Relations resolution can be united with a competing measure by next week.

"We're concerned about our next election," Hagel, who continues to mull a possible Republican or Independent presidential bid, told his colleagues. "So we tinker. So we figure out wordsmithing. Should we oppose the president or just not support the president?"

Speaking emotionally and without prepared notes, Hagel called on ranking GOP Sen. Richard Lugar (Ind.) and others to weigh their doubts about the wisdom of the surge against their doubts about the impact of the nonbinding resolution. Biden, Hagel and fellow author Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, have voiced willingness to negotiate with backers of a resolution that uses less-strong language in its disapproval, but no common ground was achieved yesterday.

Dealing a potential blow to Democratic leaders' hopes for consensus, several members of their caucus are embracing the competing resolution, whether instead of or alongside the Foreign Relations language.

"Sens. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) and Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) support both versions, while Mary Landrieu (D-La.) has backed the alternative, which was formally introduced Monday by Sens. John Warner (R-Va.), Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Norm Coleman (R-Minn.)."

A separate rift opened yesterday between Biden and two fellow competitors in the 2008 White House chase over whether to attempt a further check on Bush by placing a binding cap on troop levels in Iraq. Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), the first Democrat to support a troop ceiling that would trigger a new congressional vote on authorizing the war, tried to add that cap as an amendment to the resolution.

"Just setting the level at 137,500 [Dodd's suggested level] sends the wrong message," Biden told his committee, predicting that Dodd's amendment would sink the resolution. "We're codifying the status quo."

Biden suggested collaborating with Dodd and other supporters of binding action to limit Bush's Iraq policy, noting that the White House budget is likely to arrive with a yearlong war-funding request. Dodd ultimately won just five of the 11 committee Democrats, including two onetime presidential aspirants, John Kerry (Mass.) and Russ Feingold (Wis.).

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has met with Warner to discuss merging the two Iraq resolutions with an eye to a floor vote next week. Democrats aim to put a bipartisan imprimatur on their view that, as stated in leadership talking points distributed yesterday, "support for the escalation and support for the troops is not the same thing."

Senate Republican leaders, however, would be in a better position with multiple amendments and substitutes on the floor to splinter the dozen or so members of their conference with qualms about adding to the military presence in Iraq. Four Republicans up for reelection in 2008 — including Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) — already have cosponsored the less strongly worded alternative resolution, which echoes the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's recommendations.

Another GOP senator facing the campaign trail this year, Ted Stevens (Alaska), said yesterday he would wait to see what language appears on the floor but stressed that he does not want to send a negative message to troops in Iraq. Alaska's junior senator, Lisa Murkowski (R), said yesterday that she has "a degree of comfort" with the alternative resolution, hinting that she might support it and criticizing the surge.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who will vie for the GOP's presidential nod, said late Tuesday that he was considering signing on to the alternative resolution as a means to convey his objections to Bush.

Seven of the dozen Democratic senators up for reelection in 2008, meanwhile, are cosponsors of the Foreign Relations-passed resolution: Biden, Levin, Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.), Jack Reed (R.I.), Majority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.), John Kerry (D-Mass.) and Frank Lautenberg (N.J.).

Other senators up this cycle, including Landrieu, Collins, Warner, Smith and Coleman, back the less strongly worded alternative.

No Resolution To Biden's Talk Show (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Chairman Joe Biden of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was trying to uphold two resolutions yesterday: one criticizing the Bush administration's Iraq policy and the other Biden's own resolution to himself -- to stop talking so much.

The Iraq resolution passed 12 to 9. Biden's other resolution failed, by a voice vote -- Biden's voice.

The Delaware Democrat and presidential hopeful ran the hearing more like a talk show host than a chairman: inviting the other senators to speak and then commenting on each senator's remarks.

He opened the hearing with a 3,000-word statement in which he used the word "I" 88 times, including a lengthy discussion of the types of questions he has asked himself and how he has answered himself. Finally, the committee's ranking Republican, Richard Lugar (Ind.) got a chance to speak. Then Biden spoke again. Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) introduced an amendment. Biden interrupted him four times, the last time stating, "I don't want to belabor the point."

By this point, Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) had heard enough Biden. "We're going to be here a long time, and I'd certainly like to speak," he announced with irritation. Biden yielded the floor to Sununu, but then interrupted him, too -- five times.

"Senator," Sununu eventually pleaded. "You've had a wonderful opportunity to express your views. I think many on the committee would at least like to express their own views, and I'm sure you'll have ample opportunity to respond."

For Biden, verbosity frequently tramples what might otherwise be profound points. Friends have urged him to put a sock in it, and he knows that his wordiness prevents him from being, as he has put it, "the best Biden I can be."

But, like any addict, he is prone to lapses. "I'll not interrupt again," he promised after one of his monologues yesterday -- this one after remarks by Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) -- and then he broke the promise minutes later.

The veteran legislator is hardly the only one in the Senate, or on the committee, to suffer from long-windedness. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) used his time to rehash the 2004 campaign, arguing that everything he said about the Vietnam War decades ago was true. Kerry later went to the Senate floor to announce that he would not run for president in 2008 but meandered through the better part of half an hour before getting to the point.

But Biden suffers more publicly from the need to explain every contour of his thinking; he at once seems keenly aware that he should keep things moving, yet unaware of the need to stop himself from talking. Returning from a recess in yesterday's hearing, he vowed to finish the proceedings in 90 minutes, "God willing and the creek not rising, as my grandpop used to say." He urged fellow senators to be brief, saying that "even though there's much more to say, there will be plenty of opportunities to say it." More than once he referred to the senators waiting to speak in a "queue" -- he pronounced it "kway" -- but then extended the queue by inserting himself between each speaker.

"Let me just make two brief comments," he said after Lugar voiced opposition to the Iraq resolution.

"Let me respond briefly," he said after Dodd tried to strengthen the resolution. "And I'll try to be brief." One thousand words later, Dodd tried, with limited success, to reclaim the floor.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) acknowledged that "Iraq is a mess" but spoke hopefully about Anbar province. "I've made seven trips into Anbar," Biden said in his rebuttal.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) wanted the Senate to be tougher with President Bush. "If you find a person who's spoken more frankly to seven presidents in the past, tell me who it was," Biden challenged.

Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) raised objections to the resolution. "I will not engage the senator in debate now," the chairman responded -- then engaged the senator in a debate.

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) spoke. Biden responded. Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) spoke. Biden responded. Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) spoke. Biden responded. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) tried to speak but got only as far as "I've enjoyed listening to the debate that's taken place" before Biden broke in with a logistical update.

"I beg your pardon," the chairman told Obama.

Some of Biden's wordiness had to do with presidential jostling. Eclipsed in media exposure by presidential rivals Hillary Clinton and Obama -- Biden was bumped from network interviews Wednesday morning by Obama -- he relies on such hearings to boost his visibility for the presidential race. At one point, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) accidentally called Biden "Mr. President."

"I should say 'Mr. Chairman,' " she amended. "I know you'd like 'Mr. President.' "

"Well, you noticed, nine heads turned when you said that," he replied, referring to the other senators on the committee who have contemplated candidacies.

"I noticed you responded immediately," Boxer needled.

For a moment, the chairman was not ready with a reply. But it passed quickly.

Large Rally Planned Saturday On Mall (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Tens of thousands of peace advocates from across the country are expected in Washington on Saturday for an anti-war rally that could be among the biggest since the war in Iraq began, organizers said yesterday.

They said the rally on the Mall, followed by a march near the Capitol, will target President Bush's intention to send more troops to the Iraq war.

The president's policy is "fight, war, occupation, death, destruction, spend our tax dollars," Leslie Cagan, national coordinator of United for Peace and Justice, the umbrella group that is one of the main organizers of Saturday's events, said at a media briefing.

Citing what she called "this devastating debacle of lies and horror," Cagan said: "The people of this country have had it. This Saturday, January 27, on the heels of the Bush administration's decision to send another 21,000 U.S. troops into Iraq, hundreds of thousands of people from all across this country will come to this capital city to make it clear."

The marchers are calling for an end to the occupation of Iraq and the beginning of "an orderly, speedy and safe" withdrawal of troops, said Hani Khalil, a spokesman for the group. They want dates announced for the start of troop withdrawal as well as a specific deadline for its completion, he added.

United for Peace and Justice describes itself as a coalition of 1,400 local and national organizations. Among them are the National Organization for Women, United Church of Christ, the American Friends Service Committee, True Majority, Military Families Speak Out, Iraq Veterans Against the War, the U.S. Campaign to End the Israeli Occupation, CodePink, MoveOn.org, and September 11th Families for Peaceful Tomorrows.

Among the featured speakers will be Vietnam War-era protester Jane Fonda, according to the organizers. Others include actors Danny Glover, Tim Robbins and Susan Sarandon, civil rights activist Jesse Jackson, and Carlos Arredondo, who in 2004 set himself on fire after learning of the death in Iraq of his Marine Corps son, Alexander.

The rally is scheduled to begin at 11 a.m. at the east end of the Mall, at Third Street and Madison Drive NW, the organizers said. The march is to kick off at 1 p.m.

The route and march permits were being finalized yesterday, the National Park Service said. Cagan said organizers want to march from the Mall north on Louisiana Avenue to Union Station, then south on Delaware Avenue to the Capitol.

The march comes after several large Iraq war protests, which date to before the March 2003 invasion. One of the biggest was held Sept. 25, 2005, and was billed as the largest since the war's start. Organizers at the time claimed a turnout of 300,000, while police pegged the number at about half that.

Cagan declined yesterday to predict a Saturday turnout. "We learned a long time ago not to put out numbers," she said. "There are many variables, especially in the winter."

An anti-war protest described as the largest since the Vietnam War drew several hundred thousand Jan. 18, 2003, on the eve of the Iraq war, in subfreezing Washington weather. The high temperature reported that day was in the mid-20s.

Saturday's weather should be sunny, with highs in the low 50s, according to the National Weather Service.

Fonda, 69, an actress, author and peace activist who was vilified during the Vietnam War for making an appearance in Hanoi on a North Vietnamese gun emplacement, has previously avoided attending anti-Iraq war functions.

"I realized that I would provide too much of a distraction for the right-wing media," she told the San Jose Mercury News last year. "I didn't want to take away from what's happening in the movement."

Cagan, the protest organizer, said Fonda was traveling yesterday and was unavailable for an interview, but "Jane Fonda is definitely coming. She is speaking at the rally and marching in the lead contingent."

Fonda is scheduled to be joined at the rally podium by Bob Watada, 67, of Honolulu, a retired executive with the state of Hawaii whose Army officer son, Ehren, is to be court-martialed next month for refusing to deploy to Iraq.

"There is no doubt in my mind that the invasion and occupation of Iraq is wholly unwarranted," Bob Watada said in a telephone interview. "The Iraqi people have done absolutely nothing to the United States. They've done nothing to deserve the massacre and the pummeling they're getting . . . the plunder, the torture, the rape, the murder of innocent people. It's got to stop."

Watada's son, a 28-year-old Army lieutenant based at Fort Lewis, Wash., "refused to deploy to Iraq after he found out that the president had lied to the country, lied to the military, about there being weapons of mass destruction in Iraq," the elder Watada said.

Watada said his son refused to get on a deployment plane in June and spoke out against the war. The younger Watada has been charged with "missing a movement" and conduct unbecoming an officer, his father said.

Watada said he plans to participate fully in Saturday's rally and march. "I got my plane tickets and hotel reservations, and I'll be there," he said.

Senators-in-Chief (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

To understand why the Founders put war powers in the hands of the Presidency, look no further than the current spectacle in Congress on Iraq. What we are witnessing is a Federalist Papers illustration of criticism and micromanagement without responsibility.

Consider the resolution pushed through the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday by Joe Biden and Chuck Hagel, two men who would love to be President if only they could persuade enough voters to elect them. Both men voted for the Iraq War. But with that war proving to be more difficult than they thought, they now want to put themselves on record as opposing any further attempts to win it.

Their resolution -- which passed 12-9 -- calls for Iraqis to "reach a political settlement" leading to "reconciliation," as if anyone disagrees with that necessity. But then it declares that the way to accomplish this is to wash American hands of the Iraq effort, proposing that U.S. forces retreat to protect the borders and hunt terrorists. The logic here seems to be that if the Americans leave, Iraqis will miraculously conclude that they have must settle their differences. A kind of reverse field of dreams: If we don't come, they will build it.

The irony is that this is not all that far from the "light footprint" strategy that the Bush Administration was following last year and which these same Senators called a failure. It is precisely the inability to provide security in Baghdad that has led to greater sectarian violence, especially among Shiites victimized by Sunni car bombs. The purpose of the new Bush counterinsurgency strategy is to provide more security to the population in the hopes of making a political settlement easier.

But then such analysis probably takes this resolution more seriously than most of the Senators do. If they were serious and had the courage of their convictions, they'd attempt to cut off funds for the Iraq effort. But that would mean they would have to take responsibility for what happens next. By passing "non-binding resolutions," they can assail Mr. Bush and put all of the burden of success or failure on his shoulders.

This is not to say that the resolution won't have harmful consequences, at home and abroad. At home, it further undermines public support for the Iraq effort. Virginia Republican John Warner even cites a lack of public support to justify his separate non-binding resolution of criticism for Mr. Bush's troop "surge." But public pessimism is in part a response to the rhetoric of failure from political leaders like Mr. Warner. The same Senators then wrap their own retreat in the defeatism they helped to promote.

In Iraq, all of this undermines the morale of the military and makes their task that much harder on the ground. When John McCain asked Lieutenant General David Petraeus that precise question during his confirmation hearing Tuesday, the next commander of Coalition operations in Iraq said, "It would not be a beneficial effect, sir."

And when Joe Lieberman asked if such a resolution would give the enemy cause to believe that Americans were divided, he added, "That's correct, sir." Several Senators protested and demanded that the general stay out of domestic politics, but his only offense was telling the truth. Of course the enemy would take comfort from any Senate declaration that Mr. Bush lacks domestic support.

All of this also applies to the many Congressional efforts to set "benchmarks" or otherwise micromanage the battlefield. Hillary Rodham Clinton says she is "cursed with the responsibility gene" that makes her unwilling to cut off funds, but instead she proposes to set a cap on U.S. troops in the theater. So while General Petraeus says he needs more troops to fulfill his mission, General Clinton says he doesn't. Which battlefield commander do you trust?

House Republicans are little better. They blame Mr. Bush and Iraq for their loss of Congress, rather than their own ethics, earmarks and other failures. So looking ahead to 2008 they now want to distance themselves from the war they voted for, albeit also without actually having to vote against it. Thus their political brainstorm is to demand monthly "benchmarks for success" that the Bush Administration and Iraqis will have to meet.

So every 30 days, General Petraeus and his men will have to take their attention away from the Baghdad campaign and instead report to Congress on how well Iraqis and Americans are communicating with one another, among other crucial matters. Minority Leader John Boehner is even asking Speaker Nancy Pelosi to create another special Congressional committee to look over the general's shoulder. It's a shame Ulysses S. Grant isn't around to tell them where to put their special committee. * * *

In addition to being feckless, all of this is unconstitutional. As Commander-in-Chief, the President has the sole Constitutional authority to manage the war effort. Congress has two explicit war powers: It has the power to declare war, which in the case of Iraq it essentially did with its resolution of 2002. It also has the power to appropriate funds.

There is a long and unsettled debate over whether Congress can decide to defund specific military operations once it has created a standing Army. We lean toward those who believe it cannot, but the Founders surely didn't imagine that Congress could start dictating when and where the 101st Airborne could be deployed once a war is under way.

Mr. Bush was conciliatory and respectful in his State of the Union Address Tuesday night, asking Congress to give his new Iraq strategy a chance. In a better world, the Members would do so. But if they insist on seeking political cover by trying to operate as a committee of 535 Commanders-in-Chief, Mr. Bush will have to start reminding Congress who really has the job.

Talking Ourselves Into Defeat

January 25, 2007; Page A18

The United States is talking itself into defeat in Iraq. Its political culture is now in a downward spiral of pessimism. In the halls of Congress, across endless newspaper columns, amid the punditocracy and on Sunday morning talk shows -- all emit a Stygian gloom about America.

Yes, on any given day on some discrete issue (Prime Minister Maliki's bona fides, for example), the criticism of the American role is not without justification. But the cumulative effect of this unremitting ill wind is corrosive. We are not only on the way to talking ourselves into defeat in Iraq but into a diminished international status that may be harder to recover than the doom mob imagines. Self-criticism has its role, but profligate self-doubt can exact a price.

Maine GOP Sen. Susan Collins wonders "whether the clock has already run out." To U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton the new strategy is "a dead end." For the Bush troop request, presidential candidate Joe Biden predicted "overwhelming rejection." (His committee resolution to that effect yesterday passed by three votes.) Presidential candidate Chuck Hagel: "We have anarchy in Iraq. It's getting worse." And not least, Sen. John Warner this week heaved his tenured eminence against the war effort, proposing another "non-binding" resolution against more troops.

To pick one amid scores of similar characterizations in the media, the Associated Press wrote from Washington before the State of the Union speech that "Democrats -- and even some Republicans -- scoffed at his policy." "Scoff" is a strong word, suggesting eye-rolling ridicule. (The line was so good that the AP ran it after the speech as well, under another writer's byline, this time from Baghdad.) But of course amid the giddy vapors of mass mockery, they all "support the troops."

Our slide to a national nervous breakdown because of Iraq is not going unnoticed. Australia's foreign minister, Alexander Downer, has been visiting across the U.S. this week. "I've been pretty worried about what I've heard," Mr. Downer said in an interview. Walking on Santa Monica beach Sunday before last, Mr. Downer said he encountered a display of crosses in the sand, representing the American dead in Iraq.

"What concerns me about this," he said, "is that it's sort of an isolationist sentiment, subconsciously, not consciously, and that would be an enormous problem for the world. I hope the American people understand the importance of not retreating and thinking the world's problems aren't theirs."

Some of this is politics as usual, but even normal partisanship comes dressed now in the language of apocalypse. In his SOTU rebuttal, Democratic Sen. Jim Webb ripped into the current economy, saying it reminded him of the early 1900s: "The dispossessed workers at the bottom were threatening revolt." Ah, we've fallen to the level of czarist Russia.

You know the pessimism has turned manic when no one is allowed to depart the asylum. Sen. John McCain's support for Iraq and the new Bush plan is now being described in press reports as not only costing him support in the polls (the asylum's inkblot of reality) but worse, the support of campaign contributors.

It is a phenomenon fascinating to behold. Its causes are multiple, but here are several:

Bush schadenfreude. Partisan pleasure in George Bush's pain dates to the anguish of the contested 2000 election loss. The Democrats have run against something called "Bush" for so long that this sentiment is now bound up in any act or policy remotely attached to the president. Iraq's troubles, or Iran or North Korea, are merely an artifact of crushing this one guy.

The Iraq Study Group. The ISG report wasn't defeatist, but it enabled the vocabulary of defeat. Its warning of a "slide toward chaos" was re-defined as the current Iraqi status quo. They called their bipartisan solution "phased withdrawal," but it was a euphemism for defeat. Momentum was already building in this direction, and the ISG propelled it.

The leadership vacuum. The administration never rallied the nation behind the war in a concrete way. A young Marine officer recently returned from combat in Iraq told me this week he is taken aback at how disassociated the American people seem from Iraq, no matter how constantly it's in the news. He says it's as if the problem is not so much what is actually happening in Iraq but that the war is "annoying" to Americans, as if to say: Can't it just go away or not be on the front page all the time? Rallying a nation at war is a president's job.

The opposition vacuum. One reason the negative mood in politics is so disconcerting is that the opposition's alternative vision is nonexistent. On joining the opposition recently, GOP Sen. Norm Coleman announced, "I can't tell you what the path to success is." Joe Biden says the "primary" Iraq strategy should be to force its leaders to make the political compromises necessary to "end the violence."

As a political strategy, unremitting opposition has worked. Approval for the president and the war is low. The GOP lost sight of its ideological lodestars and so control of Congress. But the U.S. still occupies a unique position of power in the world, and we are putting that status at risk by playing politics without a net.

On the "Charlie Rose Show" this month, former Army vice chief of staff Gen. Jack Keane, who supports the counterinsurgency plan being undertaken by Gen. David Petraeus, said in exasperation: "My God, this is the United States. We are the world's No. 1 superpower. This isn't about arrogance. This is about capability and applying ourselves to a problem that is at its essence a human problem."

At our current juncture, Gen. Keane's words probably rub many the wrong way. But there's a Cassandra-like warning implicit in them. The mood of mass resignation spreading through the body politic is toxic. It is uncharacteristic of Americans under stress. Some might call it realism, but it looks closer to the fatalism of elderly Europe, overwhelmed and exhausted by its burdens, than to the American tradition.

In 1966, Sen. George Aiken delivered a speech on Vietnam famously translated for history as "declare victory and go home.'" On current course, it looks like we may declare defeat and go home.

Senators Approve Petraeus Nomination (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A Senate committee on Wednesday approved the nomination of Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to command American forces in Iraq, replacing Gen. George Casey.

The Senate Armed Services Committee sent the nomination to the full Senate, which is expected to approve the nomination on Thursday, including promoting Petraeus to four-star rank for the top military post in Iraq.

Bush named Petraeus to replace Casey as part of a revamping of his top military and diplomatic officials in Iraq and the Middle East. While the president's proposal to add 21,500 more U.S. troops to the roughly 132,000 already in Iraq is being widely criticized in Congress, the choice of Petraeus has not been controversial.

Petraeus, 54, has served two previous yearlong tours in Iraq _ as commander of the 101st Airborne Division during the invasion in March 2003 and as commander of the training program for the Iraqi Army in 2004-05.

Casey has been nominated to be the next Army chief of staff.

The committee approved the nomination without opposition at an impromptu meeting in the Capitol, said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a member of the panel.

Bush Seeks Action On Iraq Confirmations (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 25, 2007

President Bush asked the Senate Wednesday to quickly confirm the top commanders he has chosen to oversee the war in Iraq.

"It is important to get these three fine individuals in their posts as soon as possible so that we have continuity as we do our duty to protect the American people," the president said.

He was referring to Adm. William Fallon, chosen to replace Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander overseeing the military theater that includes Iraq; Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, nominated to be the new chief commander in Iraq; and Gen. George Casey, leaving the top Iraq job to take over from the retiring Gen. Peter Schoomaker as Army chief of staff.

The Senate must approve all three nominations. Late Wednesday, the Senate Armed Services Committee unanimously voted to approve Petraeus and sent his nomination to the full Senate.

Bush's comments came before an annual gathering with top military brass, a meeting in the Cabinet Room that drew the Joint Chiefs of Staff and combatant commanders to talk about Iraq, Afghanistan, terrorism, maintaining a strong military and the defense budget. Dinner in the residence was planned for afterward.

The meeting came shortly after a Senate committee dismissed the president's decision to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq as "not in the national interest." The Democratic-controlled Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted 12-9 to pass the nonbinding resolution — a rare repudiation of a commander in chief during wartime.

Bush did not mention the vote, but his spokesman said it is not the last word on the president's troop-increase plan.

"The president as commander-in-chief has an obligation to succeed in Iraq and defend Americans, and he believes this is the most effective way to do it," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "We'll see what they have to say down the road."

Congress's Iraq Quagmire (WP)

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

ON TUESDAY nearly every member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee warmly endorsed Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq, and a number wished him success or "Godspeed" in his mission. Yesterday some of the same senators voted for a resolution that opposes the increase of troops for Gen. Petraeus's command -- even though the general testified that he could not accomplish his mission without the additional forces and hinted that such a resolution could encourage the enemy. Such is the muddle of Congress on Iraq: A majority may soon go on record opposing the new offensive in Baghdad even while encouraging the commander who leads it.

That's not to say that senators who are piling on to bipartisan resolutions drawn up by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) or Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) don't have good reasons for skepticism. We share some of their main concerns: that the Iraqi government won't deliver on the long list of "benchmarks" the administration has set and that U.S. troops will end up fighting on one or both sides of an ugly sectarian war. Even if the objective of pacifying Baghdad with American troops were a good one, it's not clear that enough troops are being sent for long enough to succeed.

It doesn't help that accounts of the new plan given by its principal architects vary significantly. Gen. Petraeus said in his Senate testimony that the goal is to protect the Iraqi population in Baghdad so that reconstruction and the political process can move forward. The man he will replace, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., and his spokesmen say the idea is to accelerate training and the handover of security operations to Iraqis. So does Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who seems to barely tolerate the plan for additional American troops.

The outgoing Iraq commander has said two additional U.S. brigades could accomplish the mission. The incoming general says he has asked that orders be issued for all five brigades and stressed that he has the authority to ask for further reinforcements. He testified: "None of this will be rapid. In fact, the way ahead will be neither quick nor easy."

Our guess is that it is Gen. Petraeus's concept that will govern U.S. actions on the ground. Until now, Gen. Petraeus had been the most successful American commander in the war; in that sense senators are right to support him and quickly approve his nomination. But legislators need a better way to act on their opposition to the current policy than the passage of nonbinding resolutions that may cover them politically but have no practical impact -- other than, perhaps, the negative one suggested by the general.

As it happens, Gen. Petraeus made his own suggestion at Tuesday's hearing, offering to report to Congress regularly about the mission, including updates on the performance by Iraqis on their commitments. "I want to assure you that should I determine that the new strategy cannot succeed, I will provide such an assessment," he said. Taking Gen. Petraeus up on that, and closely and systematically monitoring the progress of events in Iraq during the coming months, is probably the best contribution that Congress can make to helping the new American commander address what he calls a "dire" situation.

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Vice President Cheney said yesterday that the administration has achieved "enormous successes" in Iraq but complained that critics and the media "are so eager to write off this effort or declare it a failure" that they are undermining U.S. troops in a war zone, striking a far more combative tone than President Bush did in his State of the Union address the night before.

In a television interview that turned increasingly contentious as it wore on, Cheney rejected the gloomy portrayal of Iraq that has become commonly accepted even among Bush supporters. "There's problems" in Iraq, he said, but it is not a "terrible situation." And congressional opposition "won't stop us" from sending 21,500 more troops, he said, it will only "validate the terrorists' strategy."

The defiant tenor contrasted sharply with Bush's speech Tuesday night, when the president congratulated Democrats on their election victory, offered to work with them on a variety of domestic policies, and told skeptics of his latest Iraq plan that he respects their arguments even as he asked them to give him one more chance to win the war. Bush acknowledged deep troubles in Iraq and made little effort to paint it a success. In a recent interview, Bush said his old policy was heading for "slow failure."

Cheney, on the other hand, rejected the idea that there has been any failure and gave voice to the aggravation many in the White House feel as Democrats step up their attacks on the administration. As leading Democrats lace their rhetoric with words such as "blunder" and "reckless," the White House has tried to calibrate how hard to push back. On a day when the Senate Foreign Relations Committee passed a resolution denouncing Bush's troop increase, Cheney decided not to hold back.

"The pressure is from some quarters to get out of Iraq," he told CNN. "If we were to do that, we would simply validate the terrorists' strategy that says the Americans will not stay to complete the task, that we don't have the stomach for the fight."

Cheney said the administration would disregard the nonbinding resolution opposing the troop increase and suggested it undermines soldiers in a war zone. "It won't stop us," he said. "And it would be, I think, detrimental from the standpoint of the troops."

Cheney has been criticized in the past for presenting what some called an overly rosy view of the situation in Iraq, most notably in 2005 when he said the insurgency was in its "last throes." The view he expressed yesterday seemed no less positive, and he sparred repeatedly with "Situation Room" host Wolf Blitzer, telling him "you're wrong" and suggesting he was embracing defeat.

When Blitzer asked whether the administration's credibility had been hurt by "the blunders and the failures" in Iraq, Cheney interjected: "Wolf, Wolf, I simply don't accept the premise of your question. I just think it's hogwash."

In fact, Cheney said, the operation in Iraq has achieved its original mission. "What we did in Iraq in taking down Saddam Hussein was exactly the right thing to do," he said. "The world is much safer today because of it. There have been three national elections in Iraq. There's a democracy established there, a constitution, a new democratically elected government. Saddam has been brought to justice and executed. His sons are dead. His government is gone."

"If he were still there today," Cheney added, "we'd have a terrible situation."

"But there is," Blitzer said.

"No, there is not," Cheney retorted. "There is not. There's problems -- ongoing problems -- but we have in fact accomplished our objectives of getting rid of the old regime, and there is a new regime in place that's been here for less than a year, far too soon for you guys to write them off." He added: "Bottom line is that we've had enormous successes and we will continue to have enormous successes."

Cheney said Blitzer was advocating retreat. "What you're recommending, or at least what you seem to believe the right course is, is to bail out," the vice president said.

"I'm just asking," Blitzer objected.

"No, you're not asking."

Blitzer has been in the Cheney doghouse since October, when he interviewed the vice president's wife, Lynne, and asked about steamy scenes in a novel she wrote. The subject came up because James Webb, a Democrat then running for Senate from Virginia, had cited her novel in trying to defend explicit scenes he had written. Lynne Cheney angrily rebuffed Blitzer, and her husband later congratulated her for what he called "the slapdown."

Yesterday, the CNN host mentioned that Cheney's lesbian daughter, Mary, has become pregnant and asked whether he wanted to respond to conservatives who have criticized her.

"I'm delighted I'm about to have a sixth grandchild, Wolf," Cheney said. "And obviously, I think the world of both my daughters and all of my grandchildren. And I think, frankly, you're out of line with that question."

DOJ_NMG_0121526

Blitzer tried to defend himself: "I think all of us appreciate --" Cheney cut him off: "I think you're out of line."

"We like your daughters," Blitzer replied. "Believe me, I'm very sympathetic to Liz and to Mary. I like them both. That was a question that's come up, and it's a responsible, fair question."

"I just fundamentally disagree with you," Cheney said.

Cheney was terse, too, about leading Democrats. Asked whether he thinks Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) would make a good president, Cheney said simply, "No, I don't."

"Why?"

"Because she's a Democrat. I don't agree with her philosophically and from a policy standpoint."

And how did it feel to sit next to Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the first woman to serve as House speaker?

"I prefer Dennis Hastert."

Cheney: Situation In Iraq Not Hopeless (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney said Wednesday it's "hogwash" to suggest the Bush administration's credibility is on the line because of mistakes in Iraq.

Cheney acknowledged the situation in Iraq was very unstable but said toppling Saddam Hussein had been the right thing to do. He said he trusted Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who he said had demonstrated a willingness to take on lawbreakers regardless of their religious or ethnic affiliations.

"The critics have not suggested a policy — they haven't put anything in place," Cheney said in an occasionally testy interview with CNN anchor Wolf Blitzer.

"All they've recommended is to redeploy or to withdraw our forces. The fact is, we can complete the task in Iraq. We're going to do it. We've got (Lt. Gen. David) Petraeus — Gen. Petraeus taking over. It is a good strategy. It will work. But we have to have the stomach to finish the task."

Cheney bristled when asked to respond to critics who question his daughter Mary's decision to have a baby and raise it with her female partner. "I think you're out of line with that question," replied Cheney, who said he was delighted about having a sixth grandchild.

The vice president said he does not think Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York would make a very good president "because she's a Democrat."

Cheney said he believes Osama bin Laden is alive, but would not speculate about whether he might be hiding in Afghanistan, Pakistan or along their shared border. "I don't want to be that precise," Cheney said.

The vice president said passage of a Senate resolution opposing President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq would not change the administration's new strategy in Iraq.

"The Congress has control over the purse strings. They have the right, obviously, if they want, to cut off funding," Cheney said.

"But in terms of this effort, the president has made his decision. We've consulted extensively with them. We'll continue to consult with the Congress. But the fact of the matter is, we need to get the job done."

Asked point-blank if the administration's credibility was at stake, Cheney shot back: "I simply don't accept the premise of your question. I just think it's hogwash."

The vice president said the biggest mistake the United States has made in the war was underestimating the psychological effect the Saddam Hussein regime had on Iraqi citizens.

"I think we underestimated the extent to which 30 years of Saddam's rule had really hammered the population, especially the Shia population, into submissiveness," he said. "It was very hard for them to stand up and take responsibility in part because anybody who had done that in the past had had their heads chopped off."

Cheney Defends Actions In Iraq (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A day after President Bush struck a conciliatory tone toward critics of the Iraq war, Vice President Dick Cheney did the opposite Wednesday, denouncing as "hogwash" the assertion that the administration had lost credibility because of blunders in Iraq.

Cheney defended the decision to invade Iraq nearly four years ago, and insisted that "there's been a lot of success" since then. His comments came during a CNN interview, an exception to the vice president's more common practice of talking to conservative media outlets.

"There's problems, ongoing problems, but we have, in fact, accomplished our objectives of getting rid of the old regime," Cheney said, adding that "there is a new regime in place that's been there for less than a year, far too soon for you guys to write them off."

In his annual State of the Union address the previous evening, Bush acknowledged a string of setbacks in Iraq over the past year, but urged Congress not to give up.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq," Bush conceded, "but it is the fight we're in. Every one of us wishes this war were over and won."

By contrast, Cheney suggested that the administration's critics were "dead wrong" about the war.

"For the first time, we've had elections, and majority rule will prevail there. But the notion that somehow the effort hasn't been worth it, or that we shouldn't go ahead and complete the task, is just dead wrong," Cheney said.

Recent polls show increasing public dissatisfaction with the war and a majority of Americans say that the war was not worth the effort. A Gallup poll earlier this month showed 58 percent of respondents agreeing that the costs of the war outweighed its benefits and roughly the same number -- 59 percent -- said they opposed the president's plan to send more troops to stabilize Baghdad.

Cheney long has been a polarizing figure for the administration, which is one reason why he has generally limited his public appearances to conservative groups. But in recent months, Cheney has become an increasingly problematic figure even among stalwart Republicans, in part for his defense of former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Rumsfeld, who drew the wrath of Republicans as well as Democrats for refusing to acknowledge failures or to shift strategy in Iraq, was forced to resign after Republican losses in November elections put control of Congress in Democrats' hands for the first time in Bush's two-term presidency.

During the CNN interview, Wolf Blitzer noted that Democrats and some Republicans "are now seriously questioning your credibility because of the blunders, of the failures."

"Wolf, I simply don't accept the premise of your question," Cheney responded. "I just think its hogwash."

Cheney generally spoke in soothing tones during the televised interview, which also touched on topics ranging from the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden to whether Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., would make a good president. But his words were combative.

"No, I don't," the vice president replied to the Clinton question.

"Why?" asked the interviewer.

But it was when Blitzer asked about his daughter's pregnancy that Cheney's words became most aggressive. Mary Cheney, who is openly lesbian and involved a long-term homosexual partnership, is pregnant with what will be the vice president's sixth grandchild.

In his question, Blitzer cited a statement by Focus on the Family, a conservative organization critical of the pregnancy. "Just because it's possible to conceive a child outside of the relationship of a married mother and father, doesn't mean it's best for the child," the group said last month.

"I'm delighted I'm about to have a sixth grandchild, Wolf, and obviously think the world of both of my daughters and all of my grandchildren. And I think, frankly, you're out of line with that question," Cheney said.

Later in the day, White House spokesman Tony Snow defended the vice president's responses about his daughter.

"People should not be trying to draw family members in," Snow said on Fox News Channel. "I think that family members ought to be off the limits."

Cheney Increasingly On The Defensive (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON - Vice President Dick Cheney, often considered the hidden power behind the White House throne, is increasingly out in the open and on the defensive.

He's scheduled to testify at the perjury trial of his former top aide; congressional Democrats want to probe his role in the White House; and his unprecedented clout may be waning. Once widely considered a source of wisdom and experience in the White House, the vice president has become a frequent target of criticism.

DOJ_NMG_0121528

On Wednesday, a testy Cheney sparred with CNN anchor Wolf Blitzer over Iraq and al-Qaida and insisted that Bush administration policies have succeeded in both cases. While he's acknowledged mistakes in Iraq, he bristled when Blitzer suggested that Cheney had lost credibility because of blunders there.

"I just simply don't accept the premise of your question," he said, cutting the interviewer off in mid-sentence. "I just think it's hogwash."

Even some Republican lawmakers have become increasingly vocal about their concerns over Cheney's role in the administration, especially as an aggressive and influential advocate for invading Iraq. He's also been instrumental in White House efforts to expand presidential power and restrict civil liberties in the pursuit of suspected terrorists.

"The president listened too much to the vice president," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., told The Politico, a new Capitol Hill publication. McCain, a leading GOP presidential hopeful for 2008, said Bush was "very badly served" by Cheney and former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was one of Cheney's closest allies.

Democrats have been more scathing.

"The vice president doesn't know what he's talking about," Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, told Fox News last Sunday. "He has yet to be right one single time on Iraq. Name me one single time he's been right. It's about time we stop listening to that ideological rhetoric."

Cheney insisted on CNN Wednesday that "there's been a lot of success" in Iraq, and said that if the Senate passes a non-binding resolution opposing the administration's troop buildup there, "it won't stop us." The biggest threat to victory, he said, is if "we don't have the stomach for the fight."

The vice president also claimed success in weakening al-Qaida, removing the terrorist group's leadership below Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, "several times". "We've had great success against al-Qaida," Cheney said.

Democrats, emboldened by their recent takeover of Congress, say they may hold hearings to probe Cheney's roles in the Iraq war, Bush's expansion of presidential power and the administration's energy policies. Critics, including some former administration officials, have accused Cheney of pressuring intelligence analysts to support the case for war and promoting intelligence from Iraqi exile groups that proved to be bogus.

White House officials say Bush values Cheney's advice as much as ever, but there's little doubt that the vice president has lost some clout. His ally Rumsfeld was recently replaced by Defense Secretary Robert Gates, whose views aren't always in sync with the vice president's.

In another step back from Cheney's hard-line approach, the administration announced last week that it had agreed to stop warrantless wiretapping and instead seek court approval for any surveillance. Cheney had insisted that court oversight wasn't necessary.

The vice president could face more difficulty when he's called to testify at the perjury trial of his former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby. Cheney told CNN that he'd testify "within a matter of weeks."

The case stems from allegations that White House officials disclosed the identity of former CIA spy Valerie Plame because her husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, had challenged the administration's claim that Saddam Hussein had shopped for uranium in the African country of Niger. That claim also proved to be false.

Prosecutors say that Cheney was determined to counter Wilson's criticism and directed Libby to undermine Wilson's credibility with reporters. Libby is charged with obstruction of justice and lying to a grand jury investigating the Plame affair.

Libby's lawyers say that Cheney felt that his aide was made a White House scapegoat to protect presidential adviser Karl Rove, whom Bush was counting on to direct Republican election strategy. Rove has since acknowledged that he tipped off at least one reporter to Plame's identity.

The vice president told CNN he remains "a strong friend and supporter" of Libby's, but he declined to discuss the case.

"This'll all unfold here in the very near future," he told Fox News recently. "I have strong views on this subject, but I'm not going to talk about it."

Rumsfeld's Transition Raises Questions (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has left the Pentagon, but not the Defense Department.

On Jan. 4, Mr. Rumsfeld opened a government-provided transition office in Arlington and has seven Pentagon-paid staffers working for him, a Pentagon official said.

The Pentagon lists Mr. Rumsfeld as a "nonpaid consultant," a status he needs in order to review secret and top-secret documents, the official said.

Mr. Rumsfeld and his aides, who include close adviser Stephen Cambone, are sifting through the thousands of pages of documents generated during his tenure.

The Pentagon official said former secretaries are entitled to a transition office to sort papers, some of which can be taken with them for a library, for archives or to write a book.

The transition office has raised some eyebrows inside the Pentagon. Some question the size of the staff, which includes two military officers and two enlisted men. They also ask why the sorting could not have been done from the time Mr. Rumsfeld resigned Nov. 8 to when he left the building Dec. 18.

The Pentagon official, who asked not to be named, said Mr. Rumsfeld served nearly six years as secretary, more than any other defense chief but one, meaning he accumulated an above-average pile of paper.

What's more, Mr. Rumsfeld managed the bureaucracy via "snowflakes," his typed directives on white paper that fell all over the Pentagon by the hundreds.

Mr. Rumsfeld, who resigned under pressure after Republicans lost control of Congress in an election largely decided on the stalemated Iraq war, reportedly is undecided about his long-term plans. But he thinks he has a lot to contribute in the debate over new ideas and national security. He has talked about writing a book and articles on foreign affairs, but he has made no final decision.

Mr. Rumsfeld's two immediate predecessors handled their transitions differently.

William Cohen, President Clinton's last defense secretary, went straight to his new consulting firm in Washington, said a top adviser, Robert Tyrer.

The Pentagon set up an office with two military personnel to sort through his papers for about six weeks.

"It was useful to have a place to make sure things were sorted correctly and all issues of classification strictly reviewed and observed," said Mr. Tyrer, who is now president of the Cohen Group.

The unclassified documents were transferred to the University of Maine's William S. Cohen Center, he said.

Mr. Cohen's predecessor, William Perry, left office in January 1997 and returned immediately to his home state of California. He did not open a transition office in Washington. He began teaching at Stanford University, said Deborah Gordon, his spokeswoman.

His papers arrived in compact disc form and were deposited at the Hoover Institution on the Stanford campus, she said.

Pentagon Cuts Stop-loss (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 25, 2007

Secretary of Defense Robert Gates is ordering military service chiefs to reduce the use of a controversial policy intended to keep troops in war zones beyond the end of their original commitments, according to a document obtained by The Hill.

In a memo sent to the service chiefs, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and undersecretaries of defense, Gates asked to see plans to minimize the use of the so-called stop-loss policy for active duty and reserve components by the end of next month.

Gates's directive comes at a time when the White House's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq by 21,500 is coming under intense criticism on both sides of the aisle, in part because it would extend the tours of duty of troops already on the ground and trigger stop-loss orders.

"They're extending and stop-lossing people in the country [Iraq] themselves," Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the House defense appropriations committee and an outspoken critic of the White House's Iraq strategy, said on MSNBC earlier this month. "And it is very unpopular, even with the troops themselves, when they don't understand the mission."

Several House Republicans sent a letter to Gates last week asking that members of the National Guard and Reserve not be kept on active duty beyond their original commitment.

"The stop-loss program is, in essence, a hidden draft," said Rep. Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.), one of the members who wrote to Gates.

The letter to Gates also says that the Pentagon's use of stop-loss "betrays [soldiers'] trust, separates families and threatens to devastate the likelihood that active-duty soldiers will follow up their service with time serving in the reserves."

Reps. Christopher Shays (Conn.), Steven LaTourette (Ohio) and Jim Ramstad (Minn.) also signed the letter to Gates.

A stop-loss order for National Guard and Reserve units activated for the war against terrorism has been in effect since November 2002. The policy allows the Pentagon to keep soldiers whose enlistment is due to expire in order to maintain troop strength and unit integrity.

Specifically, the president may suspend any provision of law relating to promotion, retirement, or separation applicable to any member of the armed forces whom the president determines is essential to the national security of the United States.

But the policy has attracted a myriad of lawsuits from reservists who have argued that the policy illegally makes them stay in the military once their required term of service is complete.

The Pentagon has successfully argued that under federal law it can extend the deployment of any reserve officer who is on active duty, if the president believes doing so is essential to national security.

For the Pentagon, stop-loss orders are a tool to stem a large reduction of personnel and maximize cohesion and experience for units fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Gates's directive to reduce the use of stop-loss is part of a wider initiative to change deployment policies for reserve forces and the use of the so-called total force, which encompasses both active and reserve units.

In the memo, Gates outlines the changes to the deployment of reserve and active forces, which he first announced the day after Bush announced his new Iraq strategy.

Members of the reserve forces will have an involuntary deployment time for one year, followed by five years on their home bases.

But there may be some exceptions to that policy.

"Today's global demands will require a number of selected Guard/Reserve to be remobilized sooner than this standard," Gates wrote. "Our intention is that such be temporary."

However, he urged the services to plan their force structure based on a one-year deployment time and five years of demobilization.

Meanwhile, ground combat and combat support will be managed on a unit basis. "This will allow greater cohesion and predictability in how these Reserve units train and deploy," Gates said. "Exceptions will require my approval."

Active-duty forces will deploy for one year at a time and will spend two years at their home bases, according to Gates. Currently most active units deploy for one year and spend just one year at their home bases, after which they immediately deploy again.

For those in the active and reserve force who have to deploy earlier and often, or have to extend their tours beyond the rotation policy, Gates is planning to establish a compensation and incentives program, according to the memo.

The Pentagon chief is also directing all commands and units to review how they administer a so-called hardship waiver program to ensure that they are properly taking into account exceptional circumstances facing military families of deployed service members.

Bush Plans New Focus On Afghan Recovery (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

After the bloodiest year in Afghanistan since the U.S. invasion, the Bush administration is preparing a series of new military, economic and political initiatives aimed partly at preempting an expected offensive this spring by Taliban insurgents, according to senior U.S. officials.

Even as it trumpeted a change of course in Iraq this month, the White House has completed a review of U.S. policy in Afghanistan. It will ask Congress for $7 billion to $8 billion in new funds for security, reconstruction and other projects in Afghanistan as part of the upcoming budget package, officials said.

That would represent a sizable increase in the U.S. commitment to the strife-torn country; since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban, the United States has provided a little more than $14 billion in assistance for Afghanistan, the State Department says.

The U.S. military said yesterday that about 3,500 soldiers in the Army's 10th Mountain Division will have their tours in Afghanistan extended by four months, as part of an effort to beef up U.S. troop strength. And Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will meet with other NATO foreign ministers in Brussels on Friday to discuss Afghanistan, part of a new diplomatic offensive U.S. officials say is aimed at securing more international support for the government of President Hamid Karzai.

Although U.S. officials say the Taliban insurgency does not pose an immediate threat to the Karzai government, they are eager to nip in the bud a potentially bloody Taliban spring offensive that could erode Afghani confidence in the central government and in the staying power of the international coalition that is trying to establish security across the country.

Violence escalated last year in Afghanistan as allied forces confronted an emboldened Taliban movement in the south, and the central government encountered continuing problems providing basic services. Many government and outside experts on Afghanistan are also worried that the border regions between Pakistan and Afghanistan are once again turning into safe havens for Taliban militants and their al-Qaeda allies. One senior official said the Taliban maintains "command and control" of the insurgency from Pakistan.

"Everyone talks about the Taliban military offensive this spring," said Kurt D. Volker, a senior State Department official involved with NATO policy. "We should be the ones taking the offensive if there is an offensive to be done. . . . It needs to be across the board. It's not just a military issue; it's a comprehensive issue -- development, counternarcotics, reconstruction and military." Volker said U.S. officials want to cut off the Taliban's ability to impose its will on groups in Afghanistan.

The U.S. politics surrounding Afghanistan offer an intriguing counterpoint to the U.S. politics regarding Iraq. While most Democrats fiercely oppose President Bush's plan to send another 21,000 troops to Iraq, they support a more invigorated battle in Afghanistan. If anything, they say, the administration has neglected Afghanistan, failing to insist that NATO allies assume more of the burden in maintaining stability there.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), the leading Democratic presidential contender for 2008, returned from a trip to Afghanistan and Iraq last week saying U.S. priorities are "upside down" in the focus on Iraq. She told reporters, "We should be adding more American military forces [in Afghanistan], and we should be requiring the NATO countries to fulfill their commitments to the forces that they had promised us."

Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, said he complained sharply to Rice this week about what he called an "appalling" lack of willingness to share the burden in Afghanistan by key allies like Germany and France. "I sense that fundamentally she agrees with me," Lantos added.

The issue of burden-sharing has been a flashpoint for trans-Atlantic relations as NATO has gradually taken over much of the responsibility for security in Afghanistan in the past two years. There are about 34,000 NATO troops in Afghanistan, including about 12,000 U.S. soldiers, and another 12,000 U.S. troops operate there under U.S. command, according to Pentagon figures.

Bush and other U.S. officials have been pressing countries such as Germany, Italy and Spain to lift restrictions on their troops being deployed to the more violent southern areas of Afghanistan, where the Taliban insurgency is strongest. NATO countries did not fully meet former NATO supreme commander James L. Jones's calls for additional troops and equipment.

Jones's successor as NATO commander, Army Gen. Bantz J. Craddock, is working on a new assessment of troop and equipment needs for Afghanistan, and when that is complete, U.S. officials say, they will be pressing allies to help provide additional support for the mission. As officials described it, they are talking about a possible increase of several thousand troops for Afghanistan -- not all in U.S. contributions.

One senior administration official said that Rice's trip this week, coupled with follow-up visits by her subordinates and defense officials, are intended to demonstrate to European governments that the United States is committed to Afghanistan and would not abandon it to NATO simply because it was overwhelmed by the turmoil in Iraq.

There are "serious questions across the board" in Europe about the depth of the U.S. commitment, the official said, including worries that the buildup in Iraq would take troops from Afghanistan. The official, like several others interviewed for this article, spoke on the condition of anonymity because the results of the administration's Afghanistan review are not public.

Officials said the review began in the middle of last year and was prompted by a desire to reevaluate U.S. strategy in the wake of political changes in the country, as well as the resurgent Taliban militia. One senior official said a major conclusion of the review was the need to accelerate efforts to build roads, schools and other reconstruction projects in the wake of efforts to clean out insurgents. "We are talking about large amounts of money to kick-start the effort," this source said.

Another senior official involved with Afghanistan policy, offering a private briefing recently, said allied troops are facing a "bloody year in the south" in fighting the Taliban and slow progress in tackling the problems in the country, including corruption, opium production, and lack of roads and other infrastructure. "We still can succeed," he said, but "it is going to be a long project."

Pakistani Premier Faults Afghans For Taliban Woes On Border (NYT)

By Katrin Bennhold And Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 24 — Pakistan's prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, acknowledged Wednesday that people sympathetic to the Taliban were active in the frontier regions near the border with Afghanistan. But he insisted that the root of the problem was the Afghan government's weak authority, not Pakistani support of the Taliban.

"We believe the core of the problem is in Afghanistan," Mr. Aziz said, in an interview at the World Economic Forum here in Davos.

Mr. Aziz also said three million Afghan refugees were crowded into Quetta, Peshawar and other Pakistani cities close to the 1,700 mile-border between the countries. Despite what he described as stepped-up Pakistani efforts to root out extremists, the refugee population remains a recruiting pool for the Taliban insurgency, Mr. Aziz said. But he dismissed allegations that his country was supporting the militants.

DOJ_NMG_0121532

"This notion that Pakistan may be in some way or other supporting these people or giving them safe haven is ridiculous," he said.

As for suspicions that elements in Pakistan's intelligence service, the I.S.I., might be acting independently in support of the Taliban, he said, "That's equally ridiculous."

"The Pakistani intelligence service is a disciplined service, and they act in line with the government," Mr. Aziz insisted.

On Sunday, a correspondent for The New York Times, Carlotta Gall, reported that she had found anecdotal evidence in and around Quetta to support charges by Western diplomats and Pakistani opposition figures that the Pakistani intelligence agencies were encouraging the Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan.

While reporting in Quetta, Ms. Gall was assaulted by plainclothes intelligence agents in her hotel room, and her photographer, Akhtar Soomro, was detained. Their computers, notes and cellphones were taken, and since then Pakistani agents have tracked down their sources. Ms. Gall said her visa to report in Pakistan had no restrictions.

Mr. Aziz said Ms. Gall "should not have been where she was, legally," and that she had violated the terms of her visa by visiting Quetta without authorization from the government. He added that it was "regrettable she got bruised in that interaction" and said the government was investigating the matter.

"We don't condone behavior that is physical harassment," Mr. Aziz said. "That's not on."

Pakistan has come under increasing criticism from NATO officials and Western leaders for not doing enough to clamp down on terrorist networks. This month, in his most recent threat assessment, the American director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, said Al Qaeda continued to operate from "their leaders' secure hide-out in Pakistan."

Mr. Aziz said the Pakistani government did not know the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden, Al Qaeda's leader, or of Mullah Muhammad Omar, the leader of the Taliban. But he said, "Certainly they are not in Pakistan."

On Wednesday, President Pervez Musharraf dismissed allegations that Pakistani officials were sheltering the head of the Taliban, and said the United States-led war in Afghanistan could not be won without Pakistan's help, [a news agency] reported from Abu Dhabi, capital of the United Arab Emirates.

"The fight against terrorism and extremism, whether it is Al Qaeda or Taliban, can never succeed without Pakistan's cooperation and Pakistan is the only country that has delivered the maximum on both," Mr. Musharraf said at a news conference in Abu Dhabi.

Troops Battle Insurgents In Central Baghdad (WP)

By Ernesto Londono And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 -- With attack helicopters circling overhead, U.S. and Iraqi forces waged an intense battle Wednesday to clear armed men from high-rise buildings in a strategic Baghdad neighborhood that had been the scene of a similar day of combat two weeks ago.

The fighting along Haifa Street, a Sunni-dominated area on the west bank of the Tigris River, began before dawn and lasted well into the day, with insurgents firing down from tall buildings, U.S. military officials said.

"We have intelligence information that the terrorist group is back and trying to take some other places," said Ali Dabbagh, a spokesman for the prime minister. "It's a very strategic and important location. It's in the middle of Baghdad; it has a view of all of Baghdad."

The recurring fighting on Haifa Street illustrates the severe challenges facing the 17,500 additional U.S. troops that President Bush plans to send to Baghdad to try to secure the city. In a treacherous, cramped urban setting, and surrounded by civilians, U.S. and Iraqi troops have repeatedly fought for control of neighborhoods in the capital, only to have insurgents return to fight again.

On Wednesday, U.S. and Iraqi forces came under attack around Haifa Street and responded with mortar fire, the military said in a statement. "As light broke on the city, troops met enemy resistance, including hand-held grenades, small arms fire and rocket-propelled grenades from high-rise buildings," the statement said.

Explosions could be heard coming from the area and thick black smoke rose above the high-rises that line the street. The military said it seized a cache of weapons, including numerous rocket-propelled grenades and antitank rounds, during the raid.

More than 30 "terrorists" were arrested during the operation and roughly 25 were killed, Dabbagh said Wednesday night. A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, said he was aware of seven arrests and did not know whether anyone had died.

A U.S. soldier died Wednesday in central Baghdad after being shot, the military said in a statement. It was unclear whether the soldier died in the Haifa Street operation.

The military also disclosed Wednesday that two Marines were killed Tuesday in Anbar province, west of Baghdad.

The U.S. ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, told reporters Wednesday that he was encouraged by early indications that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was taking a tougher stance against Shiite militias in Baghdad.

"We will have to wait and see what happens, but I believe that recent trends . . . [are] more positive than in the past," Khalilzad said. "But there is ongoing concern about death squad activities, about the future of the militias, concern that they might be lying low, avoiding a conflict now, in order to fight another day."

Speaking at the embassy in Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone, Khalilzad questioned whether radical Shiite Muslim cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, leader of the powerful Mahdi Army militia, was sincere in his appeals to end the violence. "Is it a change of tactic or is it a change of heart?"

Khalilzad said Maliki's change of stance was likely driven by the failure of political engagement with Sadr and other Iraqi factions to slow the sectarian killing.

This week, the U.S. military said in a statement that Iraqi and U.S.-led troops had launched 52 operations against the Mahdi Army and that 600 militiamen were in detention, including 16 high-level figures. In previous efforts to pacify Baghdad, Maliki has failed to rein in Shiite militias.

Khalilzad also discussed briefly the five American security contractors, employees of Blackwater USA, who were killed in Baghdad on Tuesday. U.S. officials have said a Blackwater helicopter was shot down while assisting a U.S. Embassy convoy that came under attack in central Baghdad.

"We lost five fine men," Khalilzad said. "They helped me, I've traveled with them, so I went and visited them and saw them while in the morgue yesterday. I felt very bad, because as I said, I knew these people."

Khalilzad said the helicopter crash was under investigation. U.S. officials on Wednesday did not confirm reports that some of the contractors might have been shot after their small helicopter crashed.

A Sunni insurgent group known as the 1920 Revolution Brigades posted a video clip on the Internet that purports to show the downed Blackwater helicopter smoldering near a building and the corpses of at least two men. The authenticity of the video could not be verified.

In Baghdad, police said Wednesday that they had found 17 bodies of people shot in the head during the past 24 hours. Also Wednesday, mortar shells killed at least six civilians, while makeshift bombs in markets killed at least eight, according to Brig. Gen. Abdullah Muhsin of the Interior Ministry.

Street Battles Kill 30 Militants (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. and Iraqi troops clashed with gunmen firing heavy weapons from concrete high-rises in a Sunni insurgent stronghold north of the heavily fortified Green Zone yesterday. Iraqi's Defense Ministry said as many as 30 militants were killed and 27 captured.

Apache attack helicopters buzzed past the tall buildings and radio towers, with several Humvees on the tree-lined street below. Gunfire rang in the background as shells fell, according to AP Television News footage.

Black smoke rose from the area, on the west bank of the Tigris River about one mile north of the Green Zone, site of the U.S. and British embassies as well as the Iraqi government headquarters. The clashes were the second major fighting to break out in the area in less than a month.

New details also emerged about the downing of a private U.S. security company helicopter on Tuesday, with U.S. and Iraqi officials saying four of five Americans who died in the incident were shot execution-style -- in the back of the head.

A senior Iraqi military official said a machine gunner downed the helicopter, but a U.S. military official in Washington said there were no indications that the aircraft, owned by Blackwater USA, had been shot out of the sky. Two Sunni insurgent groups, separately, took responsibility for the crash.

A Sunni insurgent group called the Ansar al-Sunnah Army posted identity cards of men who were on the helicopter on a Web site, including at least two that bore the name of Arthur Laguna, who was later identified by his mother as among those killed.

Mr. Laguna, was a 52-year-old pilot for Blackwater who previously served in the Army and the California National Guard, said his mother, Lydia Laguna, of Rio Linda, Calif. She said she received a call from her other son, also a Blackwater pilot in Baghdad, notifying her of Mr. Laguana's death.

There were conflicting numbers of insurgents reported killed and captured in yesterday's fighting, which began before dawn. Iraq's Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari said 30 insurgents were killed and 27 arrested, including four Egyptians and a Sudanese man.

The U.S. military said seven suspected insurgents were detained, and rocket-propelled grenades, anti-tank rounds and 155 mm artillery rounds were seized. The U.S. statement did not mention deaths.

The military reported separately that a U.S. soldier was killed yesterday in clashes near the city's center. Officials declined to give more specifics or say whether it was connected to the Haifa Street fighting. The military also said that two Marines were killed Tuesday in western Anbar province.

U.S. and Iraqi troops are gearing up for a broader security crackdown to quell the sectarian violence in the capital. Mr. al-Askari said the fighting yesterday was not part of that plan.

Haifa Street has been the site of numerous clashes, including a major battle on Jan. 9, just three days after Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced his new security plan for pacifying Baghdad.

U.S., Iraqi Forces Work To Tame 'Sniper Alley' (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Attack helicopters pumped rockets at gunmen holed up in office towers and apartment blocks Wednesday, as U.S. and Iraqi forces swept through a notorious Sunni-insurgent enclave in the heart of Baghdad.

The U.S. military said the fighting around Haifa Street was part of a new offensive launched before dawn to disrupt illegal militias and bring the volatile area at the heart of Baghdad under the control of Iraqi security forces.

The attack began within hours after President Bush, in his State of the Union speech, urged Congress to get behind his plan to boost troops and crackdown on violence in Baghdad and other volatile areas of Iraq.

The low thud of mortar blasts rocked the capital for hours, and smoke billowed into the sky above Haifa Street, dubbed "Sniper Alley," which U.S. and Iraqi forces have struggled to tame.

It was the second time this month that U.S. and Iraqi forces clashed with insurgents on the commercial and residential street just north of the Green Zone, which is home to the U.S. and British embassies, as well as the Iraqi parliament.

Iraqi officials said the operation was not part of a planned security offensive for the capital, but that it would prepare the way for a more concerted ground effort to clear out and hold troubled neighborhoods.

"What kind of security plan is this?" asked one terrified resident, who spent the morning cowering in his home near Haifa Street. "They are destroying us, pounding an area less than 1-square-kilometer with mortars, shells from helicopters and their tanks."

As many as 31 gunmen were killed and 35 detained Wednesday, including numerous foreign fighters, the Ministry of Defense said in a statement. The U.S. military confirmed only seven arrests.

At least one U.S. soldier was killed in small-arms fire in central Baghdad Wednesday, the military said, but it did not specify whether the death was related to the Haifa offensive.

The U.S. military also announced the deaths of two Marines in combat Tuesday in Anbar province, west of the capital, bringing the total number of U.S. personnel killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003 to 3,063, according to the Web site icasualties.org.

In the Haifa Street sweep, Iraqi soldiers and police were joined by elements of the U.S. 2nd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, and the 3rd Stryker Brigade Combat team, 2nd Infantry Division for the operation dubbed Tomahawk Strike 11.

Iraqi forces said they uncovered a large weapons cache near Karkh High School, where the late President Saddam Hussein studied in his youth. Numerous rocket-propelled grenades, as well as anti-tank and artillery rounds were seized, the U.S. military said.

Sunni political and religious leaders protested the operation, which Adnan al-Dulaimi, a lawmaker with the main Sunni bloc, called "barbaric."

Residents accused the United States of unwittingly aiding Shiite Muslim militiamen accused of trying to force the mostly Sunni Arab inhabitants from their homes in recent weeks, as part of a pattern of sectarian cleansing that is redrawing the map of the once largely integrated capital.

The U.S. military stressed in a statement that the operation did not target only Sunni insurgents, but was "rather aimed at rapidly isolating all active insurgents and gaining control of this key central Baghdad location."

Bush has pledged to send about 17,500 troops to Baghdad and another 4,000 to western Anbar province to help Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki quell the violence, despite opposition from Democrats who now control both houses of Congress. Critics say the plan risks drawing U.S. troops into a complicated civil war and exposes them to the possibility of increased casualties.

Wednesday's battle took place across the river from the site where a private helicopter crashed Tuesday. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad offered his condolences Wednesday for five killed contractors from Blackwater USA, which provides security to U.S. officials and other clients in Baghdad.

In A New Joint U.S.-Iraqi Patrol, The Americans Go First (NYT)

By Damien Cave And James Glanz

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 — In the battle for Baghdad, Haifa Street has changed hands so often that it has taken on the feel of a no man's land, the deadly space between opposing trenches. On Wednesday, as American and Iraqi troops poured in, the street showed why it is such a sensitive gauge of an urban conflict marked by front lines that melt into confusion, enemies with no clear identity and allies who disappear or do not show up at all.

In a miniature version of the troop increase that the United States hopes will secure the city, American soldiers and armored vehicles raced onto Haifa Street before dawn to dislodge Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias who have been battling for a stretch of ragged slums and mostly abandoned high rises. But as the sun rose, many of the Iraqi Army units who were supposed to do the actual searches of the buildings did not arrive on time, forcing the Americans to start the job on their own.

When the Iraqi units finally did show up, it was with the air of a class outing, cheering and laughing as the Americans blew locks off doors with shotguns. As the morning wore on and the troops came under fire from all directions, another apparent flaw in this strategy became clear as empty apartments became lairs for gunmen who flitted from window to window and killed at least one American soldier, with a shot to the head.

Whether the gunfire was coming from Sunni or Shiite insurgents or militia fighters or some of the Iraqi soldiers who had disappeared into the Gotham-like cityscape, no one could say.

"Who the hell is shooting at us?" shouted Sgt. First Class Marc Biletski, whose platoon was jammed into a small room off an alley that was being swept by a sniper's bullets. "Who's shooting at us? Do we know who they are?"

Just before the platoon tossed smoke bombs and sprinted through the alley to a more secure position, Sergeant Biletski had a moment to reflect on this spot, which the United States has now fought to regain from a mysterious enemy at least three times in the past two years.

"This place is a failure," Sergeant Biletski said. "Every time we come here, we have to come back."

He paused, then said, "Well, maybe not a total failure," since American troops have smashed opposition on Haifa Street each time they have come in.

With that, Sergeant Biletski ran through the billowing yellow smoke and took up a new position.

The Haifa Street operation, involving Bradley Fighting Vehicles as well as the highly mobile Stryker vehicles, is likely to cause plenty of reflection by the commanders in charge of the Baghdad buildup of more than 20,000 troops. Just how those extra troops will be used is not yet known, but it is likely to mirror at least broadly the Haifa Street strategy of working with Iraqi forces to take on unruly groups from both sides of the Sunni-Shiite sectarian divide.

The commander of the operation, Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley of the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, Second Infantry Division, said his forces were not interested in whether opposition came from bullets fired by Sunnis or by Shiites. He conceded that the cost of letting the Iraqi forces learn on the job was to add to the risk involved in the operation.

"This was an Iraqi-led effort and with that come challenges and risks," Colonel Smiley said. "It can be organized chaos."

The American units in the operation began moving up Haifa Street from the south by 2 a.m. on Wednesday. A platoon of B Company in the Stryker Brigade secured the roof of a high rise, where an Eminem poster was stuck on the wall of what appeared to be an Iraqi teenager's room on the top floor. But in a pattern that would be repeated again and again in a series of buildings, there was no one in the apartment.

Many of the Iraqi units that showed up late never seemed to take the task seriously, searching haphazardly, breaking dishes and rifling through personal CD collections in the apartments. Eventually the Americans realized that the Iraqis were searching no more than half of the apartments; at one point the Iraqis completely disappeared, leaving the American unit working with them flabbergasted.

"Where did they go?" yelled Sgt. Jeri A. Gillett. Another soldier suggested, "I say we just let them go and we do this ourselves."

Then the gunfire began. It would come from high rises across the street, from behind trash piles and sandbags in alleys and from so many other directions that the soldiers began to worry that the Iraqi soldiers were firing at them. Mortars started dropping from across the Tigris River, to the east, in the direction of a Shiite slum.

The only thing that was clear was that no one knew who the enemy was. "The thing is, we wear uniforms — they don't," said Specialist Terry Wilson.

At one point the Americans were forced to jog alongside the Strykers on Haifa Street, sheltering themselves as best they could from the gunfire. The Americans finally found the Iraqis and ended up accompanying them into an extremely dangerous and exposed warren of low-slung hovels behind the high rises as gunfire rained down.

American officers tried to persuade the Iraqi soldiers to leave the slum area for better cover, but the Iraqis refused to risk crossing a lane that was being raked by machine-gun fire. "It's their show," said Lt. David Stroud, adding that the Americans have orders to defer to the Iraqis in cases like this.

In this surreal setting, about 20 American soldiers were forced at one point to pull themselves one by one up a canted tin roof by a dangling rubber hose and then shimmy along a ledge to another hut. The soldiers were stunned when a small child suddenly walked out of a darkened doorway and an old man started wheezing and crying somewhere inside.

Ultimately the group made it back to the high rises and escaped the sniper in the alley by throwing out the smoke bombs and sprinting to safety. Even though two Iraqis were struck by gunfire, many of the rest could not stop shouting and guffawing with amusement as they ran through the smoke.

One Iraqi soldier in the alley pointed his rifle at an American reporter and pulled the trigger. There was only a click: the weapon had no ammunition. The soldier laughed at his joke.

Iraqi Official Offers Terms From Militia To Avoid Fight (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 — An Iraqi official authorized to speak on behalf of field commanders for the country's most powerful militia has approached Western military officials and laid out a plan to avoid armed confrontation, senior Iraqi and American officials said this week.

The official is Rahim al-Daraji, the elected mayor of the Sadr City district, the vast grid in the northeast corner of the capital that is the stronghold of the militia, the Mahdi Army. Mr. Daraji has met twice in the past two weeks with Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, a British officer who is the deputy commanding general in Iraq, said a senior Iraqi official in the office of the prime minister.

During the meetings, which took place on Jan. 17 and, most recently, on Monday, Mr. Daraji laid out a proposal from what he said were all the major political and militia groups in Sadr City, the senior Iraqi official said. The groups were eager to head off a major American military offensive in the district, home to two million Shiites, as the Americans begin a sweeping new effort to retake the streets of Baghdad.

Mr. Daraji said in an interview that field commanders would forbid their foot soldiers to carry guns in public if the American military and the Iraqi government met several basic demands, mostly involving ways to ensure better security for Sadr City. He is communicating with the commanders through a Shiite politician who is close to them.

"The task is to eliminate the armed presence in Sadr City," he said. "To confiscate illegal weapons," carried openly by militia members in public places.

The talks appeared to have been the first between an intermediary for the Mahdi militia and a senior commander from the American effort. The military fought the militia twice in 2004, and the militia's leader, Moktada al-Sadr, a renegade cleric who is virulently anti-American, has resolutely refused to meet with American officials of any kind.

Even so, it was far from clear whether Mr. Daraji, who said he was not related to Abdel Hadi al-Daraji, the former spokesman for Mr. Sadr who was arrested on murder charges last week, was even able to speak for the sprawling, grass-roots militia, which, according to American military estimates, numbers at least 7,000 in Baghdad alone.

Saleh al-Agheli, a member of Parliament from Mr. Sadr's political bloc, said the bloc's political committee had "blessed and supported" the effort by Mr. Daraji.

The meetings were very preliminary, officials stressed, and came as the American military was stepping up pressure on Mr. Sadr's militia. It was not clear how American officials received the efforts. They are already making some headway against Shiite militias without help from Mr. Daraji and his supporters.

A spokesman for General Lamb declined to comment. "The general meets with a number of people in the course of his duty," he said. "We respect the confidence of those meetings."

The American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, confirmed that meetings had taken place and said that Mr. Daraji had told representatives from the American Embassy and from the military that local residents would not challenge weapons searches by American soldiers.

"He said all the right things at this point," Mr. Khalilzad said, but added that it was too soon to tell if the offer would lead to anything more concrete.

Controlling the militia — at the heart of the new strategy President Bush announced this month — is no easy task. Mr. Sadr's political bloc was instrumental in installing Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and he has often gone out of his way to protect Mr. Sadr's allies.

But in recent months, Mr. Maliki appears to have changed his approach, Mr. Khalilzad said, allowing for more arrests and for the Americans to apply tough military action. Talks with Mr. Sadr had not produced the desired results, Mr. Khalilzad said.

"He felt that he had exhausted and relied too much on political engagement," Mr. Khalilzad said in a news briefing. "He became disappointed that he didn't produce as much results as he would have hoped."

Mr. Daraji said he represented 14 political and military groups in Sadr City. He said local residents, including Mahdi Army commanders, wanted to find ways to work with the Americans to avoid any large-scale confrontation. Commanders would tell militiamen to keep their weapons off the streets, he said, if Americans agreed to certain demands.

Some of the actions Mr. Daraji said he had requested in exchange for the promises from the militias seemed likely to draw stony stares from American military officials, namely to stop conducting raids in Sadr City and to release a number of those who had been arrested.

But other demands — to provide jobs for Sadr City residents, to bring in new construction projects and to triple the number of police stations there — seemed more realistic.

The government official, who works as an aide to Mr. Maliki, said he trusted Mr. Daraji.

"There is an honesty with this man," said the official. "The chances for success are higher than before."

Palestinians Under Pressure To Leave Iraq (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 -- The shouting in his Baghdad apartment building woke Luay Mohammed seconds before intruders broke down his door.

The men, some wearing police uniforms, entered before dawn demanding identification cards, Mohammed recalled. They tore the doors off the closet, threw the television on the floor and hauled Mohammed and his two barefoot brothers outside to be blindfolded. They and 14 other men were taken to what they thought was a government office, where a man others kept calling "sir" spoke to their huddled group.

"You are Palestinians. Why are you still living in Iraq?" Mohammed recalled the man saying. "You have 48 hours to leave."

Within 24 hours, Mohammed was gone. The 36-year-old was among dozens of people who loaded their meager belongings onto buses at dawn Wednesday inside Baghdad's main Palestinian enclave in the Baladiyat neighborhood. They drove north toward the Syrian border, joining a growing exodus of Palestinians now following their familiar story line: an unwelcome people searching for a home.

Baghdad is a dangerous place for anyone to live, and the fighting between Sunni and Shiite Muslims has displaced hundreds of thousands. Largely forgotten amid this violence is the plight of thousands of Palestinians in Iraq, who face an increasingly hostile environment because they are predominantly Sunni and perceived as having been favored during the rule of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

Palestinians and human rights officials in Baghdad say members of the group are being targeted by roving Shiite militias and Iraqi police in efforts to expel them.

Iraqi officials said the 17 Palestinian men were detained Tuesday for "investigation purposes" because they seemed suspicious, according to Brig. Gen. Saad Abdullah of the Interior Ministry. During the detention, the officials discussed steps to "get the approvals for them to be refugees in other countries," he said.

An estimated 19,000 Palestinians have fled Iraq since 2003, leaving about 15,000 behind, according to the United Nations. About 350 Palestinians are now stranded in a desolate refugee camp in a no man's land at the Al Tanf border crossing into Syria. For more than six months they have been denied entry into Syria, and they refuse to return to Iraq. An additional 80 Palestinians are stuck on the Iraqi side of the line. Similar makeshift settlements have cropped up along the border with Jordan.

"Killings, threats, intimidations and kidnappings are becoming the norm for Palestinians in Iraq," the U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq said in a report this month. "Many of these actions are reportedly carried out by the militias wearing police or special forces uniform[s]."

Mortar shells regularly crash down on the squalid cinder-block Baladiyat compound, the largest settlement of Palestinians in Iraq, with an estimated population of 4,000 to 7,000. In November and December, guerrillas staged at least six organized attacks on the area. On Dec. 13, three hours of mortar attacks killed as many as 11 people, the U.N. report said.

"Any country that wants us, we will go there," said Rafaat Musaa Ahmed, 36, a carpenter and father of four who lives in the Palestinian compound in Baladiyat. "Even if we would live in a barren place, even if it was a desert."

After evening prayers during Ramadan in October, a mortar round fell on Ahmed's apartment, injuring his wife with shrapnel. She now suffers seizures, he said, and has been denied treatment at clinics affiliated with Iraq's Health Ministry, which is run by loyalists of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

"She needs an operation. I think one more month is all that we can wait," he said.

Like many Palestinians here, Ahmed's parents took refuge in Iraq after the creation of Israel in 1948. Hussein later adopted the Palestinian cause, using the issue to further his image as an advocate for Arab nationalism. Hussein provided free or subsidized housing to Palestinian families, paid cash to those whose relatives had died in the conflict with Israel, and exempted them from obligatory military service imposed on Iraqis.

After the 2003 invasion, landlords drove thousands of Palestinians from their lodgings. As many as 1,500 Palestinians at a time took refuge in a squatter settlement organized by the United Nations and the Palestinian Red Crescent Society on the playground of the Haifa Sports Club in Baghdad.

Thaamer Asad Melham, a 41-year-old television actor, lived in the Haifa refugee camp for a year with his wife, two daughters and a son after his landlord expelled them from their home in July 2004. The U.N. refugee agency provided him with an apartment in Baghdad, but the escalating reprisal killings caused him to retreat to the Baladiyat compound last September.

During a mortar explosion on Oct. 19, a nail lodged in the skull of his older brother, Amar, leaving him brain damaged, he said. Melham now washes his brother and changes his diapers, and he has sold off a refrigerator and bedroom furniture to help pay for medicine. Unable to find work, he stays at home with his children, who have stopped going to school.

"I am Palestinian. I am Sunni. And I am an artist," he said. "I can't stay in Iraq."

Tuesday's raid, at an apartment building rented by the United Nations to house 26 Palestinian families, appears to be the work of some component of the Iraqi police, said Ivana Vuco, a human rights officer with the U.N. mission in Baghdad.

The 17 men were held for about nine hours, accused of being terrorists and Hussein sympathizers. Another 13 Palestinians were detained the same day near the Baladiyat compound, Vuco said. Many of the families have expressed their intention to leave Baghdad.

"I don't think anything like this, to the same extent, has happened before," Vuco said of Tuesday's detentions.

When Luay Mohammed, an unemployed tailor, was being held Tuesday, someone struck him in the shoulder with the butt of an AK-47 assault rifle, he said. After he was dropped off near his apartment, he gathered his clothes and his mattress and set off with his family for the Baladiyat compound, to load up a bus and leave Iraq.

"We are really feeling terrified about what's going to happen," he said. "The only thing we want to do right now is survive."

Breaking The Clinch (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

Iraq is at the beginning of a civil war fought using the tactics of genocide, and it has all the conditions to get much worse. As a Newsweek correspondent, Christian Caryl, wrote recently from Baghdad, “What’s clear is that we’re far closer to the beginning of this cycle of violence than to its end.” As John Burns of The Times said on “Charlie Rose” last night, “Friends of mine who are Iraqis — Shiite, Sunni, Kurd — all foresee a civil war on a scale with bloodshed that would absolutely dwarf what we’re seeing now.”

Iraq already has the warlord structures that caused mass murder in Rwanda, Bosnia, Sierra Leone and elsewhere. Violent, stupid men who would be the dregs of society under normal conditions rise amid the trauma, chaos and stress and become revered leaders.

They command squads of young men who leave the moral universe and have no future in a peacetime world. They kill for fun, faith and profit — because they find it more rewarding to massacre and loot than to farm or labor. They are manipulated by political leaders with a savage zero-sum mind-set, who know they must kill or be killed, and who are instituting strategic ethnic cleansing campaigns to expand their turf.

Worse, Iraq already has the psychological conditions that have undergirded the great bloodbaths of recent years. Iraqi minds, according to the most sensitive reporting, have already been rewired by the experiences of trauma and extreme stress.

Some people become hyperaggressive and turn into perfect killers. Others endure a phased mental shutdown that looks like severe depression. They lose their memory and become passive and fatalistic. They become perfect victims.

Amid the turmoil, the complexity of life falls away, and things are reduced to stark polarities: Sunni-Shiite or Shiite-Sunni, human-subhuman. Once this mental descent has begun, it is possible to kill without compunction.

In Rwanda, for example, the journalist Jean Hatzfeld interviewed a Hutu man who had killed his Tutsi neighbor. “At the fatal instant,” the man recalled, “I did not see in him what he had been before. ... His features were indeed similar to those of the person I knew, but nothing firmly reminded me that I had lived beside him for a long time.”

The weakness of the Bush surge plan is that it relies on the Maliki government to somehow be above this vortex. But there are no impartial institutions in Iraq, ready to foster reconciliation. As ABC's Jonathan Karl notes in The Weekly Standard, the Shiite finance ministries now close banks that may finance Sunni investments. The Saadrist health ministries dismiss Sunni doctors. The sectarian vortex is not fomented by extremists who are appendages to society. The vortex is through and through.

The Democratic approach, as articulated by Senator Jim Webb — simply get out of Iraq "in short order" — is a howl of pain that takes no note of the long-term political and humanitarian consequences. Does the party that still talks piously about ending bloodshed in Darfur really want to walk away from a genocide the U.S. is partly responsible for? Are U.S. troops going to be pulled back to secure bases to watch passively while rivers of Iraqi blood lap at their gates? How many decades will Americans be fighting to quell the cycle of regional violence set loose by a transnational Sunni-Shiite explosion?

I for one have become disillusioned with dreams of transforming Iraqi society from the top down. But it's not too late to steer the situation in a less bad direction. Increased American forces can do good — they are still, as David Ignatius says, the biggest militia on the block — provided they are directed toward realistic goals.

There is one option that does approach Iraqi reality from the bottom up. That option recognizes that Iraq is broken and that its people are fleeing their homes to survive. It calls for a "soft partition" of Iraq in order to bring political institutions into accord with the social facts — a central government to handle oil revenues and manage the currency, etc., but a country divided into separate sectarian areas to reduce contact and conflict. When the various groups in Bosnia finally separated, it became possible to negotiate a cold (if miserable) peace.

Soft partition has been advocated in different ways by Joe Biden and Les Gelb, by Michael O'Hanlon and Edward Joseph, by Pauline Baker at the Fund for Peace, and in a more extreme version, by Peter Galbraith.

On Sunday, I'll give further publicity to their recommendations.

Crash Killed Most Guard Troops In Single Incident In 50 Years (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

WASHINGTON — The helicopter crash that killed 12 U.S. soldiers last weekend was the deadliest single incident for National Guard troops in at least 50 years, the National Guard Bureau said Wednesday.

Ten National Guard soldiers died in the crash Saturday, including Col. Paul Kelly, the highest-ranking Guard member to die since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. President Bush's plan to commit 21,500 more troops to Iraq relies in part on sending National Guard troops, raising the possibility of more casualties among the citizen-soldier units.

"I am deeply saddened by the loss of these outstanding National Guard soldiers and warriors," Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum, chief of the National Guard Bureau, said in a statement. "I cherish their service, honor their sacrifice, and mourn with their families."

The cause of the crash remains under investigation, according to the U.S. command in Iraq.

The UH-60 Black Hawk helicopter belonged to the Alabama Army National Guard and was flying with one other helicopter on a routine mission, according to the National Guard Bureau. The other helicopter reached its destination and sent a quick-reaction team that arrived at the crash site near Al Jadidah, northeast of Baghdad, within an hour. No survivors were found.

Two of the victims were Command Sgts. Maj. Marilyn Gabbard of the Iowa National Guard and Roger Haller of the Maryland Guard. That rank is near the pinnacle for enlisted soldiers. Gabbard was the first woman in the Iowa Guard to reach that rank.

Two active-duty soldiers also died in the crash, including Col. Brian Allgood, one of the top U.S. medical officers in Iraq.

Saturday's incident was the Guard's deadliest since the Korean War, the National Guard Bureau said. Before Saturday, the Guard's most recent deadliest incident was in 2005, when seven members of the Louisiana National Guard were killed by a roadside bomb, the bureau said.

Christine Wormuth, a senior fellow and expert on reserve-troop issues at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said mass-casualty incidents like the crash could have a lasting impact.

"It is a concern for the long-term sustainability of the Guard and Reserves," she said. "The question is whether we will be able to continue recruiting and retaining troops in sufficient numbers."

The Pentagon has begun to address such concerns recently by planning to expand the size of the active-duty Army and Marine Corps and limiting Guard and Reserve deployments to one year, Wormuth said.

There's no indication yet that casualties among Guard and Reserve troops are driving down recruiting numbers, she said. In 2006, the Army National Guard recruited 99% of its goal of 70,000 soldiers, and the Army Reserve reached 95% of its goal of 36,000 soldiers.

U.S. Military Tests A Nonlethal Weapon That Fires Heat Rays (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

MOODY AIR FORCE BASE, Ga., Jan. 24 (AP) — The military calls its new weapon an "active denial system," but that is an understatement. It is a ray gun that shoots a beam that makes people feel as if they are about to catch fire.

Apart from causing that terrifying sensation, the technology is supposed to be harmless — a nonlethal way to get enemies to drop their weapons, the military officials said.

The weapon is not expected to go into production until at least 2010, but all branches of the military have expressed interest in it, the officials said.

During the first demonstration of the weapon for the news media on Wednesday, airmen fired beams from a large dish antenna mounted atop a Humvee at people pretending to be rioters and airmen and reporters who volunteered to be shot.

The device's two-member crew found their targets through powerful lenses and fired beams from more than 500 yards away, nearly 17 times the range of existing nonlethal weapons, like rubber bullets.

People who were hit by the beam immediately jumped out of its path because of the sudden blast of 130-degree heat throughout the body. "This is one of the key technologies for the future," said Col. Kirk Hymes of the Marines, director of the nonlethal weapons program at Quantico, Va., which helped develop the new weapon. The two devices currently being evaluated were built by the military contractor Raytheon.

Boost Military Spending (WT)

By Peter W. Huggins

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Our nation's ground forces face considerable challenges. The Army and Marines are both heavily engaged fighting insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan. Beyond these short-term tests, our ground forces need to rebuild or replace equipment destroyed or damaged in these conflicts as well as prepare to engage elsewhere in the world should the need arise. Our Army and Marines need greater funding.

But should any increase in funding for our ground forces come at the expense of the other services? One view argues that since the Army and the Marines bear the preponderance of the human cost of our current conflicts, any increases in their budget share ought to come at the expense of the Air Force and Navy, both of which are less directly engaged in what are predominantly ground conflicts. Such a conclusion, however, fails to consider the impact this choice would have on the many benefits provided by our nation's air- and sea-power.

With the advent of globalization, our national economy has grown increasingly tied to the international economy. The Commerce Department recently reported that one in five U.S. manufacturing jobs is linked to exports, while agricultural exports employ another one million people. The global economy is fueled by petroleum products, much of which are transported to their markets by sea. The success of global trade results, in large measure, from the freedom of navigation that international commerce enjoys on the high seas. Such freedom began in the 19th century with the dominance of Britain's Royal Navy; it continues today due to the efforts of the U.S. Navy.

The Air Force plays a crucial, yet overlooked, role in the conflict in Iraq. U.S. air-power has an enviable reputation as it has prevented any air attack on U.S. or its coalition partners since the Korean War. Our success in the air allows our ground forces to operate with the security of not having to worry about "the third dimension," while forcing our adversaries to contend with the consequences of ceding such control. How many soldiers or Marines would have made a conscious choice to go about their daily business today in Iraq or Afghanistan without the benefits of air superiority, without persistent surveillance and reconnaissance, or without on-call strike aircraft just a few minutes away?

The Air Force and Navy are also key to our nation's unprecedented conventional deterrent. Measuring the impact of deterrence is almost impossible, since it is, by definition, a psychological influence on an adversary's decision-making. Yet it is certain that our nation's considerable successes in recent high-intensity conflicts — due in large part to air- and sea-power — have had a deterrent effect on potential adversaries.

Air- and sea-power provide critical capabilities for our nation's policy-makers. But our air and maritime forces also face mounting budgetary challenges. The Air Force in particular, which is operating the oldest air fleet in its history, is beginning to see the strains of almost 16 years of sustained combat service — many forget that U.S. airpower maintained no-fly zones in Iraq from 1991 to 2003, with little ground-force presence. Without modernization, our nation's ability to provide ground forces with the accustomed luxury of an environment free of enemy air attack would be in jeopardy. Such freedom, taken for granted by many, should not be mortgaged to pay today's bills.

The current debate overlooks one option. Future military budget shares need not be zero sum. The Office of Management and Budget recently reported that the percentage of Gross Domestic Product devoted to national defense is at near-record lows, even with generous increases after September 11. Military spending as a percentage of discretionary spending is also at near-record lows. Increasing the size of the pie, the overall defense budget, would allow all our nation's military services to fill pressing needs such as expanding the ranks, rebuilding and modernizing the force and preparing for the challenges that the future holds.

Our nation stands at a crossroads. The versatility and robustness of our armed forces will be crucial to our country's future foreign-policy success in a world where the only certainty is uncertainty. Zero-sum arguments that advocate shifting money to one service at the expense of another overlook the other choice — increasing the defense budget. While the nature of the current conflict suggests that boosting defense spending to a share in line with past conflicts, such as World War II, Korea and Vietnam, is not necessary, an increase to the levels seen at the end of the Cold War — our nation's most recent "long war" — is warranted. It's the best, and smartest, decision we can make.

DOJ:

Authority For Office Disputed (ADG)

By Linda Satter

Arkansas Democrat Gazette, January 25, 2007

A Little Rock attorney appointed Friday to represent a man charged with capital murder and possibly facing the death penalty has filed a motion to declare Tim Griffin's appointment last month as U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas unconstitutional.

John Wesley Hall Jr., who represents Antoine Demetrius Baker, said in a 16-page motion filed Tuesday that Griffin's appointment last month by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales violates Article II, Section 2, of the U. S. Constitution, which covers presidential appointments. He said it also violates a section of the U. S. Code altered last year during Congressional reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act.

The reworded section of the act omits a subsection that previously caused an attorney general's appointment of a U. S. attorney to expire within 120 days. The effect is that an appointee may now serve indefinitely without having to go through the standard procedure of being nominated by the president and then scrutinized by the Senate, which then votes to confirm or deny the appointment.

Little noticed at the time, the revision has stirred anger since the discovery that a handful of U. S. attorneys across the country were inexplicably forced to resign recently and then were replaced under the new provision by appointees who had not gone through the standard procedure — although the Justice Department says it is subjecting all of them to the process.

Among those ousted was Bud Cummins, U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas, whose job as chief federal prosecutor has generated praise in the legal community. Cummins said he was asked to resign so that Griffin, who had worked in the White House as a Republican strategist, could have a chance to serve as U. S. attorney.

Cummins, also a Republican, began serving as U. S. attorney in 2001 after being nominated by President Bush and confirmed by the Senate.

Griffin declined to comment on Hall's challenge to the method in which Griffin secured the top legal position in the eastern part of the state. But the challenge was rebuffed Tuesday by the U. S. Department of Justice with more of the same language that the department has used over the past few weeks to defend its appointment of Griffin.

"Congress provided the Attorney General the authority in federal law (28 United States Code § 546) to appoint a United States Attorney because we must ensure that someone is able to carry out the important function of leading a U. S. Attorney's office in the event a vacancy arise," said Brian Roehrkasse, deputy director of public affairs. "We have clearly stated our commitment to having a U. S. Attorney in every district who is confirmed by the Senate, and thus there is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process."

Roehrkasse continued, in an e-mail, "Furthermore, our record since this appointment authority was amended clearly demonstrates we are committed to working with the Senate to nominate candidates for U. S. Attorney positions. Every single time that a United States Attorney vacancy has arisen, the President either has made a nomination or the Administration is working, in consultation with home-state senators, to select candidates for nomination." Michael Teague, spokesman for Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., confirmed Tuesday that Griffin met a couple of weeks ago in Washington with Pryor, and apparently also met with the state's other Democratic senator, Blanche Lincoln.

Teague said that while Griffin's meeting with Pryor was cordial, "the senator still contends that the way the White House is handling this is a disservice to Bud Cummins and, in the long run, to Tim Griffin." Teague said Pryor still expects Griffin to go through the nomination process although Griffin's name has not yet been submitted to begin that process.

Hall's motion states, "This is a death penalty case. Defendant alleges his chief prosecutor unlawfully (both statutorily and constitutionally) holds office, and his prosecutor will be asking a grand jury to add an aggravator [to an existing indictment] and will be asking a jury to sentence him to death."

If that isn't a "case or controversy" worthy of closer examination, Hall asserted, "then nothing is."

Baker, the purported leader of a gang who has been convicted of first-degree murder in another case in state court, is charged in federal court with instructing two men to kill Jerry Otis, 21, in December 2002. Otis was to testify against Baker but was killed at Baker's instructions, according to the indictment.

The case is assigned to U. S. District Judge G. Thomas Eisele. No hearing will be set until the government files a response to Hall's motion.

Appointment Called Unconstitutional (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

A lawyer alleges recent U.S. attorney selection violates appointments clause.

A veteran Little Rock, Ark., attorney has lodged the first constitutional challenge to the Bush administration's attempt to appoint a U.S. attorney without seeking Senate approval.

Griffin, who used to work for Bush political advisor Karl Rove, replaced Bud Cummins, a Bush appointee and one of seven U.S. attorneys around the country whom the administration has ousted since late December. The top federal prosecutors in San Diego and San Francisco were among those dismissed.

Some Democrats have suggested that the moves were made to reward friends of the White House or punish prosecutors who had taken actions that angered the administration.

Administration officials have denied that the moves were political and assert that Gonzales has the authority to take these actions under a 2006 amendment to the Patriot Act that allows recess appointments.

But Hall's challenge contends that the section of the Patriot Act that Gonzales is relying on is an attempted "end run" around the appointments clause, which mandates that the Senate confirm the president's appointees.

"Under the Constitution, only the president can appoint a U.S. attorney, not the attorney general, so this appointment is void," Hall asserted.

Hall raised the challenge in the case of Antoine Demetris Baker, who is accused of murder. Hall contends that the illegitimacy of Griffin's appointment means that the U.S. attorney's office can't take any action in the case.

He said he decided to raise the challenge in Baker's case because U.S. attorneys "have special responsibilities" in cases where they are seeking capital punishment.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that "Congress provided the attorney general the authority in federal law … to appoint a United States attorney because we must ensure that someone is able to carry out the important function of leading a U.S. attorney's office in the event a vacancy arises.

"We have clearly stated our commitment to having a U.S. attorney in every district who is confirmed by the Senate, and thus there is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process."

Lawyer Challenges Griffin Appointment As U.S. Attorney (AP)

AP, January 25, 2007

LITTLE ROCK (AP) - A defense lawyer has filed a challenge to the appointment of U.S. Attorney Tim Griffin, who was named without Senate confirmation in a move made possible by the USA Patriot Act.

Attorney John Wesley Hall Jr., who is representing a capital murder defendant, filed papers Tuesday in which he argues that the appointment is unconstitutional.

Griffin, who worked under President Bush political adviser Karl Rove, replaced Bud Cummins, who has said the Justice Department asked him last summer to leave his post.

DOJ_NMG_0121543

Griffin was named interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas by Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez in a "recess appointment" after Congress adjourned for the year in 2006. The USA Patriot Act now allows Griffin to serve without having to be nominated by the president and go through Senate confirmation.

Previously, the appointment would have been good for 120 days.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehkrasse said the department is committed to having Senate confirmation hearings.

"There is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an atteompt to cirrcumvent the confirmation process," he said.

U.S. Sen. Mark Pryor is one of the three senators that have proposed legislation to prevent indefinite interim appointments of U.S. attorneys. Pryor spokesman Michael Teague says Pryor still expects Griffin to go through the nomination process.

Hall is representing Antoine Demetrius Baker, who is accused of ordering the murder of a witness in another case. Hall said Griffin's office intends to seek the death penalty in the case and that Griffin's appointment should be examined by the judge.

The government hasn't yet responded to Hall's motion and U.S. District Judge G. Thomas Eisele has not set a hearing on the matter.

Editorial: Political Meddling With Justice (NYT)

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

The federal investigation into Congressional corruption is approaching a crucial deadline and potential dead end. Feb. 15 is the last day on the job for United States Attorney Carol Lam of San Diego, the inquiry's dedicated prosecutor, who is being purged by the Bush administration.

Her investigation led to the imprisonment of former Representative Randy Cunningham, the California Republican who took millions of dollars in bribes in exchange for delivering lucrative government contracts. But just as Ms. Lam was digging into other possible wrongdoing, the White House decided to force her from office without explanation.

Ms. Lam has been investigating the dealings of Brent Wilkes, a private contractor and deep-pocketed political contributor who was designated co-conspirator No. 1 in the Cunningham case. Mr. Wilkes developed other cozy relationships. Among other avenues, the inquiry has been looking into rich government contracts secured by corporations and lobbyists with ties to Representative Jerry Lewis — the former appropriations chairman — and his staff. The Wall Street Journal is reporting that Mr. Wilkes could be indicted before Ms. Lam leaves office. The question now is whether her successor, as yet unnamed, will pursue the inquiry with the same dedication or will quietly smother it.

The outlook isn't promising. The administration is defenestrating at least six other U.S. attorneys. Yet Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is refusing to provide Congress with details on these unmerited dismissals. He insists that there's no attempt to quash fresh Republican scandals and says only the "very best" will be named as replacements.

We are skeptical, especially since the White House's reported choice to replace Little Rock's federal attorney is a Republican operative close to Karl Rove. Congress must demand a clear explanation from Mr. Gonzales and the White House on why these prosecutors are being ousted. It must search out every shady aspect of this clearly politically motivated purge — with a particular eye on Feb. 15.

Dropping Like Flies (HC)

Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 25, 2007

In the past year 11 U.S. attorneys have resigned their positions, some under pressure from their Justice Department superiors and the White House, even through they had commendable performance records.

Democratic senators are concerned that the high turnover is linked to an obscure, recently passed provision of the Patriot Act. The provision allows the Bush administration to fill vacancies with interim prosecutors for the remainder of the president's term without submitting them to the Senate for confirmation. Previously, interim appointments were made by a vote of federal judges in the districts served by the outgoing U.S. attorneys.

U.S. Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., contends that in his state U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins was improperly ousted in favor of a protege of Bush political adviser Karl Rove. Likewise in California, U.S. Attorneys Carol Lam of San Diego and Kevin Ryan of San Francisco were forced from their positions. Sen. Diane Feinstein, D-Calif., alleged that Lam fell out of favor with her Washington bosses for spearheading the bribery prosecution and conviction of Republican Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham last year. Lam reportedly had other politicians in her sights.

"I am particularly concerned because of the inference ... that is drawn to manipulation in the lineup of cases to be prosecuted by a U.S. attorney," Feinstein stated. "In the San Diego case, at the very least, we have people from the FBI indicating that Carol Lam has not only been a straight shooter but a very good prosecutor."

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales denied political motives figured in the multiple resignations of top prosecutors, and pledged that all interim appointments would be submitted to the Senate for confirmation. He reiterated that U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and can be removed for a number of reasons, including job performance and their standing in their districts. That isn't good enough for Feinstein and her Democratic colleagues, who have introduced legislation to reinstate the appointment of interim prosecutors by federal judges.

Gonzales is correct that the president is vested with the power to appoint U.S. attorneys. Unfortunately, the Patriot Act change eliminated the ability of the Senate to exercise its constitutional oversight of those nominations to make sure they are qualified and not simply political plums handed out to supporters in the waning years of the administration.

The attorney general's pledge to bring the wave of interim appointees before the Senate for confirmation is welcome, providing it is done in a speedy fashion. Still, the Patriot Act needs to be amended to restore judicial appointment of interims.

No president should be able to fire top government prosecutors from their positions for political reasons and then install successors without a thorough vetting by the constitutionally charged legislative body.

Unisys To Continue Justice Asset Tracking System Work (WASHTECH)

By William Welsh, Deputy Editor

Washington Technology, January 24, 2007

Unisys Corp. will continue supporting a consolidated asset tracking system used by the Justice Department to monitor property seized from criminals under a new contract. The eight-year deal may be worth as much as $112 million, the company said.

Under a blanket purchase agreement, Unisys of Blue Bell, Pa., will provide applications and managed services support for all system operations.

Unisys will handle systems integration, systems development, engineering, network management, production support, and security and certification. The company also will be responsible for customer support, program management, verification and validation.

The Justice Department's asset tracking system tracks, monitors and reports on property seized and forfeited in the prosecution of criminal activities. Ten law enforcement agencies used the consolidated system.

The new contract extends Unisys work on the asset tracking system project. Over the past five years, Unisys has modernized all of the system's core business applications while maintaining legacy system operations during the process, the company said.

Unisys has 32,000 employees and had annual sales of $5.7 billion in 2006. The company ranks No. 20 on Washington Technology's 2006 Top 100 list of the largest federal IT contractors.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-Enron Executive Begins 18-month Prison Term (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, January 25, 2007

Enron's former investor relations chief entered a federal prison in Texas today to serve an 18-month sentence for helping top executives mislead Wall Street about the company's financial viability.

Mark Koenig, 51, surrendered at a men's prison in Three Rivers, about 74 miles south of San Antonio, at noon today, prison spokesman Michael Ginster said.

With his surrender, Koenig became the eighth former Enron executive to serve prison time in the aftermath of the company's collapse more than five years ago.

Koenig pleaded guilty in August 2004 to aiding and abetting securities fraud for misleading Wall Street analysts to conceal Enron's precarious financial condition before the company collapsed in December 2001. As head of investor relations, he was Enron's main liaison to Wall Street.

"I definitely did not make the right choices in my last year at Enron," Koenig told a judge at his sentencing in November. "I am profoundly sorry for that."

Koenig's former second-in-command, Paula Rieker, pleaded guilty to insider trading earlier in 2004 and is serving probation for two years.

About a year ago, Koenig kicked off prosecution testimony in the fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron Chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling. He testified that while no one explicitly ordered him to lie, he felt pressure to do so to keep his job.

Both Lay and Skilling were convicted, but Lay died of heart disease in July. His record was subsequently wiped clean. Skilling began serving a 24-year, four-month prison term for 19 criminal counts at a Minnesota prison last month.

Next week another Enron felon, former finance executive Michael Kopper, is slated to surrender at a prison in Big Spring, about 450 miles west of Houston.

Kopper pleaded guilty in August 2002 to two counts of conspiracy for helping devise and carry out schemes to cook Enron's books while skimming millions of dollars for himself

CRIMINAL LAW:

Witness: Libby Part Of Leak Plan (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — Lewis "Scooter" Libby was part of a White House strategy to use press leaks to blame the CIA for faulty intelligence about Iraq's efforts to acquire nuclear bomb material, a former top CIA official testified Wednesday.

Libby was annoyed by reports that the administration had ignored evidence that its claims that Iraq sought nuclear fuel were wrong, said Robert Grenier, the CIA's former assistant secretary for operations.

Then Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, Libby asked Grenier about former State Department official Joseph Wilson, who had investigated the claims about Iraq's nuclear intentions for the CIA. Grenier testified that he also told Libby that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, was a covert CIA official.

Grenier testified during Libby's trial on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. Libby, 56, is charged with lying to FBI agents and grand jurors during a federal probe into how Plame's identity was given to reporters in the summer of 2003.

On Wednesday, Libby's lawyers tried to show that prosecution witnesses who say they told Libby about Plame may have faulty memories.

Grenier said he first told authorities that he didn't remember discussing Plame with Libby but, more than a year later, said he did. Grenier said he didn't tell authorities about the Plame conversation until mid-2005, when news stories about Libby's possible role in revealing her identity made the information more "relevant."

Earlier Wednesday, Grenier said Libby's interest in Wilson was triggered by a May 2003 New York Times column that alleged that Cheney had encouraged the CIA to send Wilson to Niger in 2002 to investigate claims that Iraq had sought uranium in the African nation. Wilson's findings — that the claims were unfounded — were overlooked when President Bush charged in January 2003 that Iraq had sought uranium.

A July 2003 report by columnist Robert Novak naming Plame as Wilson's wife was also part of an administration plan to "throw the blame" on the CIA, Grenier said. The column implied the CIA was guilty of "nepotism" for picking an officer's spouse for the uranium mission, he said.

Grenier's statements, in the trial's second day of testimony, helped show the administration's internal conflicts, as inspectors failed to locate weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and critics of prewar intelligence surfaced in the press.

Prosecutors allege that the Bush administration officials engineered the leaks to undermine Wilson's credibility. The key issue in the trial, however, is not any attempt to damage Wilson. Instead it is whether Libby intentionally lied when he told FBI agents and grand jurors in late 2003 and 2004 that he first learned Plame's identity from NBC reporter Tim Russert. Russert, who is expected to testify, has already denied that.

The day's final witness was CIA official Craig Schmall, who performed Libby's daily intelligence briefing. Prosecutors used Schmall's testimony to counter defense assertions that Libby was too busy with national security issues to remember talking about Plame's identity.

Schmall testified that when he briefed Libby in mid-June 2003, Libby was "pretty excited" because he had recently been visited by film stars Tom Cruise and Penelope Cruz. Cruise, a practitioner of Scientology, lobbied Libby on behalf of German Scientologists, who Cruise said were being persecuted by the German government, Schmall recalled.

Ex-CIA Official Testifies About Libby's Calls (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

A former high-ranking CIA official testified yesterday that, when Vice President Cheney's agitated chief of staff called him out of the blue in June 2003 to ask what he knew about a CIA-sponsored trip to Niger, he jumped to get answers.

Summoned out of a meeting with the CIA director to take I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's urgent call later that same afternoon, then-Associate Deputy Director Robert Grenier said he relayed all he had learned about former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, the man behind news reports of the trip that had Libby so concerned.

Yes, Wilson had gone on a CIA-sponsored mission to check out intelligence that Iraq was trying to buy uranium for nuclear weapons and had concluded that the tip was unfounded, Grenier testified he told Libby. And, he told Libby, it appeared that Wilson's wife, a CIA officer, had suggested Wilson for the trip.

The timing of Grenier's response and Libby's anxiety over Wilson are central to the prosecution's allegation that Libby lied to investigators when he said that he believed he first learned CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity from NBC's Tim Russert a month later. Grenier is one of three government officials to testify, so far, that they held conversations with Libby about Wilson's wife weeks before Libby contends he learned her name.

Libby has pleaded not guilty to five felony counts during the investigation of how Plame's identity was disclosed to the media. His defense maintains that he got confused about details of conversations with reporters amid the crush of his work on urgent national security issues.

The second day of trial testimony continued to throw back the curtain on a Bush administration beset with rivalries, self-interested alliances and attempts at blame-shifting. Those efforts were particularly intense during the summer of 2003, with U.S. troops in Iraq still unable to find the weapons of mass destruction that President Bush had cited to justify a preemptive war.

Fleshing out the finger-pointing inside the administration is important for both the defense and the prosecution. Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald has argued that Plame was the victim of an internal administration scramble as the vice president sought to discredit Wilson. Fitzgerald has alleged that Libby lied to conceal his and Cheney's efforts, as well as Libby's discussions about Plame with reporters.

Grenier said that Libby was fixated on one set of facts that Grenier relayed. He asked, would the CIA release to the news media the information that Wilson's trip was supposed to answer questions raised not just by Cheney's office, but by the State Department and the Defense Department as well?

Yesterday, defense attorneys sought to raise doubts about several of Libby's former administration colleagues, who are now witnesses for the prosecution, by attempting to show that they had flawed memories of events -- and that they had allegiances or other motives that would bias them against Libby. The defense also asserted that, after a criminal investigation into the leak began in the fall of 2003, the White House tried to protect presidential adviser Karl Rove and seemed willing to sacrifice Libby.

Defense attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. pressed former undersecretary of state Marc Grossman, the prosecution's first witness, to acknowledge his close friendship with his boss at the time, then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, an internal critic of the war and of Libby.

Wells suggested that Grossman had a "fishy" meeting with Armitage just before Grossman was interviewed by the FBI and has given conflicting accounts of events over time.

Ari Fleischer, a former White House press secretary who is expected to testify for the prosecution, also has a motive to help the prosecution, Wells has said. Fleischer had demanded immunity before he would talk about his conversations with Libby, then had admitted to government prosecutors that he had spoken to several reporters about Wilson's wife in the days before he left his job.

In questioning Grenier, defense attorney William H. Jeffress Jr. emphasized the rift between the CIA and the White House.

Grenier said he remembered reading a story in The Washington Post on June 12, 2003, the day after he tried to answer Libby's questions, that quoted anonymous administration sources as saying that the CIA never told Cheney that his questions were the impetus for Wilson's trip or about Wilson's findings.

"Wasn't this embarrassing to the CIA?" Jeffress asked Grenier. "Didn't you tell the FBI that you thought the White House was trying to shift blame to the CIA?"

Grenier testified that he did surmise that the White House was pointing a finger at the CIA for not alerting them about Wilson's findings.

"The administration was trying to suggest that had they only known about the eminent Ambassador Wilson's [information] . . . it would have somehow stopped the White House from continuing on its errant path to war," Grenier said. "I think they were trying to avoid blame for not providing [the truth] about whether or not Iraq had attempted to buy uranium."

Weeks later, Grenier said he saw Plame's name revealed in Robert D. Novak's syndicated column and figured that it was the work of the White House. In fact, Armitage and Rove have acknowledged that they were Novak's sources. Jeffress also sought to undermine Grenier's testimony by pointing out that Grenier initially told FBI agents and a grand jury that he did not remember whether he had told Libby that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. Only later, Jeffress said, did Grenier notify investigators that he had mentioned that she was an employee. "Do you find your memory gets better the further away from an event you are?" Jeffress asked pointedly.

Ex-Officials Testify They Informed Libby Of The Identity Of A C.I.A. Operative (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — Prosecutors in the perjury trial of the former White House aide I. Lewis Libby Jr. paraded a roster of former government officials before the jury on Wednesday to testify that they had informed him about the identity of the C.I.A. operative Valerie Wilson, contrary to Mr. Libby's claim that he had learned about her weeks later from reporters.

Mr. Libby's lawyers spent their time cross-examining those witnesses in an effort to attack both their credibility and their memory.

Mr. Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, has put the issue of memory front and center in his defense on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. He is charged with lying to both a grand jury and to F.B.I. agents who were investigating the leak to reporters of the identity of Ms. Wilson.

Mr. Libby has sworn that he did not discuss Ms. Wilson's identity with reporters in the spring and summer of 2003. But two reporters, Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, and Matthew Cooper, formerly of Time Magazine, have testified that Mr. Libby explicitly told them about Ms. Wilson.

One official to testify, Robert L. Grenier, a former senior official at the Central Intelligence Agency, testified Wednesday that he received an anxious phone call from Mr. Libby on June 11, 2003, asking about reports that a former ambassador had made a trip to Africa to check on reports that Saddam Hussein had tried to buy uranium in Niger for Iraq's weapons program.

Mr. Libby, Mr. Grenier said, seemed irked by accounts that the former ambassador, Joseph C. Wilson IV, the husband of Ms. Wilson, was telling reporters that he had been sent on a fact-finding mission to Niger at the behest of the vice president's office.

Mr. Grenier said he promised to look into the matter, but before he could speak with Mr. Libby again, he was summoned out of a meeting with the director of the C.I.A. by Mr. Libby seeking answers.

He said he told Mr. Libby that Mr. Wilson did indeed go on the mission to Africa and he added, as an afterthought, that Mr. Wilson's wife, who is also known as Valerie Plame, worked at the C.I.A.

The purpose of Mr. Grenier's testimony from the prosecutor's point of view was to cast doubt on Mr. Libby's account that he did not remember learning about Ms. Wilson from officials when he testified that he learned about her from journalists.

But William H. Jeffress Jr., one of Mr. Libby's lawyers, quickly set about taking apart Mr. Grenier's account. He noted that in his first appearance before a grand jury and in an interview with F.B.I. agents, Mr. Grenier did not say he had told Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson.

Mr. Grenier said he had not remembered that part of the conversation with Mr. Libby and only recalled it more than a year later when he went before a grand jury again.

With a generous dollop of scorn, Mr. Jeffress asked why Mr. Grenier had first told the grand jury that he had no recollection of telling Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson, only to change his story later.

"I was saying what I thought was true at the time, and I subsequently had a different recollection," replied Mr. Grenier, who held a high rank in the agency as Iraq mission manager.

Mr. Jeffress asked, "Do you find that your memory gets better the further away from an event?"

Mr. Libby's lawyers seemed to have two agendas in mind. Not only did they want to underscore the fragility of memory — Mr. Libby has said that if he testified incorrectly about his conversations with reporters it was only because he simply remembered incorrectly — but also to create a vexing, lengthy and complicated narrative for the jury.

The prosecution, in contrast, is aiming for a streamlined and simple case: Did Mr. Libby knowingly lie to the grand jury and to F.B.I. agents?

Mr. Jeffress also quizzed Mr. Grenier about some of the ill-feeling between the White House and the C.I.A. over Mr. Wilson's trip. On Tuesday, Mr. Libby's chief lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., startled the court when he said that his client had been made a scapegoat by White House officials to protect Karl Rove, President Bush's principal political adviser.

Craig Schmall, a C.I.A. employee whose job was to brief Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney, testified that his notes showed Mr. Libby had spoken to him on June 14, 2003, and that he was annoyed by Mr. Wilson's trip to Niger.

On cross-examination, Mr. Schmall acknowledged that Mr. Libby's workday in that period was taken up with issues like Iraq developments, an East African terrorist network and Al Qaeda.

Mr. Schmall's notes from a session with Mr. Libby show a comment about the actors Tom Cruise and Penélope Cruz, who had visited the White House and raised concerns about the treatment of Scientologists in Germany. "He was a little excited about it, and I was a little excited about it," Mr. Schmall said of the celebrity moment in their day.

Earlier, Mr. Libby's defense team went after the memory and credibility of Marc Grossman, the former under secretary of state. He had given statements that he had been asked on May 29, 2003, by Mr. Libby about the Wilson trip. He said that after canvassing the State Department he reported back that Mr. Wilson had made the trip for the C.I.A. and that his wife had played a major role in selecting him for the mission.

Libby Defense Says Witnesses Also Suffered Memory Lapses (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's defense against perjury charges, which rests in part on what he has described as innocent memory lapses, appeared to gain some ground Wednesday when his lawyers showed that two government witnesses in the case had memory issues of their own.

Former CIA official Robert Grenier, questioned by Libby's lawyers, acknowledged that he initially told a federal grand jury in January 2004 that he did not believe he had shared information about the status of CIA operative Valerie Plame when he spoke with Libby weeks before she was identified in a newspaper column. But Grenier said he testified 18 months later in another grand jury appearance that he believed he had given Libby that information after all.

Grenier was called by the government to help prove the central charge against Libby: that contrary to what he told investigators, Libby obtained information about Plame, the wife of an administration war critic, before her identity surfaced July 14, 2003, in a syndicated column by Robert Novak. Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, told a grand jury that he learned about Plame from journalists and had passed along gossip they offered him. The government claims that he made up the story in an apparent effort to protect his boss.

Another official — Marc Grossman, a former State Department undersecretary for political affairs — also testified Wednesday that he had discussed Plame with Libby but conceded there were discrepancies in the accounts that he had initially given FBI agents. Grossman said he could not account for the differences.

Grenier said he changed his testimony after reflecting on a feeling of guilt that he had after talking with Libby and the possibility that he had shared potentially classified information with him. He also said it was becoming apparent from newspaper reports that how and when Libby learned about Plame was becoming of paramount interest to investigators.

The disclosures, on the first full day of the perjury and obstruction trial, appeared to buttress a central defense claim.

Libby, through his lawyers, has conceded that he may have misspoken to investigators, but only because he was preoccupied with matters of national security, which clouded his ability to recall events.

His lawyers were able to show Wednesday that such memory problems may be an occupational hazard for high government officials.

"Do you find that your memory gets better the further away from an event you are?" William Jeffress, one of Libby's lawyers, asked Grenier. "Your memory improves with time?"

Grenier, who was the CIA's point man on Iraq at the time of his conversation with Libby, said he could not account for any single event that changed his thinking. "I developed the growing conviction that I had in fact said it," he said. "It's like, 'Wake up and smell the coffee. You must've told him.' "

Plame is married to former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV; in an opinion piece in the New York Times on July 6, 2003, Wilson said that President Bush had misled the nation in his State of the Union address when he said Saddam Hussein was seeking weapons-grade uranium in Niger. Wilson had assessed the claim on a CIA-sponsored trip to the African country in 2002 and concluded that it was baseless. Articles about his trip began to appear in newspapers in May 2003.

Both Grenier and Grossman testified that Libby had called them in June 2003 to ask if they knew anything about the then-anonymous ambassador and the circumstances of the trip.

The discussions, they testified, eventually led them to disclose information about Plame to Libby.

Grenier said he treated the request with urgency and recalled being pulled out of a meeting with then-CIA Director George J. Tenet to take a phone call from Libby. "Someone came to the door and beckoned me out…. I went out of the conference room and I was handed a note indicating that I should call Mr. Libby," he said. "I don't think I had ever been called out of a meeting with the director either before or since."

Grossman ordered up a State Department report that chronicled the Wilson trip, which mentioned that his wife worked for the CIA, a fact that he passed along to Libby.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., another of Libby's lawyers, questioned Grossman about conversations he had with then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage immediately before and after Grossman spoke to the FBI for the first time in October 2003. Grossman said that Armitage divulged to him what was then a major secret: that Armitage had been the source for the Novak article about Plame.

Grossman said he was glad Armitage had decided to confide in him before his FBI interview.

"He said it was the dumbest thing he'd ever done in his life," Grossman said. "He said he felt terrible about it, that he'd offered to quit and reported it fully to the FBI. I was shocked and disappointed. But for me, I thought he'd given me a piece of professional courtesy, and I appreciated it."

During questioning, Wells said that a transcript of Grossman's FBI interviews indicated he had known before he commissioned the State Department report that Plame worked for the CIA, though he testified Tuesday that the document was his original source for the information.

"You accept the fact that you told the FBI something different on Feb. 24, 2004, than you told this jury?" Wells asked.

"Yes, sir," Grossman replied.

The prosecution on Wednesday scored some points in trying to rebut what some lawyers have called Libby's "busy man" defense.

The government introduced notes taken by Libby's CIA briefer during a meeting in June 2003. The notes revealed that Libby had taken time out to visit with actor Tom Cruise and his then-girlfriend Penelope Cruz, who had requested time with the influential administration aide to complain about German government criticism of Scientology — of which Cruise is a well-known follower.

"Mr. Libby told me about it during the briefing," Craig Schmall, the CIA briefer, said. "He was a little excited about it. I was a little excited about it."

At The Libby Trial, Hints Of Intrigue And Betrayal (NYT)

By David Johnston And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — The assertion by lawyers for I. Lewis Libby Jr. that White House aides had sacrificed him to protect Karl Rove, the senior political adviser, appears to be based primarily on Mr. Libby's own sense that the administration had failed to defend him adequately as the C.I.A. leak case unfolded.

But there is little known evidence to buttress the suggestion by Mr. Libby's defense team in his obstruction and perjury trial that unnamed White House officials were deliberately setting Mr. Libby up to be a scapegoat.

Mr. Libby's lawyers said in an opening statement on Tuesday that he felt so abandoned by the White House as the leak investigation intensified in the fall of 2003 that he appealed to his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Cheney subsequently wrote, according to the defense's opening statement: "Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy who was asked to stick his neck in the meatgrinder because of the incompetence of others."

The defense team's statements set off a debate across Washington about whether they were part of a legal gambit to divert attention from the underlying charge that Mr. Libby lied to F.B.I. agents and the grand jury or whether his lawyers had evidence of an effort within the White House to focus the blame on Mr. Libby.

Even if the assertion is shown to be true, it is not clear how it would help refute the charges that Mr. Libby had perjured himself.

Mr. Libby's lawyers have so far offered few details about how he might have been set up as a fall guy for Mr. Rove. White House aides said little about the alleged rift on Wednesday, indicating they were prepared to grant their former colleague wide latitude to present an aggressive defense — even if it meant letting stand unanswered a story of intrigue and disloyalty involving President Bush's and Mr. Cheney's most trusted aides.

The accusations of scapegoating came as a surprise. In the past, White House aides have portrayed Mr. Libby and Mr. Rove as colleagues who moved in different orbits, but whose paths crossed collegially on various pieces of White House business, including the effort to defend a flawed statement in Mr. Bush's State of the Union speech in 2003 that Iraq had sought nuclear fuel in Africa.

But Mr. Libby may have had reason to feel singled out. He was the only White House official known to have been authorized to seek out reporters in the summer of 2003 in an effort to explain an intelligence report that the administration had used to make a case that Iraq was interested in acquiring uranium ore for its suspected nuclear program, according to documents in the case.

Mr. Cheney approved of Mr. Libby's confidential meetings with reporters, according to the prosecution. The vice president had also spoken to Mr. Bush, who authorized the declassification of parts of a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq to provide Mr. Libby with more information to discuss with the journalists, the legal papers said.

There may have been other reasons Mr. Libby felt the White House was turning against him. Under questioning from reporters, Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, said on Sept. 29, 2003, that Mr. Rove had no involvement in the leak of the identity of an intelligence officer, Valerie Wilson. But it took nearly a week before Mr. McClellan made a similar defense of Mr. Libby.

In each instance, Mr. McClellan's statements, which he said at the time were based upon conversations with Mr. Rove and Mr. Libby, proved to be inaccurate; Mr. Libby and Mr. Rove had spoken to reporters about Ms. Wilson, who had worked undercover.

While Mr. Libby felt he was being left to fend for himself, there is little public evidence so far to support his lawyers' suggestion that Mr. Libby was the victim of a deliberate effort to shift the blame to Mr. Libby to protect Mr. Rove, who by the fall of 2003 was masterminding Mr. Bush's reelection campaign.

The issue of whether there was a conspiracy at the White House either to reveal Ms. Wilson's identity or to cover up for the White House officials who engaged in such a plot was a central focus of the grand jury inquiry conducted by Patrick J. Ftizgerald, the prosecutor. Mr. Fitzgerald did not charge anyone with participating in a conspiracy and has never suggested that there is any evidence that one existed.

Mr. Fitzgerald spent many months exploring the issue, investigating one newspaper report of a broad conspiracy that later proved to be inaccurate, according to lawyers with clients in the case. Those lawyers said Mr. Fitzgerald questioned their clients, often in minute detail, about what they had done or said about the case. Associates of Mr. Rove, speaking on condition of anonymity, dismissed the idea that there was a cabal against Mr. Libby.

But the defense can marshal an argument that Mr. Libby was initially left out in the cold as the White House began mounting a defense of Mr. Rove, a review of White House comments on the leak inquiry shows.

On Sept. 29, 2003, as the leak inquiry was picking up steam and reporters were pressing to learn Mr. Rove's role, Mr. McClellan said Mr. Rove had told him he was not involved in the leak. He called the accusations of Mr. Rove's involvement "ridiculous."

Asked about Mr. Libby in that afternoon's press briefing, Mr. McClellan initially appeared noncommittal, saying, "If someone did something like this, it needs to be looked at by the Department of Justice." Later Mr. McClellan said, "I've made it clear that there's been nothing, absolutely nothing, brought to our attention to suggest any White House involvement, and that includes the vice president's office, as well."

But a government filing in the spring suggested that Mr. Libby was dissatisfied with Mr. McClellan's handling of the questions about his involvement. The filing showed that Mr. Libby had drafted a handwritten list of talking points for Mr. McClellan that read: "People have made too much of the difference in how I described Karl and Libby. I've talked to Libby. I said it was ridiculous about Karl, and it is ridiculous about Libby."

Former White House officials said they were surprised to hear of any rift between Mr. Rove and Mr. Libby. "One of their strengths was that they worked together," said Lawrence B. Wilkerson, a former State Department official who has become a critic of how the administration had handled Iraq. "They didn't show any ankle — it was always a team effort."

Several former officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that Mr. Rove and Mr. Libby had several areas of intersection. Mr. Libby also held the rank of a presidential adviser, and he stood in for Mr. Cheney frequently on domestic and foreign policy meetings. Both men had a hand in the marketing, and later, the defense, of the Iraq strategy. But they approached it from different angles. Mr. Libby was involved in developing and assessing intelligence about Iraq and using it to build the case for the war, and then defending that case as it began to unravel. Mr. Rove built a re-election strategy for Mr. Bush that relied heavily on his prosecution of the war against terrorism and the Iraq invasion.

Both men had their own contacts among journalists. Mr. Rove dealt mostly with political reporters, including the conservative columnist Robert Novak, who first disclosed Ms. Wilson's identity. Mr. Libby tended to speak with reporters who focused on national security matters, including Judith Miller, then of The New York Times.

Mr. Fitzgerald has also introduced a new player into the mix, Ari Fleischer, Mr. McClellan's predecessor as White House press secretary. Mr. Fleischer, Mr. Fitzgerald said in court on Tuesday, had been informed by Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson's identity as the wife of Joseph C. Wilson, the former diplomat whose criticism of pre-war intelligence about Iraq had set off the case. Mr. Fleischer had later discussed Ms. Wilson with reporters including David Gregory of NBC News, according to the account.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's lawyer, has argued that Mr. Fleischer's testimony came after an immunity deal and that he had no notes about the lunch he reportedly had with Mr. Libby. But that argument fits what appears to be a general strategy by Mr. Wells to show a confusing situation where loyalties, and memories, are questionable.

Cities See Crime Surge As Threat To Their Revival (USAT)

By Haya El Nasser

LOUISVILLE — A minister who regularly conducts prayer vigils against violence and counsels crime victims is beaten by a gang of youths. Five people are shot and wounded at a community festival. A softball player is shot and wounded at a game, in front of 100 witnesses. One person is killed and four wounded in a shooting outside a funeral home as people gather for a wake.

These crimes happened in very public settings here last year — two of them within 2 miles of the heart of this Ohio River city's downtown. Such incidents inevitably give communities the jitters, but cities are especially skittish now because the nation's violent crime rate is rising after more than a decade of decline, and the stakes are higher.

The drop in crime helped spark an urban revival that attracted thousands of residents and billions of dollars of investment to downtowns from Louisville to Miami, St. Louis and Denver. Now, city leaders across the nation are fearful that crime will kill the renaissance.

For a city such as Louisville, where downtown is flourishing, keeping crime in check is paramount. More than $1 billion has been invested in the commercial heart of the city this decade. By 2010, at least another $1 billion is expected to come in. Five hotels are set to open, and the 2000 housing units now downtown are expected to double by 2009.

Rising crime "has the potential of being damaging," says Jerry Abramson, mayor of Louisville from 1985 to 1998. He was elected again in 2002 after Louisville merged with surrounding Jefferson County; he was re-elected in 2006. "We all live day by day in terms of concern of some horrific thing happening in our central business district that would set us back."

Murders and robberies continued to rise nationwide during the first six months of 2006, according to the FBI, and violent crime overall appears headed for a second straight year of increases. Mayors and police chiefs regularly assure the public that violent crimes still are confined mostly to poorer drug- and gang-infested areas, but they are sounding alarms:

·One of the first sessions at the U.S. Conference of Mayors' winter meeting that began Wednesday in Washington tackled initiatives to fight rising crime. Mayors are calling for a federal-local partnership to stem double-digit increases in murders, assaults and robberies in some cities.

·The National League of Cities has put the surge in violent crime on its legislative agenda, calling it one of the major challenges affecting quality of life.

·Mayors and police chiefs from about 55 cities who met last fall identified many factors pushing up crime rates: gangs, drugs, truancy, a growing culture of violence among youths, a profusion of illegal guns, unemployment and a wave of more than 600,000 ex-offenders finishing their prison terms and returning to the streets every year.

Abramson and some other mayors also blame the federal government for cutting funding for crime prevention and phasing out a Clinton administration program that added 100,000 police officers nationwide. They say Washington's focus has shifted to homeland security at the expense of hometown security.

"The consensus is that the federal government walked away from that partnership," Abramson says. "Crime all of a sudden begins to ratchet up but police on the street have ratcheted significantly down. We draw a correlation."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse disagrees. "The increase in violent crime in some areas does not appear to be related to federal spending for law enforcement," he says. "DOJ spending has never accounted for more than 4% of total spending on state and local law enforcement."

Trenton, N.J., Mayor Douglas Palmer, president of the Conference of Mayors, met with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi this month. He hopes cities can gain more support now that Democrats control Congress.

"Over the '90s, cities have made great strides in coming back, revitalizing neighborhoods, but we've seen an escalation of violence," Palmer says.

DOJ_NMG_0121552

"We have fewer police officers in our cities now than ever, with a greater proliferation of guns on the streets. … It is of the highest priority." Signs of the trend:

·The Police Executive Research Forum, a national police advocacy group, reported in October that murder, robbery and assaults had increased substantially in a cross-section of cities. The title of its report: A Gathering Storm— Violent Crime in America.

"There was a general sense that crime for most communities had dropped to such levels that it no longer was the issue that it was in the '90s and '80s," says Chuck Wexler, executive director of the police group. "We've seen a volatility in crime that we haven't seen in the previous eight years — and not just in the inner cities."

·Preliminary FBI data released last month show that violent crime rose 2.2% nationwide in 2005, the largest annual increase in 14 years and the first since 2001. In the latest statistics available, violent crime rose 3.7% from January to June 2006 compared with the first six months of 2005. Murders went up 1.4%, felony assaults 1.2% and robberies 9.7%. Property crime dropped 2.6%.

Justice Department teams visited 18 cities in November and December to determine why violent crime is spiking in some cities and not in others. They met with state and local law enforcement "to gain a better understanding of what is causing this increase and determine which efforts had been most effective in helping fight violent crime," Roehrkasse says.

·Orlando had 49 homicides last year, more than double the 22 in 2005. About 60% were linked to drugs. In Memphis, homicides rose from 118 in 2004 to 160 last year. Crime is down in Los Angeles and Chicago. In some cities, homicides are down, but robberies are up.

"We had a general rise in violent crime in not all but most cities in every region," says David Harris, professor of law and values at the University of Toledo College of Law.

'Perception is reality'

Mayors find themselves in an awkward spot. On one hand, they want to publicize their crime problems to get more funding. On the other, they worry that too much crime talk will create a negative perception of cities and scare off people.

"It has a very detrimental effect on what mayors work on each and every day to try to entice businesses to come," Palmer says. "Perception is reality."

Adds Harris: "City officials are quite aware that whatever progress they've made in attracting new residents and bringing people back to live in the city would be at risk if people didn't feel safe."

Cities must deal with crime head-on, says urban historian Joel Kotkin, author of The City. "We all hoped that the days of relatively high crime rates had come and gone," he says. "We now know the problem is not going away."

Many cities are taking action:

·In Trenton, homicides spiked to 31 in 2005 but dropped to 18 last year. More than 70% were gang-related, Palmer says. "We took down the leadership of nine gangs," he says. "They're in jail."

The city is cracking down on truancy and providing job training while redeveloping deserted industrial areas, getting rid of 5,500 deserted properties and building 1,600 homes for working families.

"We're making our cities more livable, but it's all inextricably tied to the whole crime piece," Palmer says. "We need resources."

·In Milwaukee, 1993 saw 160 homicides, a record high. By 2004, it had a record low 88. They climbed the next year to 122, then inched down to 103 last year.

"We did see probably a 20% increase in other categories of violent crime … an increase in armed robberies and shootings," says Mayor Tom Barrett, a former congressman.

Barrett and other mayors are working to strengthen background checks of gun buyers. He launched a fatherhood initiative to address the problem of absentee dads. He cut firefighting staff to start the year with 1,970 sworn police officers, the highest number since 2000, but is struggling to fill almost 200 vacancies, he says.

Downtown is thriving. About 14,000 people live there, 10 times more than a decade ago. Waterfront high-rises are going up. Work is starting on The Brewery, a multimillion-dollar conversion of the 26-acre old Pabst brewery complex into a residential and commercial center. The site borders downtown and inner-city neighborhoods.

·In Miami, overall crime is down, but homicides are up.

"The market is literally being flooded with assault weapons coming from Eastern Europe, the old Soviet bloc countries," Police Chief John Timoney says. Guns such as AK-47 rifles are selling for $150 to $200 compared with $700 or more not long ago, he says.

"Every jerk who wants one can have one," Timoney says.

DOJ_NMG_0121553

Crime, he says, is not affecting Miami's downtown, where thousands of condominiums have been built or are planned. "But I was in New York when there was an all-time record high of homicides," he says. "Three kids were killed. Tourists from Utah were killed in the subway. When you start getting untraditional killings, that's when you get people's attention."

Louisville is proactive

While violent crimes in Louisville have occurred away from downtown, the city has been proactive. Security cameras were installed in high-crime areas and neighborhood watch programs strengthened. Police on horses and bicycles patrol the Fourth Street Live area of clubs, stores and restaurants. The city has razed low-income housing and built mixed-income housing.

So far, 70 homicides in 2004 (the highest since 1997 when there were 85), 64 in 2005 and 51 in 2006 have not quelled downtown's resurgence. The Muhammad Ali Center opened in recent years, the convention center was expanded, and an arena is planned. The city soon will break ground on Museum Plaza, a $465 million, 61-story skyscraper that could transform Louisville's skyline.

Police Chief Robert White has reached out to the community since he arrived four years ago. "If we're going to have a long-term effect in fighting crime, we have to get people engaged," he says.

Billboards across town advertise a 24-hour crime tip line, 574-LMPD. The first month in operation, 123 calls came in. Two years later, about 2,000 calls on average led to at least 30 arrests every month. Police credit the tip line with solving 18 homicides and shutting down three methamphetamine labs.

Donnie Morris, who lives in the high-crime West End, runs Prevention 2000 to teach children about gun safety, drugs and other threats. He and his wife, Jefferson County District Court Judge Joan Stringer, encourage churches to report anonymous crime tips they receive from their congregation.

"Areas that are most affected by crime are the ones that don't call the police, but they'll call their clergy," Morris says.

Phil and Kathy Scherer are the kind of empty nesters that many downtowns are attracting these days. The two had always been downtown boosters. After 33 years in the suburbs, they decided to "walk the walk," says Kathy, 58.

They bought a 3,000-square-foot penthouse in Preston Point, a striking modern building with a view of the river. She says she feels more comfortable being alone at night there than she did in her old suburban house.

Young people crowd the streets on their way to a skate park nearby. Joggers run by the waterfront. Mounted police trot past.

"We have always hoped that Louisville would have that 24-hour component," says Phil, 63, a city native and president of a commercial and industrial real estate firm. "I don't see crime as a deterrent."

Mayors hope it stays that way. The police executive association, however, expects the trend of rising crimes to continue this year.

"Robberies are occurring in parts of cities that didn't normally have robberies," Wexler says. "Cities are concerned."

NBC San Diego, January 25, 2007

The U.S. Department of Justice confirmed that Tijuana police arrested Manuel Martinez, 41, on Monday. He is accused of abducting the girl outside a school.

According to police, Martinez pulled the girl into a burgundy Toyota truck with California license plates, tied her up and threatened to rape and kill her. Police found the truck and rescued her, officials said. They also found U.S. Navy credentials, a military knife and various sexual aids in the truck, police said.

Martinez is a civilian contractor working for the U.S. Navy, according to the Justice Department. He is being held on kidnapping, attempted murder and other charges.

Rape Scene With 12-year-old Actress Stirs Debate (AP)

AP, January 25, 2007

PARK CITY, Utah — At a festival that features several films with sexual content, including full male nudity and a documentary about bestiality, a Southern Gothic tale that includes the rape of a young girl is causing the biggest stir.

“Hounddog” is the story of Lewellen, a girl played by 12-year-old Dakota Fanning, who is growing up in the 1960s South. She is a free spirit obsessed with Elvis Presley and has little supervision by her abusive father and alcoholic grandmother.

Even before the first screening of "Hounddog" at the Sundance Film Festival this week, a Christian film critic, citing Fanning's age, decried the movie as child abuse, and Roman Catholic activist Bill Donohue called for a federal investigation.

Fanning is defending her work as well as the movie, and so is the head of Sundance, who said it was courageous for director Deborah Kampmeier to tackle "challenging material." "Hounddog" is entered in the festival's dramatic category.

The disturbing scene lasts a few minutes, but is not graphic. There is no nudity, the scene is very darkly lit and only Fanning's face and hand are shown.

Kampmeier said it took her a decade to get the film made, largely because of the rape scene, but cutting it was a compromise she was unwilling to make.

"This issue is so silenced in our society. There are a lot of women who are alone with this story," she said.

"When you're shooting a film, it's the images you line up next to each other that create a story," Kampmeier said. "If you have a hand hitting the ground, Dakota screaming 'stop' and you see a zipper unzip — that creates a rape."

Ted Baehr, chairman of the Christian Film and Television Commission and publisher of the Web site movieguide.org, claims "Hounddog" breaks federal child-pornography law. He said the law covers material that "appears" to show minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct.

"Even if they're not actually performing the explicit act, we are dealing with a legal issue here," he said.

Baehr said Fanning is being exploited in the film, and that it should be considered an outrage.

"Children at 12 do not have the ability to make the types of decisions that we're talking about here," he said. "If we're offended by some comedian's racial slur, why aren't we offended by somebody taking advantage of a 12-year-old child?"

Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, said he has asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate whether antipornography laws have been broken.

Kampmeier said she talked with the children and their parents, but didn't go into great detail with the young actors about the content.

"I didn't have to articulate to Cody and Isabelle the psychological elements that were going on in this film," she said. "I used images to tell the story. I didn't manipulate these children or explain to these children what was going on."

Fanning said she and Kampmeier talked for months before the film was shot and spent a day painting pottery together and discussing the story.

"It's not really happening," Fanning said of the rape. "It's a movie, and it's called acting. I'm not going through anything. Cody and Isabelle aren't going through anything, their characters are.

"And for me, when it's done it's done," she said. "I don't even think about it anymore."

Sundance director Geoffrey Gilmore said independent filmmakers should pursue sensitive subject matter.

"I feel the mission and very nature of what Sundance is about is to provide a platform for that," he said.

Former Treasurer Sentenced To Prison (AP)

By Tim Korte, The Associated Press

AP, January 25, 2007

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) — Former state Treasurer Robert Vigil was sentenced Wednesday to three years in federal prison for pressuring a contractor to hire the previous treasurer's wife, despite concerns that she was unqualified.

Vigil, 53, was convicted in September of a single count of attempted extortion. Jurors acquitted him of 23 other counts of extortion and racketeering.

Vigil remained free after sentencing, wearing an ankle monitoring bracelet, but the judge ordered him to report to prison within 60 days.

"Mr. Vigil, good luck to you," U.S. District Judge James Browning said at the end of the hearing. "I hope you and your family can put this behind you. I hope the state can as well."

Vigil was also fined $97,000 and sentenced to three years of probation after his release. He resigned in October 2005, after the Legislature started impeachment proceedings.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathon Gerson said Vigil and co-conspirators — including Michael Montoya, his predecessor as treasurer — "horribly abused state trust to enrich themselves and enrich their friends."

Montoya pleaded guilty to lesser charges and aided the prosecution in its case against Vigil.

Vigil himself thanked jurors and judges for granting him a fair trial, as well as his friends for their support.

"I also want to thank all my family. They mean more to me than anything on earth," Vigil said, briefly choking up and glancing toward relatives. "I love them so much."

WMC-TV, January 25, 2007

Memphis cop snared in federal sting

A Memphis Police officer was arrested Wednesday as a result of Operation Tarnished Blue, an ongoing investigation by local, state and federal law enforcement into police corruption.

The officer is accused of money laundering.

Orlando Hebron is accused of taking nearly $8,000 in government funds, then making false statements to investigators.

The indictment details a six month undercover investigation involving what appeared to be two kilos of cocaine, thousands of dollars in cash and offers of money laundering.

U.S. Attorney David Kustoff said the federal indictment alleges Hebron made several offers to launder money for an undercover informant. Prosecutors began this case after they received a tip.

"This investigation was originated by the Memphis Police Department," Kustoff said.

Federal documents allege that the informant agreed to give Hebron about $3,000 in cash. In exchange for the cash, Hebron promised to launder the money and return $2,400 of it in the form of a check.

Documents show Hebron never followed through, and told the informant he used some of the money "to pay some bills."

"This was a very thorough investigation and an investigation that brought someone to justice who wears the uniform," Kustoff said.

The indictment also alleges Hebron agreed to assist the informant in a robbery at a mini- storage last November where the informant says thousands of dollars in cash and two kilos of cocaine were stored.

This time the informant gave Hebron $4,900 to launder. Both decided to hide the fake drugs planted by the FBI.

When FBI agents interviewed Hebron about the break-in two months later, Prosecutors say he admitted to being there, but made several false statements about the incident.

"This office takes public corruption very seriously," Kustoff said. "It's a priority of this office."

Hebron was hired at the department in 1995. He was assigned to school security at Mitchell High School. He faces 15 years imprisonment if convicted.

Neteller Founder Pledges To Fight Charges (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott In New York

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

John Lefebvre, the co-founder of Neteller who stands accused of laundering billions of dollars in illegal online gaming proceeds, plans to fight all of the charges against him, his lawyer said.

"He's going to be contesting everything we know about the charges right now," said Vincent Marella, his attorney, outside the New York court where Mr Lefebvre was due to appear yesterday for a bail hearing.

Stephen Lawrence, the other founder of the London-listed online money transfer company who is charged alongside Mr Lefebvre, last week confirmed he would also contest the allegations.

Mr Lefebvre is on $5m bail and has had his passport confiscated after being arrested in Los Angeles last Monday. His lawyer described the circumstances of his arrest as a surprise, and said the US authorities were trying to send a message with the recent spate of arrests in the online gambling industry. "I think they want to stress the point that they are serious about enforcing gaming laws."

The US justice department considers online gambling to be illegal although it is an established and regulated industry elsewhere in the world.

David Carruthers, former chief executive of Betonsports, is awaiting trial in St Louis on fraud and racketeering charges related to his role at the internet gaming company.

But some US lawyers have questioned whether criminal prosecutions are likely to be successful because the companies involved are not based on US soil.

Mr Marella questions the validity of the charges. "I don't know why the [US authorities] are bothering with this now, or why at all. It's not clear that this is a liable area of law enforcement."

Neteller quit its US business following the arrests.

The US attorney for the Southern District of New York has sparked anger in London by seeking information from several banks and other businesses in connection with a wide-ranging inquiry into online gaming.

UC Riverside Official Is Indicted In Bribery Case (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

A UC Riverside administrator was indicted Wednesday on federal charges of soliciting and receiving several bribes from the contractor in charge of constructing the university's psychology building.

Theodore Chiu, 53, an associate director of the Office of Design and Construction, solicited a $50,000 bribe from Irvine contractor FTR International Inc. on Oct. 31, according to the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles.

Chiu asked for the payment when the company's president, Nizar Katbi, raised concerns about the $35-million project, including Chiu's choice of a subcontractor, according to an FBI affidavit.

Feds Probing Pirro - Again (NYDN)

By Leo Standora, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, January 25, 2007

The feds have again widened their criminal probe of former Westchester District Attorney Jeanine Pirro - this time to see if she used the resources of her office in her failed campaign against Sen. Hillary Clinton, WNBC reported yesterday.

FBI agents and local investigators are focusing on whether Republican Pirro or her staffers ran background checks on donors to her 2006 senatorial campaign using computers and databases at the DA's office, the station's Jonathan Dienst reported.

A number of former members of Pirro's campaign have been questioned by investigators, he said.

"If she used the resources of her office to check whether her donors were criminals, that's a good thing, not a bad thing," he said.

Those who donated to Pirro's campaign included numerous contractors and real estate executives who have done business with her husband, Albert.

The good news for the couple yesterday was that Albert Pirro was reinstated as a lawyer, more than six years after he was disbarred for a tax fraud conviction.

His misadventures - the tax conviction, fathering a child with another woman, speeding tickets - often have been blamed for his wife's failure to rise beyond the local level in GOP politics. Jeanine Pirro eventually dropped out of the race against Clinton because of pressure from party chiefs.

She then switched to the state attorney general's race, losing to Andrew Cuomo.

She initially came under investigation for allegedly plotting to eavesdrop on her husband. The probe was later widened to include a jewelry business she ran briefly while DA.

Naples Daily News, January 25, 2007

Fernando Ferrer Jr. faces up to 30 years at his April sentencing

A jury Wednesday convicted a Collier County man of stealing the identities of 1,130 patients at Cleveland Clinic Naples that were used to submit more than $7 million in false claims to Medicare, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami.

Fernando Ferrer Jr. of Naples, a registered owner of Advanced Medical Claims in Naples, was convicted after a three-day trial in U.S. District Court in Fort Lauderdale on eight counts of conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government, computer fraud, wrongful disclosure of individual health information and aggravated identity theft.

Ferrer, 29, faces up to 30 years in prison at his sentencing April 27 before U.S. District Judge James Cohn in Fort Lauderdale. His co-defendant, Isis Machado, 23, of Miami Lakes, is also scheduled to be sentenced that day by Cohn.

Ferrer and Machado became the first individuals in South Florida convicted of criminal charges for violating the federal law protecting patients' privacy rights, known as the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPPA), according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Machado pleaded guilty on Jan. 11 to one count of conspiracy to commit computer fraud, identify theft and wrongful disclosure of individual health information. She faces a maximum of five years in prison and could be ordered to pay up to $250,000 in fines.

Machado was a front desk coordinator at Cleveland Clinic in Weston beginning in May 2005 and had authorized access to the hospital's computerized patient files.

Ferrer, her cousin, convinced her she could make money by copying patient information, including their Medicare numbers and Social Security numbers, and selling the information to him, according to their indictment in September. Federal authorities say Machado sold the information to Ferrer for $5 to $10 for each patient information.

Machado was caught by a co-worker at Cleveland Clinic Weston on June 26, 2006, and was fired. Hospital officials reported the theft to federal authorities and cooperated with the investigation.

The theft of the patient information resulted in more than $2.5 million in false Medicare claims being paid to health-care providers in the Miami area, according to authorities.

Following the indictment in September, Cleveland Clinic officials in Cleveland, Ohio, wrote the 1,130 Naples patients and established a toll-free number for them to call for help in credit and identity monitoring.

The Bradenton Herald, January 25, 2007

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - A jury convicted a man Wednesday for his involvement in the theft of personal and medical information of more than 1,100 patients at a suburban hospital, authorities said.

Fernando Ferrer Jr., 29, of Naples, was found guilty of one count of conspiring to defraud the United States, one count of computer fraud, one count of wrongful disclosure of individually identifiable health information, and five counts of aggravated identity theft, the U.S. Attorney's Office said in a statement.

Isis Machado, 23, of Miami Lakes, worked as a front desk coordinator at Cleveland Clinic in Weston from May 2005 to June 2006. She downloaded patient files and then sold them to Ferrer, who then made false Medicare claims as owner of Advanced Medical Claims Inc. in Naples, the indictment said.

Ferrer used the information to bill medical providers in Miami for services that were not rendered, resulting in $7 million fraudulently billed to Medicare, federal investigators said.

Machado entered a guilty plea Jan. 12 on one count of conspiracy to commit computer fraud, identify theft and wrongful disclosure of individual health information. Machado then testified against Ferrer.

Ferrer faces a maximum penalty of 30 years in prison.

Machado faces a maximum penalty of five years in prison, a $250,000 fine and could be ordered to pay restitution, according to authorities.

Ferrer and Machado are to be sentenced on April 27.

The names of their attorneys were not immediately known.

'Ambassador To Cash' Convicted In Con (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 25, 2007

A former Chicago investment adviser whose business card touted him as "Ambassador to Cash" was convicted Wednesday by a federal jury of conning an ailing woman out of more than a quarter million dollars.

Jurors took about three hours to find Brian D. McGowan guilty on 18 counts of wire fraud and one count of investment-adviser fraud.

During the nearly three-week trial, testimony by the mother of Michael Jordan and that of athletes with ties to Chicago denied claims by McGowan that he had managed their financial affairs.

Following the verdict, U.S. District Senior Judge John Grady said McGowan's testimony was the most egregious perjury he had seen in more than three decades on the bench.

Prosecutors are to return to Grady's courtroom Thursday in a bid to have McGowan taken into custody as a danger to the community and flight risk. He has been free on bail since he was charged in 2003.

McGowan, 49, now of Hilton Head, S.C., faces up to 5 years in prison at his sentencing May 9, according to Assistant U.S. Atty. Rachel Cannon.

In closing arguments to the jury Wednesday, McGowan's lawyer, Robert Gorence of Albuquerque, claimed that the victim of the fraud, Camille LaMie, formerly of Chicago, had pulled the con on McGowan.

In a rebuttal argument, Assistant U.S. Atty. Diane MacArthur warned jurors that McGowan was "continuing the con and trying to con you."

McGowan was convicted of misrepresenting his experience and qualifications and falsely claiming to manage finances for several sports stars to entice LaMie to invest almost $270,000, nearly her entire life savings.

Jordan's mother, Delores; former Bears player Matt Suhey; former basketball player Tim Hardaway; and former representatives of Bears great Walter Payton all testified that McGowan's claims of managing their investments—caught on the undercover tape-recordings—were false.

Prosecutors said McGowan introduced his mother to LaMie in an effort to win her trust. LaMie, now 63 and living in Myrtle Beach, S.C., has multiple sclerosis and requires a wheelchair.

McGowan claimed that he invested LaMie's $268,000 in legitimate investments, but prosecutors contended most of the money fueled a lavish lifestyle for McGowan.

McGowan bought a house overlooking mountains in Albuquerque, paid off his car lease, took numerous ski trips and shopped at Gucci, prosecutors said.

LaMie grew so desperate to get her money back from McGowan that she once attempted suicide, according to testimony. But Gorence scoffed at the claim as "a joke" and contended it was "another ploy to gain sympathy."

In addition to referring to himself as "Ambassador to Cash" on his business card, McGowan used stationery embossed with displays of foreign and U.S. currency, prosecutors said.

Prosecutor Cannon reminded jurors that McGowan once claimed to LaMie that a check hadn't been delivered to her after his dog bit an Airborne Express employee. Cannon called that explanation "a new twist on the oldest lie"—that the dog had eaten the homework.

"He is hoping to bury the truth in the avalanche of lies he has told you from the witness stand," Cannon told jurors.

Dugan back in DuPage Jail for Nicarico murder trial Convicted killer Brian Dugan was moved to DuPage County Jail on Wednesday to await trial for the 1983 murder of Jeanine Nicarico, 10, of Naperville. Through his lawyers, Dugan had asked to remain in Pontiac Correctional Center throughout the legal proceedings, citing a fear that DuPage inmates might attribute bogus incriminating statements to him. DuPage Judge George Bakalis rejected that request last fall. Dugan, who is serving life terms for two other murders and three sex attacks, has unsuccessfully offered to plead guilty to avoid the death penalty.

Girl, 12, sexually assaulted in Back of the Yards alleyChicago Police are asking for the public's help in finding a man who sexually assaulted a 12-year-old girl Tuesday in a Back of the Yards neighborhood alley. The girl was walking in the 4800 block of South Winchester about 4:45 p.m. Tuesday, when a man chased her into the alley. He grabbed her throat and sexually assaulted her, police said. Police described the attacker as a Hispanic man between 28 and 30 with a thin build and no facial hair. He had a small "post-type earring in his left eyebrow," and wore a dark, hooded sweat shirt and blue jeans, police said. Anyone with information should call police at (312) 492-3810.

Public defenders' chiefs seek Shakman protectionFive division chiefs in the Cook County public defender's office filed a petition in federal court Wednesday asking that their jobs be protected under the Shakman decree banning political hiring and firing. The lawyers -- Dorene Kuffer, Camille Kozlowski, Darlene Williams, Vicki Rogers and Kendall Hill -- received memos on Dec. 8 stating that County Board President Todd Stroger wanted them to sign undated resignation letters. Most ignored the memo, according to the petition. Three weeks later, they were told to sign the letters or they would be fired immediately, according to the petition filed with Judge Wayne Andersen. The filing seeks to have the division chiefs' jobs protected by the Shakman decree.

Investment adviser found guilty of tricking womanA former Chicago investment adviser who lied about having celebrity clients faces up to 5½ years in prison after a jury found him guilty of tricking an ailing woman into investing with him. The jury deliberated for about 3½ hours at the Dirksen Federal Building on Wednesday. Prosecutors said Brian D. McGowan tricked Camille La Mie, 63, into handing over the bulk of her wealth by boasting that his clients included Michael Jordan's mother and former NBA star Tim Hardaway. Prosecutors said McGowan used some of La Mie's money to pay his own bills. McGowan's attorney argued that La Mie, formerly of Chicago, was angry with McGowan because he'd failed to hide her income from the government. She then proceeded to set up McGowan, defense attorney Robert Gorence argued.

James Bray, 27, had recently been arrested at his home on felony weapons violations, authorities said. Police said they were unsure of the motive in his shooting, and nobody was in custody.

No passport, no problem -- yet So what happened to people who flew in to O'Hare and Midway airports Tuesday without the required passport? "Nobody is being detained." Tuesday was the first day for a new rule requiring people entering the United States from Mexico, Canada and the Caribbean by airplane to present a valid passport. The unofficial grace period -- Customs has not decided when it will end -- is designed to document the names of travelers without passports so they can be flagged on future flights. "What, if any, action would be taken then would be determined on a case-by-case basis," said Miles. The first day went smoothly across the country, with Customs reporting no detainees or delays. In Chicago, of the estimated 1,600 people entering O'Hare and Midway on Tuesday from Mexico and the Caribbean, about two dozen did not have passports.

Man dies in plant accident A 20-year-old man died this week after his head got entangled in a hydraulic compressor at a southwest suburban distribution plant. Shawn Menzie, of Harvey, was operating a cardboard compressor Monday at Sertoma Centre at 4100 W. 127th St. in Alsip when he got caught, Alsip Police Chief Robert Troy said. Menzie was feeding pieces of cardboard into the machine and apparently stuck his head into the apparatus, Troy said. It was not clear why Menzie stuck his head into the machine, Troy said. Menzie died from blunt trauma to his head and neck.

Manhattan: Guilty Plea In Defrauding Of Priests (NYT)

Robert Riggio of Manhattan, who was charged with defrauding more than 60 priests over several years, pleaded guilty to wire fraud in Federal District Court yesterday, prosecutors said. Mr. Riggio, 60, faces up to 40 years in prison when he is sentenced in April, said Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan. Mr. Garcia said that Mr. Riggio stole more than $200,000 from 2004 to 2006 by calling priests with bogus pleas for help and requests for money. The funds often came from the priests' personal savings, Mr. Garcia said. Mr. Riggio was arrested in September after he asked for money from an F.B.I. agent posing as the niece of a priest who had been defrauded, Mr. Garcia said.

Shooting Suspects Led Quiet Lives (AP)

By KIM CURTIS

AP, January 25, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO - They'd long since exchanged the radical idealism of their youth for comparatively quiet lives as janitors, job counselors and Little League coaches. They'd become husbands, fathers and grandfathers.

But memories of a violent era in American history came rushing back this week when eight men with ties to the Black Panther Party were arrested in the 1971 killing of a San Francisco police officer.

Prosecutors say members of the Black Liberation Army, a violent offshoot of the Panthers, stormed the lobby of a police station that August night, killing Sgt. John V. Young by firing a shotgun through the speaking hole in a glass partition. A civilian clerk was hit in the arm as she ducked for cover behind a file cabinet.

According to prosecutors, Francisco Torres, Herman Bell and Henry Watson Jones staged the attack. John Bowman, Richard Brown and Harold Taylor were the lookouts. Ray Michael Boudreaux and Ronald Bridgeforth were the getaway drivers.

Anthony Bottom was supposed to be part of the attack team, but he was arrested the night before after attempting to fire a machine gun at a police sergeant.

Bowman died of liver cancer in December, and Bridgeforth is believed to have fled the country.

Seven others were arrested Tuesday on charges of murder and conspiracy to commit murder. An eighth, Richard O'Neal, was charged only with conspiracy.

Investigators say new evidence led them to finally make the arrests in Young's killing, but they won't specify what that is. Lawyers for some of the former BLA members say the case is really about revenge.

It isn't the first time their names were tied to Young's death, but six of the eight men had managed to live relatively normal lives in the ensuing 36 years.

Taylor, now 58, moved to Florida where he worked as a utility lineman and lived with his daughter and girlfriend.

Boudreaux, 64, and Jones, 71, moved to Altadena, north of Pasadena, where they live within a mile of each other and remain friends. Boudreaux is an electrician for Los Angeles County; Jones is a real estate appraiser.

Torres, 58, moved to Queens, New York where he's lived in the same house for 27 years, according to his lawyer, Michael Warren, who called this prosecution "ridiculous" and "without any merit whatsoever." He said his client is a married "family man" with two sons who's active in his community and coaches Little League. He said Torres served in the U.S. Army in Vietnam and was disabled by Agent Orange.

Richard Brown, 65, and Richard O'Neal, 57, stayed in San Francisco. Brown worked for nearly 20 years as a job counselor and developer at a community center and O'Neal worked as a custodian for the city.

Bell, 59, and Bottom, 55, were the two exceptions. Both are serving life sentences for killing two New York City police officers during the same violent spree that claimed Young, according to authorities. But both men earned college degrees in prison, a warden has credited Bottom with helping to prevent riots. Bell, a former scholarship athlete, coaches inmate football teams. Both maintain they were framed by the FBI.

Police reopened the case in 1999, saying they had new information. A grand jury heard evidence and several members of the group refused to testify, but no charges were filed.

In 2005, police turned the case over to the state attorney general's office. Again, several people were summoned and refused to testify, including Taylor, Brown, Boudreaux and Jones. They argued the grand jury system is inherently unfair because defendants aren't allowed to have a lawyer present.

They also protested their treatment during an earlier phase of the investigation.

Two years after the killing, Taylor and Bowman were arrested in New Orleans. But a judge dismissed the charges in 1976 because the men had allegedly been tortured by San Francisco police officers during an interrogation.

Over three days, the men said, they were stripped, blindfolded and beaten. They were covered with blankets soaked in boiling water and their genitals shocked with an electric prod. Without food or water, Taylor has said publicly, the men finally relented and confessed.

Under those circumstances, Taylor recalled during a recent public speaking engagement, "Whatever you want me to say, I will say it."

Until the officers who beat them were brought to justice, the men said, they would refuse to answer the grand jury's questions. They went public, speaking to activist and community groups from Boston to Chicago and vowing to dedicate the rest of their lives to stopping torture.

They even gained the support of Harvard law professor Charles Ogletree and actor and San Francisco native Danny Glover. Ogletree did not return a call on Wednesday; Glover was in India and unavailable.

Two defense lawyers said Wednesday they believe the new charges are retaliation for the former Panthers' public statements.

"The government was embarrassed" when earlier attempts to indict the men fell through, said Warren, Torres' lawyer.

Taylor appeared briefly in court Wednesday via a video link from a Panama City, Fla. jail, where he's being held without bail. He said he would fight extradition to California, but does not yet have a lawyer.

Jones' lawyer, John Philipsborn, said he looks forward to defending his client.

Boudreaux's lawyer, Michael Burt, said his client is innocent. "He didn't murder anybody," he said.

Brown's longtime friend, the Rev. Amos Brown, called him a "decent human being," who's been active in his community. He's a member of the African American Police Community Relations Board and an anti-poverty neighborhood group. The pastor of Third Baptist Church said he visited his friend in jail Tuesday and he declared his innocence.

Associated Press Writers Marcus Wohlsen in San Francisco, Tom Hays in New York City, Melissa Nelson in Pensacola, Fla. and AP researcher Rhonda Shafner contributed to this report.

Stunned Friends Laud The Men They Know Now (SFC)

By Leslie Fulbright And Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, January 25, 2007

Talk in the Western Addition, whether on the steps of old Victorians, on the benches near the community center or among residents of the housing projects, is centered on Richard Brown.

Not the Richard Brown who police say participated in the killing of a police officer 35 years ago, but the Richard Brown who is a father, community activist and mentor to neighborhood youth.

And at a Bayview district community center, some workers on Wednesday were still reeling from the news that Richard O'Neal, a 57-year-old maintenance man who changed their lights and joked with them, did not show up for work because he is in jail.

Brown, 65, is among eight men charged Tuesday with murdering San Francisco police Sgt. John Young and conspiring to commit murder in other attacks. O'Neal, who also lives in the Western Addition, was arrested but charged only with conspiracy.

"Richard Brown is someone who is intensely concerned with his community and goes way beyond the call of duty," said the Rev. Arnold Townsend, an assistant pastor at Rhema Word Christian Fellowship Church who has known Brown for nearly 40 years. "He's been involved in almost every good work that went on in our neighborhood."

Jim Queen, a commissioner with the city's Juvenile Probation Department, has known Brown for 20 years and has watched the effect he had on neighborhood youth over the years.

"He has a fantastic rapport with the young people in the Western Addition," Queen said.

"He grew up there and had a special way with the kids, a stern tough-love way. He demanded high standards and made sure he was always available to them," Queen said.

DOJ_NMG_0121561

Brown, who lives in the apartment complex on the 1000 block of Fillmore Street, worked for 20 years as a program coordinator in the Employment Service Program at the Ella Hill Hutch Community Center until he was laid off three years ago. He also is a founding member of the African American Police Community Relations Board and several other neighborhood organizations.

"His job was never 9 to 5," Townsend said. "He was at community meetings at night, on boards, in the neighborhood, working for affordable housing. He was always bugging me to come to meetings. We didn't do fun together; I never saw him out in the clubs."

O'Neal, who has two grown sons and whose wife was murdered in 1979, has worked for the past few years at the Southeast Community Center on Oakdale Avenue in the Bayview. The four-story concrete building primarily houses classes offered by City College of San Francisco.

People who work there said they were stunned by his arrest, recalling him as a kind and gentle man who always had a smile on his face and would at times stay late to fix lights or other things.

Veronica Hunnicutt, the dean of the southeast college campus, said she knew a teenage O'Neal when she was a schoolteacher in the late 1960s.

She met him again through his job at the facility.

"Oh, my God, we're just utterly stunned. It's taken us all aback because he is such a nice man," Hunnicutt said. "He is a trusted employee who would do anything to help us.

"I hope they look at all of the information, because this man has been wonderful out here. He would take the shirt off his back to try to help you."

Henry Calhoun, a site supervisor at the campus, said O'Neal is a good person, "friendly, outgoing, easy to get along with. I hope everything will be all right for him in the long run. I hope they release him."

Both Brown and O'Neal have criminal records. Brown was arrested twice in 1968 for his alleged involvement in shootouts with police. He also was convicted in 1961 of robbery and in 1973 of buying a gun with a fake identification and denying he was a felon.

State prosecutors said O'Neal was one of three men who opened fire on Lawrence Heap, a patrol special officer who was sitting in a car outside a San Francisco convalescent home he was guarding.

Heap was struck in both arms but returned fire, wounding O'Neal. O'Neal, then 21, was convicted and served prison time in the case, his attorney said.

Police said all the men charged Tuesday were members of the Black Liberation Army, a militant offshoot of the Black Panthers that operated from about 1971 to 1981.

"We all make mistakes with our lives," Hunnicutt said. "Based on the gentleman that we worked with and how kind and gentle of a man we knew, it would be a shame if what he has done with his life is not factored into this. We know people are punished for their crimes, but there is also something called redemption."

Neighbors said O'Neal is a quiet guy. He has worked for the city's public works department since 1981. Over the years, he made street signs and did maintenance work at City Hall, just a few blocks from his home.

Attorney James Bustamante described O'Neal as an "easygoing, straight-shooting guy" who hasn't been in trouble with the law since his early 20s.

Many in the Western Addition community knew both men: O'Neal was the quiet one who kept to himself, and Brown was an activist and mentor to neighborhood youth.

Mesha Monge-Irizarry, whose son was killed by San Francisco police, knows Brown through his work with the African American Police Community Relations Board.

"He is a very focused brother who does a lot of work without taking credit, who is loved and respected by the community," she said. "The arrest of this old man, who has been a youth counselor fighting violence day to day, is obscene. He was deterring kids from street crime, helping our youth to have a positive outlook on their future."

Dario Harper, 35, grew up in the Western Addition and has known Brown his entire life.

"He has this way of talking to young people and helping them understand they have to change the way they live if they want to survive," Harper said. "Based on his life experiences, people respected him so they listened.

"We don't have a lot of older people who take the time to talk to us like he does."

THE DEATH OF SGT. JOHN YOUNG Ex-militant Seen As Likely To Testify At Cohorts' Trial (SFC)

By Jaxon Van Derbeken, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 25, 2007

Now, defense attorneys suspect, Scott will be alone among the former militants to testify against his one-time confederates, who were charged Tuesday in the 1971 slaying of San Francisco police Sgt. John Young and a larger conspiracy to kill police.

While state prosecutors won't say whether Scott will take the witness stand, defense attorneys say he is the only insider whose testimony has ever been used to convict BLA members of a crime.

And he is the only former BLA member previously indicted in the slaying of Young whom prosecutors have chosen not to name again in the current case. The charges against him were dismissed in 1976.

"We assume he is a witness for the government -- he had a case dismissed in San Francisco on this very same incident," said Stuart Hanlon, a lawyer for Herman Bell, an alleged leader in the group who was convicted when Scott testified in the New York case and who now is accused of killing Young with a shotgun.

If Scott is slated to take the stand for the prosecution, a major issue will be whether his testimony should be allowed -- or believed -- because of statements he long ago gave implicating himself and two other reputed BLA members in Young's slaying while incarcerated in a New Orleans jail.

The confession led to the 1975 indictments of Scott, Harold Taylor and John Bowman in the ambush attack on San Francisco's Ingleside Police Station that resulted in Young's death and the wounding of a civilian clerk.

But the statements were ruled inadmissible because of court findings that they had been obtained after the men were tortured by New Orleans police and denied access to defense lawyers.

Scott, in a taped interview with a radio journalist in December 1975, said he was subjected to days of torture in New Orleans. The abuse relented, he said, only when he was speaking to federal agents and San Francisco police.

He recounted how he was stripped and punched in the stomach and chest. He said at one point his feet were put in a water tank and he was threatened with electrocution. New Orleans police also stuck him with cattle prods and needles, he said.

"They have a little thing: They don't hit you in the face, where it would show," he said. One investigator cocked a gun and threatened to shoot him through the ear "to see if the bullet would come out the other ear," he said.

Over a period of four to five days, he said, "New Orleans police department would wup on you, beat you, then bring you to the FBI to talk."

The alleged abuse occurred two years after Young was shot on Aug. 29, 1971, when at least three men stormed into Ingleside Police Station and, through an opening in the station's bulletproof glass, blasted the veteran police officer with a shotgun, killing him. A civilian clerk also was shot in the attack, but she survived.

The current charges name Bell as Young's killer. Also named in the charges is another man convicted of killing the New York officers, Anthony Bottom. They are also accused of orchestrating a larger conspiracy to kill officers between 1968 and 1973. Taylor and Bowman, who recently died, are also named in the charges, as are Richard Brown, Francisco "Cisco" Torres, Ray Boudreaux and Henry Watson Jones. Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth is charged but has not been arrested. Richard O'Neal, a custodian at San Francisco City Hall, is named in the broader conspiracy but not in the Young slaying. Brown and O'Neal appeared in San Francisco Superior Court on Tuesday but did not enter a plea.

Hanlon, Bell's defense lawyer in the new San Francisco case, said that given what Scott has been subjected to -- and other statements he has made at odds with his past confession -- his credibility as a witness is doubtful.

"He has given various statements saying he was tortured," said Hanlon. "He's just all over the place. He had been tortured. He is a tortured soul."

Scott also recounted the torture when he testified in 1975 to help convict BLA members Bell, now 59, Bottom, now 55, and the late Albert Nuh Washington of the slayings of the two New York police.

The prosecutor in the New York slayings, Robert Tanenbaum, now a private lawyer in Beverly Hills who co-wrote a book on the case, said Scott's testimony helped gain convictions of three men in the May 21, 1971, slaying of New York police Officers Waverly Jones and Joseph Piagentini.

The first trial of five men originally charged in the New York officers' death did not go well for prosecutors, Tanenbaum said. After the first trial ended in a hung jury, a New York police investigator went to New Orleans to talk to Scott again, Tanenbaum recalled.

The investigator said Scott had previously suggested he had an "ace in the hole," Tanenbaum said. At that point, Scott -- facing charges in San Francisco in the slaying of Young four years earlier -- suddenly agreed to testify against the five men who were accused, helping secure three convictions. The charges against two brothers, Francisco and Gabriel Torres, were dismissed during the second trial.

Scott, at the time of the second trial, was being held on suspicion of a bank robbery in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0121563

It was Scott, Tanenbaum said, who led authorities to a missing gun that belonged to one of the New York officers. Scott went with authorities to Mississippi, who unearthed the gun where Scott said he watched Bell bury it on a farm where Bell grew up.

"Everything he said to us was corroborated -- when you put a witness on, you vouch for his credibility as an officer of the court. I thought he was credible. Based on the corroboration, I thought he was highly credible," the former prosecutor said.

Scott also recounted how New Orleans police tortured him into confession, using cattle prods, Tanenbaum said. He also expressed fear to the judge that his life was at risk in custody.

Amid the allegations of abuse, the first San Francisco case collapsed in 1976. The grand jury indictment was dismissed after a court found that the men lacked counsel and had been tortured in New Orleans.

Michael Burt, who represents Boudreaux in the Young slaying, said Scott apparently testified before the grand jury that later indicted him. Burt said he has records showing that Scott was the only one of three accused who got such a subpoena. He apparently was a cooperating witness, Burt said.

Still, Burt said, defense lawyers have never seen any grand jury testimony by Scott or anyone else in the indictment.

"The file is missing -- we have made lots of efforts to get it," Burt said. "The original file and testimony and everything that happened are no longer part of the public record."

Convicted NY Cop Killer Stole Pennsylvania Man's Identity (AP)

By William Kates, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2007

The real John T. Healy wants everyone to know he's no cop killer.

"I'm just a regular guy," said Healy, 47, of Yardley, Pa., who has endured a nightmare over the past two weeks after learning that the man who apparently stole his identity two years ago was charged with _ and ultimately convicted of _ killing an upstate New York police officer.

It was bad enough the thief stole $3,500 from his bank accounts, purchased a used Cadillac Escalade under his name, bought car insurance and even bailed a criminal cohort out of jail _ which led to an armed bounty hunter showing up at his doorstep.

Now, Healy runs the risk of forever having his name linked with a convicted murderer.

"It's been quite unsettling," Healy said in a telephone interview Wednesday.

"It's not so much the money, I've gotten that back. It's the hassle and aggravation, over and over," said Healy, a salesman for Home Depot. "Seeing your name in the paper being charged with murdering a cop is pretty intense."

The man authorities prosecuted under the name John Healy was convicted Monday of second-degree murder for his role in the death of New Hartford Police Officer Joseph Corr following a million-dollar jewelry store robbery.

Corr, 30, was gunned down in February 2006 behind a convenience store in Kirkland, N.Y., as he chased "Healy" and an accomplice, Walter Richardson, who were running away after their getaway car crashed.

"Healy" was captured at the crash scene and charged with murder because he participated in the crimes that led to Corr's death. Richardson, the suspected gunman, hijacked a tow truck and fled. He was killed the next day in a shootout with U.S. Marshals near his home in Chester, Pa., 15 miles southwest of Philadelphia.

Assistant Oneida County District Attorney Kurt Hameline said the defendant was indicted as "John Healy, et al," because a check of his fingerprints turned up approximately 20 different aliases.

Prosecutors settled on the name John T. Healy because the suspect had a Pennsylvania driver's license with that name on it, Hameline said.

"We assumed it was a name he made up. We did not know there was a real John T. Healy until after jury selection began," said Hameline, who only learned of the real John Healy when he got a call Jan. 10 from Yardley Police Officer William Golden, who was investigating the stolen identity case.

At that point, Hameline said, prosecutors decided to go ahead with the trial rather than introduce an element of doubt about who the defendant was. The jury convicted the fake Healy after deliberating for just two hours.

"We're still not 100 percent sure who he really is. Toussaint Martin is a name he was using most recently before he was John Healy, but we're not even sure of that one. It didn't make sense to make a motion to change his name if we don't even know if it's the right one," Hameline said.

FBI Special Agent Jerri Williams in Philadelphia said Wednesday that the defendant is known to her agency as Toussaint Martin, 38, formerly of Philadelphia. He has been "known to law enforcement for a number of years" and was a suspect in other jewelry store robberies when he was caught in New York, she said.

If the defendant's identity is firmly established before he is sentenced on March 22, prosecutors will make a motion then to change his name, Hameline said. If not, he will be sentenced as John Healy and prosecutors will ask Judge Michael Dwyer to issue a legal document clarifying the real John T. Healy's identity so he can prove he's not a convicted murderer.

"We understand the problems this has created for him and obviously we're sorry that he's had to suffer these consequences," Hameline said.

Healy suspects his identity was stolen in autumn 2005 when he lived in an apartment in Yardley. He said maintenance men were in his apartment at the time. After they left, his benefits package from his employer _ including his Social Security number _ turned up missing, along with one of his checks.

He's also experienced problems traveling. He said he had to endure lengthy interrogations from customs officials when he returned from a trip to Canada and from ship employees when he came back from a cruise in the Caribbean. Each time he had to explain his identity had been stolen.

Healy said he was unaware of the murder trial until two weeks ago when he received calls from local media outlets.

"I had buddies call up and say, 'Hey, can I get some jewelry for my wife?'" he said, trying to find some humor in his situation.

Hameline said the fact that the ID theft is on record in national criminal databases should protect the real John Healy in the future. Healy, who is separated with two young daughters, said his credit appears fine. He recently bought a new house.

"I'm not bitter about it, and I wouldn't have wanted to jeopardize their case, but it's strange to me that they couldn't figure out who he was before they tried him. They had, what, 11 months? I just don't understand," Healy said.

Documents Dispute Delays Coke Secrets Trial (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 25, 2007

The judge in the Coke secrets trial sent the jury home Wednesday morning so attorneys could haggle over how to handle sensitive documents the company says contain proprietary trade information.

Coke's lawyers and prosecutors had thought the judge was going to seal hundreds of pages of Coca-Cola documents from public view, showing them only to jurors who would be sworn to secrecy.

Testimony Delayed In Coca-Cola Trial (AP)

By Johnny C. Clark

AP, January 25, 2007

ATLANTA - A federal judge delayed testimony Wednesday in the trial of a former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant because of controversy over the use of sensitive documents.

A government prosecutor asked for a recess to review more than 750 pages of defense documents to determine whether portions should be redacted before being shown to the jury.

U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester granted the recess until 11 a.m. Thursday. When Forrester released the jury for the day, he expressed frustration with the prosecution and defense attorneys.

"In an effort to simplify things - they didn't," Forrester said.

Joya Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal conspiracy charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty. Two co-defendants have pleaded guilty to conspiracy, and one has testified against her.

Williams, Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged plans were foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light.

The executive Williams worked for, Javier Sanchez Lamelas, is expected to return to the stand when testimony resumes. He testified Tuesday that there was no reason for Williams to bring confidential Coca-Cola documents to her home.

Coca-Cola Trial Halted As U.S., Company Seek To Shield Secrets (AR/BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

The Arizona Republic, January 25, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121565

ATLANTA - A former Coca-Cola Co. secretary's trade-secrets theft trial was stopped for a day so the company can work with prosecutors to keep sensitive information from becoming public.

A dispute over documentary evidence arose between prosecutors and defense lawyers as Javier Sanchez Lamelas, a company vice president for trademarks, was to resume testifying Wednesday against Joya Williams. U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester stopped the trial until today.

At issue is whether much or all of the defense documentary evidence would be sealed, even though it had been edited by the government to delete trade secrets. Forrester said edited papers introduced in court will be made public. The judge gave prosecutors another day to talk with company lawyers and re-edit papers if necessary.

Killer's Statement Won't Lead To Charges (AP)

By Gene Johnson, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, January 25, 2007

SEATTLE -- A convicted murderer's statements to the FBI about the deaths of two young girls in Washington are not sufficient to bring criminal charges in the deaths, though the man remains "a viable person of interest" in the slayings, investigators said Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors in Idaho said Tuesday that Joseph Edward Duncan III had confessed to the Washington killings and the slaying of a California boy in statements to the FBI after he was arrested in July 2005 with an Idaho girl who had vanished seven weeks earlier.

The prosecutors referred to the statements in a filing in which they gave their notice of intent to seek the death penalty on charges that Duncan kidnapped the Idaho girl, Shasta Groene, and kidnapped and killed her brother, Dylan.

But on Wednesday, Washington authorities said the statements about the deaths in their state weren't enough to merit charges. Though Duncan's statements revealed some knowledge of the case, he could have gleaned it from a fellow inmate or elsewhere, King County sheriff's spokesman Sgt. John Urquhart said.

He said the county could not file charges based on the information Duncan provided, but that Duncan would remain "a viable person of interest."

"Characterizing what Duncan said as a 'confession' has a huge impact on the family," Urquhart said. "They think the case has been solved and that we know who killed their kids. But we don't know that for sure, and we continue to investigate."

In the notice of intent to seek the death penalty, the U.S. attorney's office in Boise said Duncan confessed to killing Carmen Cubias, 9, and Sammiejo White, 11, in Washington state in 1996 and Anthony Martinez, 10, in California in 1997.

The two girls were abducted from the Crest Motel in Seattle. Their skeletal remains were found 17 months later in Bothell, a Seattle suburb.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Wendy Olson in Boise has declined to discuss Duncan's statements in detail. The King County prosecutor's office in Seattle also declined to comment.

Duncan pleaded guilty last October in Idaho state court to first-degree murder and kidnapping for the May 16, 2005, hammer slayings of Dylan and Shasta's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie, and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade. Prosecutors say he killed them to get Dylan and Shasta, then took the siblings to the mountains of Montana, sexually abused them for weeks, and killed Dylan. The boy's body was found at a remote campsite.

The girl was rescued when she was seen with Duncan at a Denny's restaurant in Idaho.

California authorities have charged Duncan in the Martinez case; they said a partial fingerprint was matched to Duncan.

Deal Struck Over Jeffs' Evidence? (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 25, 2007

Federal prosecutors say they have struck a deal with Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs over documents, letters and other evidence seized when he was arrested.

That deal voids any claims Jeffs has that the documents are privileged communications between the polygamist leader and his followers, the U.S. Attorney's Office for Utah said in a motion asking a federal judge to dismiss the evidence-dispute case in Nevada.

Jeffs' lawyers maintain the documents are protected under his First Amendment right to freedom of religion. Richard Wright, Jeffs' Nevada attorney, was out of town and did not return a call seeking comment Wednesday.

In court documents filed in federal court in Las Vegas, the U.S. Attorney's Office revealed that a deal was made with Jeffs in the days following his arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0121566

"The United States would provide Mr. Jeffs' counsel with copies of all documents and imaged computer files seized from the Escalade so that Mr. Jeffs and his counsel could designate which items they believed to be privileged," assistant U.S. Attorney Jared Bennett wrote, adding that Jeffs agreed to it.

Jeffs, 51, was a fugitive on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until his capture in a traffic stop near Las Vegas last August. Jeffs was in a Cadillac Escalade with one of his wives and his brother when they were pulled over by a Nevada Highway Patrol trooper because the vehicle's temporary tag wasn't visible.

In an affidavit obtained by the Deseret Morning News on Wednesday, an FBI agent revealed more details about Jeffs' arrest. Conflicting stories raised suspicions about a man in the car who identified himself as "John Findley."

"The driver of the Escalade was removed from the vehicle for questioning, whereupon he told the trooper that he and his two companions in the Escalade were on a one-week vacation," FBI Special Agent Martin Schwarz wrote. "The driver stated that they had been to San Francisco, Calif., to see the ocean and that they were travelling to Hilldale (sic), Utah."

Warren Jeffs The trooper questioned "John Findley," who said they were on their way back to Denver.

After getting the driver's consent to search, the trooper found envelopes addressed to "President Jeffs" and two yellow envelopes containing cash, debit cards and tools. FBI agents arrived on the scene and spoke to "John Findley," who admitted he was Warren Jeffs.

A search warrant for the Escalade was filed days later.

"The FBI inventory found numerous items, including hundreds of documents, computers, cash, debit cards, several electronic devices, wigs, and masks," Schwarz wrote.

A few days after Jeffs' arrest, Wright filed an emergency motion in federal court seeking to have the papers either returned to the FLDS leader or sealed. The U.S. Attorney's Office claims a deal was made to let Jeffs' attorneys review the seized evidence. Federal authorities have organized a special "taint team" of lawyers to look at the documents and computer files and settle any disputes over what is privileged.

Jeffs' lawyers are crafting a list of evidence they believe is privileged, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"Mr. Jeffs concedes that 'adequate safeguards are in place' to protect the allegedly privileged seized materials," Bennett wrote.

In the court documents, the U.S. Attorney's Office said that Jeffs remains "the subject of an ongoing federal investigation." U.S. Attorney's spokeswoman Melodie Rydalch would not comment beyond that statement on Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors have also asked that any future legal challenges be moved from Las Vegas to Salt Lake City, where the FBI's case is based.

Meanwhile, lawyers for the financial arm of the FLDS Church want a judge to let them see what the FBI seized. The lawyers have filed court papers asking to see if any evidence has to do with the United Effort Plan Trust, which is now under a Utah court's control.

Jeffs is facing an April trial on charges of rape as an accomplice. He is accused of performing a child bride marriage between a 14-year-old girl and her 19-year-old cousin.

Jurors Hear Closings In Case Against Abortion Provider's Killer (AP)

By Carolyn Thompson

AP, January 25, 2007

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) — Anti-abortion extremist James Kopp made a last attempt Wednesday to convince jurors he didn't mean to kill a doctor he shot, while a prosecutor countered there are "no do-overs" when shooting someone.

The two sides presented their closing arguments in Kopp's trial on charges he violated the federal Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act by killing Dr. Barnett Slepian with a single shot from a Russian military rifle in 1998. He could face life in prison without parole if convicted.

Kopp, known as "Atomic Dog" among his peers, is already serving a 25-year-to-life sentence for a state conviction on second-degree murder in the doctor's death.

Representing himself during his federal trial, he acknowledged firing the shot that killed Slepian inside his Amherst home but said his goal was to disable the doctor and prevent him from performing abortions the following day.

"If it happened the way I wanted it to, he would have his arm in a sling," said Kopp, 52, who is suspected in the nonfatal shootings of three Canadian doctors and one in Rochester.

"There are no do-overs, no take-backs when you take an assault rifle and pull the trigger," Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathleen Mehltretter said.

Though U.S. District Judge Richard Arcara had instructed Kopp not to discuss abortion during the trial, Kopp at least twice began describing the procedure in detail during his closing statement and was stopped each time by the prosecution and judge.

DOJ_NMG_0121567

"Abortion is murder. I tried to stop it," he said.

"Dr. Slepian, bless his heart, he felt force reflected back on him that he began," Kopp said, as Slepian's widow, Lynne, and her parents watched from the courtroom's front row.

Lynne Slepian and two of the couple's four children, then 7 to 15 years old, were in the kitchen with Slepian when the bullet pierced his body and ricocheted off a cabinet and wall before coming to rest in an adjoining room.

"Do not be concerned your vote is a vote against children," Mehltretter told jurors. "It is a vote for children to live in a safe and orderly society."

After the Oct. 23, 1998, shooting, Kopp fled to Mexico, Ireland and finally France, where he was captured in March 2001. He was added — along with Osama bin Laden — to the FBI's list of the Ten Most Wanted fugitives in June 1999.

Jurors deliberated about an hour Wednesday before being sent home after asking to review testimony concerning the timeline of the shooting. Deliberations were scheduled to resume Thursday morning.

3rd Dallas Sibling Gets Prison Over Katrina Relief Theft (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, January 25, 2007

A Dallas man who used stolen Hurricane Katrina debit cards is joining two of his siblings in prison over the same scam, authorities said.

Abram Wesley Hines, 25, was sentenced Wednesday to 10 months behind bars, the U.S. attorney's office said.

He's the middle brother of Brian Oneal Hines, 21, and Charmaine Denise Hines, 32, also of Dallas.

Brian Hines was a paid Red Cross temporary worker and also a volunteer, officials said. He admitted stealing at least 80 Red Cross debit cards meant for victims of Katrina, which hit the Gulf coast in August 2005.

He was sentenced to 30 months and ordered to make nearly $203,000 in restitution. She was sentenced to 41 months in prison and ordered to repay more than $23,000.

Evidence presented Wednesday to U.S. District Judge Jorge Solis indicated Abram Hines received about $15,000 in cash, credit cards and a car as a result of the fraud.

New Ethics Charges For N.C. Prosecutor (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, January 25, 2007

Mike Nifong, whose prosecution of three Duke University lacrosse players on rape and sexual misconduct charges has faced growing criticism, has been hit with a second set of misconduct charges.

In a complaint filed Wednesday, the North Carolina State Bar accused Durham County District Attorney Nifong of withholding evidence from the defense and making misleading statements in court. It charged him last month with violating rules of professional conduct by making misleading and inflammatory statements to reporters about the athletes, who were suspended from the university.

Duke permitted two of the athletes, Reade Seligmann and Collin Finnerty, to return to school this month, following the dismissal Dec. 22 of rape charges, the most serious charges against them. The third defendant, David Evans, has graduated. All three say they are innocent.

The expanded ethics complaint, which says Nifong's actions amount to a "systematic abuse of prosecutorial discretion," could lead to his disbarment, says L. Thomas Lunsford II, the state bar's executive director.

Nifong's lawyer, Dudley Witt, says, "We will strongly dispute any suggestion he (Nifong) intentionally withheld evidence." He says his client will not step down and continues "his day-to-day duties."

The complaint says a trial is scheduled for May.

Nifong removed himself from the case Jan 12. He said he had a conflict of interest after the first ethics charges were filed. The office of State Attorney General Roy Cooper has taken over.

Cooper has a special prosecutions unit that handles dozens of cases annually referred by district attorneys, says his spokeswoman, Noelle Talley.

Nifong dropped the rape charges after the accuser, a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a lacrosse team party last March, said she was no longer certain she'd been raped. Nifong said he would continue to pursue kidnapping and sexual offense charges.

DOJ_NMG_0121568

The new complaint cites instances between May and mid-December when Nifong said in court or legal filings that he knew of no additional evidence that would help the defense. The complaint says that testing done by DNA Security Inc. had concluded by April 10 that none of the samples given to police by 46 lacrosse players matched any material found on the accuser. A week later, Nifong charged two of the men with rape.

Last month, DNA Security's director testified that he and Nifong agreed to include only DNA matches in their report, not results showing no matches between the accuser and players.

Nifong, despite the controversy over his handling of the Duke case, won election last fall after being appointed in the spring to replace a district attorney who had become a judge.

More Ethics Charges Brought Against Official In Duke Case (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

The North Carolina State Bar filed a second, more serious round of ethics charges yesterday against the district attorney in Durham, N.C., accusing him of "systematic abuse of prosecutorial discretion" in the sexual assault case against three former members of the Duke University lacrosse team.

The bar complaint said the district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, had illegally withheld DNA evidence from defense lawyers and then intentionally misled the presiding judge and bar officials about doing so.

The new charges added to a previous ethics complaint accusing Mr. Nifong of making false and prejudicial remarks about the case to the news media. A three-member independent panel is expected to hear the matter against him this summer. Penalties could include disbarment.

Mr. Nifong's lawyer, David B. Freedman, denied yesterday that there had been "any sort of intentional unethical conduct." In a telephone interview, Mr. Freedman said that Mr. Nifong had a "flawless record" for ethics in 28 years as a prosecutor and that a written response, to be issued within 30 days, would give his side of the case.

"I have great confidence the panel will render a fair and just verdict," Mr. Freedman said.

The case against the former players is being reviewed by the state attorney general's office, which took it over from Mr. Nifong after he recused himself on Jan. 12. At the time, he said he faced a conflict of interest between prosecuting the case and defending himself against the first set of ethics charges, filed Dec. 28.

Much of the new ethics complaint focuses on Mr. Nifong's handling of private DNA testing and his remarks to a judge and bar officials about it. Those tests were arranged by Mr. Nifong after a state laboratory found no semen, blood or saliva from lacrosse players on or in the woman or on her clothes. Using a more sophisticated test, the private laboratory found DNA from multiple men on the woman and her underwear, but none from any of the lacrosse players.

Mr. Nifong and the lab director decided to tell defense lawyers only about the positive matches, including a link to the woman's boyfriend, in a summary report of the DNA work, said the bar, a state agency that regulates lawyers in North Carolina. The negative findings, which the bar said "tended to negate the guilt of the accused," were included only in laboratory reports not given to defense lawyers for more than six months.

North Carolina law requires prosecutors to share all relevant information with defense lawyers promptly. Mr. Nifong told the judge in the case that he had turned over everything he had — "a misrepresentation and false statement of material fact made to a tribunal," the bar wrote. Mr. Nifong later objected to a defense request to turn over the full laboratory reports, citing cost and privacy concerns and terming the papers sought "a witch hunt list," the bar said.

Mr. Nifong said in court on Dec. 15 that a defense motion two days earlier on the withheld DNA results was "the first I heard of this particular situation." Later he said he had meant that it was the first he had heard of defense accusations that the results had been concealed, not that they existed. But the bar said the accusations themselves had not been raised until after Mr. Nifong spoke in court.

In an interview last month, Mr. Nifong agreed that the DNA results had been potentially exculpatory, but said they had not seemed important to him because he was no longer then pursuing the case on the basis of DNA evidence.

Convicted Con Artist Tells How He Could Steal Your Home (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, January 25, 2007

LEAVENWORTH, Kan. — When Brent Barber tells you — and he's about to — how easy it is to steal your house out from under you, or take your money and ruin your credit, even while he's sitting in prison, you'd better listen.

DOJ_NMG_0121569

A one-time millionaire with a house on a golf course, Barber was sentenced in October to 12 years in prison for masterminding the largest mortgage fraud ever prosecuted in Missouri, and most other states too, the FBI says. He pleaded guilty to a five-year scam that involved nearly 300 properties in Kansas City, Mo., and victimized more than 80 people.

Nationally, mortgage fraud has spread in the past few years, with losses totaling around $1 billion last year, the FBI says. The real estate boom, along with looser lending standards, built an ideal breeding ground for smooth-talking con artists like Barber. Those hurt by fraud are not only lenders, but also the thousands of other homeowners who pay higher interest rates as a result, and the neighborhoods where foreclosures depress property values, invite crime and drain city resources.

Fraud cases are likely to continue rising this year and next, the Mortgage Asset Research Institute says. That's because fraud has become harder to hide in today's slower housing market, when lenders have more time to review applications and appraisals. And because fraudulent loans tend to fall into foreclosure after about three years, many bad loans from the real estate boom have yet to surface.

About 30 miles from where Barber used to live, he sits in a transfer detention center circled by fences topped with razor wire, waiting to be moved out of state. Barber, 42, who did not testify at his trial, spent more than two hours explaining to a reporter how to find victims, steal from homeowners and lenders, and hide the crimes. Then he offered advice on how to avoid being scammed.

"If I wanted to be a stinker, I could tear up any state I walked in," he boasts. "From right here in jail, I could do every one of the things I talked about" with USA TODAY.

You'd better believe him, says Linda Marshall, the assistant U.S. attorney who prosecuted Barber. "Unfortunately, I think that's very realistic, because so much can be done by computer, telephone and fax — things he has access to in prison. And if he didn't, with the help from someone on the outside, he could accomplish it."

Barber's crimes spotlight flaws in the mortgage lending and regulatory systems and show how easy it is to exploit the greed and trust in human nature.

The FBI had Barber on its radar screen for months, but the case was inactive. To investigators, Barber looked small-time because he used "straw" buyers to hide his deals, Marshall explains. He got caught after an angry ex-business-associate walked into an FBI office one day and started singing.

Barber and nine accomplices have been convicted or pleaded guilty, and a few others will soon be indicted, Marshall says. After Barber was convicted by a jury, he pleaded guilty to 104 other counts of money laundering, conspiracy and the interstate transfer of funds obtained by fraud. He was ordered to pay $11 million in restitution.

One of his most effective scams, documents show, looked like this:

Say a real estate investor came to you and told you banks wouldn't let him buy any more property because his credit was maxed out. But if he could buy a property in your name, he'd give you $1,500 to $2,500 for the trouble of signing the documents.

He'd pay all the costs and either find a tenant to cover the mortgage or pay it himself. And after a year, he'd sell the property and share the profits with you. Sound good? If you said yes, you'd be what criminals and the FBI call a straw buyer.

Barber or his accomplices often helped the straw buyers lie on loan applications to qualify for the mortgages, documents show. He also used fraudulently inflated appraisals to buy and sell the properties and pocketed the profit. In other cases, Barber would keep the rent but stop paying the mortgage. Many of these "straws" were stuck with empty, decaying properties and mortgages they couldn't afford.

Lenders suffered losses on 205 of the 283 properties in the case, according to court documents. Marshall says most of the straws lost their properties to foreclosure or signed them over to the lenders to avoid foreclosure, and several filed for bankruptcy protection.

Elderly people make attractive prey, Barber says. They tend to have low bills, high credit scores and all the documentation banks need.

"You say: 'Look you're not really going to owe money. It's going to be my house, or the tenants are going to be making payments. … The rent is $500, and the payment is $300. By signing here, you're going to get the difference," he explains.

One of Barber's straws, Elvin Barton, told the judge, "I'm 70 years old, and because of him I have to start all over. … Mr. Barber gained my trust through manipulation and used my good name and credit to add to his wealth. Mr. Barber never intended to live up to his promises, leaving me with six foreclosed homes. I could not make the payments."

Barber's advice: Verify everything.

If people offer a real estate deal, Barber says, verify where they've lived for the past 10 years. Ask for and speak to their banking references. Check credit scores. Ask to see their tax returns. See if lawsuits have been filed against them.

DOJ_NMG_0121570

After police arrested Barber in August 2004, several witnesses told them Barber had blank real estate deeds in the back of his gold Infiniti Q45 luxury car, Marshall says. Deed fraud is almost impossible to detect before the damage is done.

"The whole system of (real estate) recording is set up assuming the society is sheep and there are no wolves," Barber says.

He sketches a series of scenarios in which he could "steal" your home and borrow against it, and you wouldn't know until his lender tried to foreclose on your house.

Barber could, for example, find an older neighborhood where most residents are retired and their homes paid off. He could forge a homeowner's signature, he says, and deed the house to himself. He could buy a notary's stamp for about $35 at an office supply store, and file the fake deed at the county recorder's office for $21.

Then, with the title to the property in his name, Barber could take out a mortgage against it. "If you could buy one house that way," he says, "you could buy 20 a day."

In fact, no county recorder's office will verify the information on real estate documents, says Mark Monacelli, president of the Property Records Industry Association. The recorder's job is to ensure that documents are filled out properly, signed and notarized.

"The system has always been vulnerable," says Monacelli, who agrees that if anyone wanted to commit such fraud, it's not hard.

Recently, Monacelli's organization formed a group to find ways to help county recorders combat fraud. Los Angeles and Philadelphia now alert property owners by mail when key documents are filed against their property.

Barber's advice: Title companies should have to call lenders to verify paid-off loans. Counties should require that deeds be filed by the buyer, in person, with I.D.

After his arrest, Barber was free on bail until May 2005, when prosecutors found out he and another partner had defrauded a man facing foreclosure on his home. So the judge jailed Barber until the trial.

Nationwide, foreclosures are inching up as people with shaky credit fall behind on payments. Nearly 5% of borrowers are behind on mortgages, and the figure is projected to climb as people with adjustable-rate loans see their payments exceed what they can afford.

This could be the next wave of fraud, Barber says. He says he could approach a homeowner who's falling behind on a mortgage and offer to assume the loan and rent out the house to cover the payments. Barber says he'd leave the loan in the name of the homeowner, who'd still be responsible for it. He could pocket the rent and hide past-due notices from the homeowner.

"It would take three months before the lender is even going to start foreclosing, and even when they start foreclosing, I can hold off that foreclosure for six months to a year. … So if I had one house and the rent is $600 a month, I'd have $7,200 on that house (in a year), and if I got 10 houses, I'd make $72,000," he says.

Barber's advice: Verify that documents are filed. If you're behind on your mortgage, try to rent out your house and move to a cheaper apartment. If you're behind $3,000 in payments, ask the tenants for a deposit of that amount. Put a no-sublease clause in the contract. And verify the tenant's rental history. Sign up for a credit-score alert program that will notify you if there's a change in your credit file, such as an overdue payment.

Barber is sitting on a plastic chair in a 5-by-5-foot "meeting cell" with the real estate section of the local paper. He reads aloud the ads he thinks have potential for fraudulent mortgage applications, such as: "Real estate loans. Residential, commercial, cash-out, refis, all credit types accepted. 100% non-owner-occupied investment loans."

Barber blames lenders for approving loans with little or no proof of a borrower's finances, for making fraud easy to commit. These "stated loans" are also known in the industry as "liar loans." They were designed to help people who were self-employed or working on commissions, with incomes that vary from year to year.

But in high-cost areas like California, where homeowners often must stretch beyond traditional lending ratios to afford a home, about 75% of buyers have turned to loans that require low or no proof of income or assets, up from 34% in 2000, according to First American LoanPerformance.

The mortgage industry knows that loans with little or no documentation speed the approval process, "But they are open invitations to fraudsters," according to a report by the Mortgage Asset Research Institute. "When these loans were introduced, they made sense, given the relatively strict requirements borrowers had to meet before qualifying," says the April 2006 report. "However, competitive pressures have caused many lenders to loosen these requirements to a point that makes many risk managers squirm."

Barber is blunter: "The word 'stated' should be synonymous in the world with 'fraud.' "

Corey Carlisle, a senior director for the Mortgage Bankers Association, concedes there has been a rise in fraudulent stated-income loans but contends that stated-income loans are "a tried-and-true loan documentation type for lenders."

DOJ_NMG_0121571

Barber's advice: Ban stated loans.

"Everything (on a loan application) should be fully documented."

After two hours, Barber is still imagining new scams. His mind seems trained to see and exploit weaknesses in the real estate system. He suggests safeguards to stop fraud; then he thinks of ways around them.

With good behavior, Barber could be out of prison in nine years. And though he admitted his guilt in court, in his interview with USA TODAY he offers no regrets about the people he hurt.

"I guess I had drive to want to earn a little money," he says. He pauses and sighs. "And I think my priorities were out of alignment."

Prosecutors Want DeLay Charge Reinstated (AP)

By Kelley Shannon

AP, January 25, 2007

Prosecutors attempting to restore a conspiracy charge against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay argued Wednesday that the "plain language" of Texas law means he can be charged with conspiring to violate the election code.

But lawyers for DeLay and two co-defendants told the Court of Criminal Appeals the law is clear in their view — that conspiracy was added to the state election code after prosecutors allege the crime happened.

"Historically, there have been limitations on the use of conspiracy laws," said DeLay's attorney, Dick DeGuerin of Houston.

Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle's office is appealing lower court rulings that threw out the charge accusing DeLay and Republican fundraisers Jim Ellis and John Colyandro of conspiring to violate the Texas election code and its ban on corporate campaign contributions.

It could be weeks or months before the appeals court makes a decision.

DeLay and the co-defendants are still charged with money laundering and conspiracy to launder money, but state district Judge Pat Priest has said he doesn't have jurisdiction and can't hold a trial until the appeals court makes its ruling.

DeLay, now out of Congress, wants to get the criminal case behind him, DeGuerin said.

Prosecutors' appeal of the dismissed conspiracy charge allowed them to put off DeLay's trial and hurt him when he was trying to regain his leadership post and during his re-election bid last year, DeGuerin said.

"Being able to drag it out this long has caused the maximum damage to Tom DeLay," he said.

Prosecutors allege that DeLay, Ellis and Colyandro illegally funneled $190,000 in corporate contributions through DeLay's Texans for a Republican Majority political action committee and through an arm of the National Republican Committee to seven GOP state legislative candidates in 2002.

The defendants say they did nothing wrong.

The 3rd Court of Appeals agreed with Priest's ruling, then prosecutors appealed the decision to the Court of Criminal Appeals.

In a brief filed with the court, prosecutors rejected defense lawyers' contention that the state's conspiracy law didn't apply to the Texas Election Code until 2003. They outlined a series of steps in legislative history to back up their argument.

"The plain language ... is clear and unambiguous: the offense of criminal conspiracy applies to all felony offenses defined by Texas law, including the offense of unlawfully making a corporate political contribution," prosecutors wrote.

DeGuerin has disputed that, also saying the law is clear.

"There was no conspiracy to violate the election code on the books at the time that the conduct took place. There's no such crime, in other words," DeGuerin said.

DeLay and his co-defendants were indicted in September and October of 2005. Soon after, DeLay stepped aside as majority leader. He remained a member of Congress, representing his suburban Houston district, and won his Republican primary last March.

After an extended court fight that ultimately prevented the Republican Party from placing a new candidate on the November ballot, DeLay withdrew from the race. A write-in Republican candidate couldn't muster enough voter support, and Democrat Nick Lampson won DeLay's seat.

Closing The Revolving Door (NYT)

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

The United States is paying a heavy price for the mandatory sentencing fad that swept the country 30 years ago. After a tenfold increase in the nation's prison population — and a corrections price tag that exceeds $60 billion a year — the states have often been forced to choose between building new prisons or new schools. Worse still, the country has created a growing felon caste, now more than 16 million strong, of felons and ex-felons, who are often driven back to prison by policies that make it impossible for them to find jobs, housing or education.

Congress could begin to address this problem by passing the Second Chance Act, which would offer support services for people who are leaving prison. But it would take more than one new law to undo 30 years of damage:

¶Researchers have shown that inmates who earn college degrees tend to find jobs and stay out of jail once released. Congress needs to revoke laws that bar inmates from receiving Pell grants and that bar some students with drug convictions from getting other support. Following Washington's lead, the states have destroyed prison education programs that had long since proved their worth.

¶People who leave prison without jobs or places to live are unlikely to stay out of jail. Congress should repeal the lifetime ban on providing temporary welfare benefits to people with felony drug convictions. The federal government should strengthen tax credit and bonding programs that encourage employers to hire people with criminal records. States need to stop barring ex-offenders from jobs because of unrelated crimes — or arrests in the distant past that never led to convictions.

¶Congress should deny a request from the F.B.I. to begin including juvenile arrests that never led to convictions (and offenses like drunkenness or vagrancy) in the millions of rap sheets sent to employers. That would transform single indiscretions into lifetime stigmas.

¶Curbing recidivism will also require doing a lot more to provide help and medication for the one out of every six inmates who suffer mental illness.

The only real way to reduce the inmate population — and the felon class — is to ensure that imprisonment is a method of last resort. That means abandoning the mandatory sentencing laws that have filled prisons to bursting with nonviolent offenders who are doomed to remain trapped at the very margins of society.

CIVIL LAW:

PBS&J Pays More Than $6.4M To Settle Claims (MH)

By Patrick Danner

The Miami Herald, January 25, 2007

AND DAN CHRISTENSEN

The embezzlement by three former employees at engineering firm PBS&J continues to cost the firm: PBS&J paid more than $6.4 million to settle claims it overcharged the federal government on "hundreds of contracts," the Justice Department announced.

The overbilling, the government said, arose from a $36 million embezzlement scheme perpetrated by PBS&J's former chief financial officer and two underlings between 1992 and 2005.

The embezzlement involved shifting funds and fabricating entries in the company's books to cover up the scheme and resulted in PBS&J's audited overhead rates being overstated, the Justice Department said in a statement. Overhead includes items like management salaries, rent, insurance and benefits.

The settlement resolves claims that PBS&J violated the False Claims Act.

The three former PBS&J employees, ex-CFO W. Scott DeLoach, Maria A. Garcia and Rosario Licata, each pleaded guilty in September to their roles in the embezzlement. They are scheduled to be sentenced next month.

Joining the Justice Department in the civil investigation of PBS&J were the Office of the Inspector General for the Department of Transportation and the Defense Contract Audit Agency.

A lawyer for PBS&J and a company spokeswoman couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

PBS&J ranks as one of the largest engineering firms in the country, with 3,900 employees and 2005 revenue of $530 million. The company recently moved its headquarters to Tampa from Miami, where it was founded in 1960.

"Companies that enter into contracts with the government must maintain accounting controls and procedures that ensure that the costs and rates that they submit to the government are accurate," said Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general of the civil division in Washington.

The Justice Department said more than a dozen federal agencies were affected by the fraud, including the Army, Homeland Security and the Department of Interior.

PBS&J, which has had an auditor combing its books, previously disclosed that various state transportation agencies were overcharged as a result of the embezzlement.

The St. Petersburg Times reported on its website this month that PBS&J refunded $11 million to the Florida Department of Transportation.

Claims Against Six Ex-FBI Agents Dropped (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 25, 2007

Case was tied to Bulger handling

It took 22 years for the family of slain Quincy fisherman John McIntyre to prove that the FBI's mishandling of longtime informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi caused his brutal killing in 1984.

But after winning a landmark $3.2 million wrongful death suit against the government in September, lawyers for McIntyre's mother and brother notified a judge yesterday that they are dropping additional claims they had made against six retired FBI agents.

"We proved what we wanted to prove," said McIntyre's brother, Christopher, adding that he and his mother want to get on with their lives and weren't up for another drawn-out legal battle that would once again rehash his brother's murder. "This is starting to take a toll on everyone."

McIntyre and his mother, Emily, 77, of Quincy, had been seeking a jury trial on civil rights claims against the six retired agents, including Bulger's and Flemmi's former handler John J. Connolly Jr., as well as John Morris, Robert Fitzpatrick, James Ring, James Greenleaf, and James Ahearn. Another former agent, Roderick Kennedy, had previously been dismissed from the suit by a judge.

US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay, who had ordered the government to pay the McIntyre's $3.2 million after an 18-day bench trial, had yet to rule on the agents' assertions that federal law barred the McIntyres from seeking damages from them, since they had already won a damages claim against the government.

In his ruling last September, Lindsay found that Connolly warned Bulger and Flemmi that McIntyre was cooperating against them, knowing that the tip would probably lead to McIntyre's slaying. He also found that the FBI failed to properly supervise Connolly and failed to investigate numerous allegations that Bulger and Flemmi had been involved in drug trafficking, homicide, and other crimes.

Connolly was convicted on federal racketeering charges in 2002 for protecting Bulger and Flemmi from prosecution and warning Bulger to flee just before the gangster's 1995 indictment. Connolly is serving a 10-year sentence and is awaiting trial in Miami in a 1982 gangland slaying.

Attorney E. Peter Mullane, who represents Connolly in the civil case, said Connolly didn't warn Bulger and Flemmi that McIntyre was cooperating and that Connolly continues to assert his innocence.

The McIntyres' lawyers, William Christie and Steven M. Gordon , said they believed they could have proven their claims against the agents if the case had gone to trial, but were concerned that the case would take too long to resolve in view of Emily McIntyre's age and poor health.

"We decided it was just best to pursue our judgment against the United States," Christie said.

Fitzpatrick, former special agent in charge of the FBI's Boston office, testified during the McIntyre trial that he had urged his superiors to drop Bulger as an informant in the early 1980s amid allegations that the gangster was involved in drug dealing and homicide. Yesterday, Fitzpatrick said he was angry that he had been named in the suit because "I obviously was one of the only people who tried to do anything" about Bulger.

A spokesman for the Department of Justice declined to comment yesterday on the dismissal of the claims against the agents or on whether the government will appeal Lindsay's $3.2 million verdict.

The McIntyres' suit was the first of 17 filed against the government by families of victims of Bulger and Flemmi to go to trial. Ten were dismissed, mostly on grounds they were filed too late, and six are poised to go to trial.

Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence for 10 murders, testified that he and Bulger killed McIntyre, 32, on Nov. 30, 1984, after Connolly warned them that McIntyre had implicated them in an unsuccessful plot to ship weapons to the Irish Republican Army aboard a Gloucester trawler.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Ex-deputy Arrested In 1964 Race Case (AP)

By Emily Wagster Pettus And Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, January 25, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. — A white former sheriff's deputy who was once thought to be dead was arrested on federal charges Wednesday in one of the last major unsolved crimes of the civil rights era — the 1964 killings of two black men who were beaten and dumped alive into the Mississippi River.

The break in the 43-year-old case was largely the result of the dogged efforts of the older brother of one of the victims, who vowed to bring the killers to justice.

James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klansman from the town of Roxie, was charged with kidnapping hitchhikers Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19.

The victims' weighted, badly decomposed bodies were found by chance two months later in July 1964, during the search for three civil rights workers whose disappearance and deaths in Philadelphia, Miss., got far more attention from the media and the FBI.

Seale is expected to be arraigned Thursday in Jackson.

A second man long suspected in the attack, church deacon and reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, now 72, was not charged.

Sources close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities.

Prosecutors did not say why Seale was not charged with murder.

The arrest marked the latest attempt by prosecutors in the South to close the books on crimes from the civil rights era that went unpunished. In recent years, authorities in Mississippi and Alabama have won convictions in the 1963 assassination of NAACP activist Medgar Evers; the 1963 Birmingham, Ala., church bombing that killed four black girls; and the 1964 Philadelphia, Miss., slayings.

"I've been crying. First time I've cried in about 50 years," Moore's 63-year-old brother, Thomas, said after the arrest. "It's not going to bring his life back. But some way or another, I think he would be satisfied."

Dee's sister, Thelma Collins, told The Associated Press through grateful sobs: "I never thought I would live to see it, no sir, I never did. I always prayed that justice would be done — somehow, some way."

Seale and Edwards are suspected of kidnapping the two victims in a Klan crackdown prompted by rumors that black Muslims were planning an armed "insurrection" in rural Franklin County. Seale and Edwards were arrested at the time.

But, consumed by the search for the three missing civil rights workers, the FBI turned the case over to local authorities. And a justice of the peace promptly threw out all charges against Seale and Edwards.

In 2000, the Justice Department's civil rights unit reopened the case.

For years, Seale's family had told reporters that he had died.

But in 2005, Thomas Moore and a Canadian documentary filmmaker, David Ridgen, found Seale, old and sick, living just a few miles down the road from where the kidnapping took places.

"If they hadn't brought it to my attention, I wouldn't have known to do anything," said U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton, chief federal prosecutor in Jackson.

Thomas Moore said he always carried a burden of guilt over his younger brother's death.

"I walked around with an amount of shame," the Colorado Springs man said. "I didn't know why, why it happened to us, that I wasn't there to do something — to do SOMETHING."

Former Gov. William Winter, who was co-chairman of President Clinton's racial reconciliation initiative, said the latest arrest — though done by federal rather than state authorities — shows that Mississippi "now is obviously seeking to make up for lost time in bringing people to justice."

"Mississippi is taking a look at those crimes that were committed in a different era when a different attitude prevailed," said Winter, who was governor in the 1980s.

On May 2, 1964, Charles Moore and Dee were hitchhiking near an ice cream stand in the town of Meadville when Seale pulled over and offered them a ride, a Klan informant told the FBI. The Klan had heard rumors of black Muslim gunrunning in the area, and Seale believed the two were involved, authorities said.

According to FBI interrogators, Edwards admitted that he and Seale took the two men into the woods for a whipping. But Edwards said both men were alive when he left them.

An informant told the FBI that Seale's brother and another Klansman took the unconscious blacks to the river, lashed their bodies to a Jeep engine block and some old railroad tracks, and dumped them over the side of a boat. The other Klansmen and the informant have since died.

Searchers were combing the woods and swamps for James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner when the remains of Dee and Moore were discovered near Tallulah, La. The bodies of Chaney, Goodman and Schwerner were found in an earthen dam in Mississippi a short time later.

According to FBI documents from the 1960s, authorities confronted Seale and told him they knew he and others killed the hitchhikers, and "the Lord above knows you did it." "Yes," Seale was quoted as replying, "but I'm not going to admit it. You are going to have to prove it." The U.S. Justice Department reopened the case after The Clarion-Ledger of Jackson uncovered documents indicating that the beatings had occurred in the Homochitto National Forest, giving the FBI jurisdiction. But the case languished until Seale was located.

"I had other plans to confront him a long time ago — violently," Thomas Moore said.

Seale lived in Roxie, which was once a thriving farm community in southwest Mississippi. It is now dotted with decaying homes, and the only buildings still in use are a small antique store, a bank and a post office.

Bobby Hunt, 55, a lifelong resident of Roxie and a cousin of one of the slain men, Henry Dee, said people have talked less about the murders over the years, but the victims have not been forgotten.

"Henry was a nice person. He would help people," Hunt said.

He said Seale's arrest made him feel "a little better." "It took all those years but they finally got justice."

Associated Press writer Allen G. Breed in Raleigh, N.C., contributed to this story.

Former Mississippi Lawman Charged In 1964 Slayings Of 2 Black Teens (USAT)

By Jerry Mitchell

USA Today, January 25, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. — Six years ago, reputed Klansman James Seale scoffed at the notion he'd ever be arrested for kidnapping and killing two African-American teenagers in 1964.

He may not be scoffing now, arrested today on federal kidnapping charges in connection with the Ku Klux Klan's May 2, 1964, abduction and slayings of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore.

Asked in 2000 if he had anything to do with crime, Seale replied, "I ain't in jail, am I?"

The arrest of the 71-year-old former cropduster marks the 28th arrest from the civil rights era in the United States over the past two decades.

Since 1998, Moore's brother, Thomas, has been pushing for justice in the case.

Upon learning of the arrest, he choked up. "I'm very emotional," he said. "I don't know what to say."

He said he's grateful and thankful the day finally came. "I'm just glad I had something to do with it," he said. "I just hope Charles and Henry Dee know there is justice on the way."

Dee's sister, Mary Byrd, also welcomed the news. "I feel good now," she said. "Yes, indeed."

Since 1989, Mississippi and six other states have re-examined 29 killings, leading to 22 convictions, most recently in 2005 when a Neshoba County jury convicted Edgar Ray Killen of manslaughter for orchestrating the Klan's killings of three civil rights workers, James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner.

"We are extremely pleased to see that the federal government is truly committed to taking care of its unfinished business from the civil rights era," said Alvin Sykes, a Kansas City activist whose work helped lead to the reinvestigation of the 1955 killing of Emmet Till.

The Till case may be presented to a grand jury later this year.

Sykes is now pushing legislation that would create a cold cases unit within the Justice Department to track down unpunished killers from the civil rights era. "When Congress passes the Till bill, you can best believe there will be a lot more perpetrators from that era who will be facing the bar of justice for the lynchings they thought they got away with many years ago," Sykes said.

The slayings of Dee and Moore are among dozens of killings that plagued this nation during the civil rights movement. The names of 40 martyrs from the movement can be found on the National Civil Rights Memorial in Montgomery, and nearly half of those killings took place in Mississippi.

Seale was arrested once before in connection with the slayings. That came Nov. 6, 1964, when authorities arrested him and Charles Marcus Edwards on murder charges.

At the time, authorities confronted Seale and told him they knew he and others took Dee and Moore "to some remote place and beat them to death," FBI records say. "You then transported and disposed of their bodies by dropping them in the Mississippi River. You didn't even give them a decent burial. We know you did it. You know you did. The Lord above knows you did it."

"Yes," Seale was quoted as replying, "but I'm not going to admit it. You are going to have to prove it."

When authorities arrested Edwards, he "admitted that he and James Seale picked up Dee and another Negro in vicinity of Meadville and took them to an undisclosed wooded area where they were 'whipped,'" a Nov. 6, 1964, FBI document says. "States victims were alive when he departed the wooded area."

According to FBI documents, Dee and Moore were hitchhiking from Meadville when Klansmen coaxed them into their vehicle by pretending to be law enforcement agents. Deep in the woods, Klansmen repeatedly beat the teens, believing they knew something about a rumor regarding gun-running in Franklin County.

Finally, one of the pair claimed the guns were being hidden in a church, hoping to stop the violence.

It didn't.

Klansmen loaded Dee and Moore into the trunk of a car and hauled them across the Mississippi River. There, Klansmen tied them up and weighted them down with a Jeep motor block before dumping them into the Old River two miles south of King, La.

On July 12, 1964, a fisherman found Moore's body and reported it to authorities.

Two months after the arrests, then-District Attorney Lenox Foreman asked to have the murder charges thrown out, saying further investigation was needed.

FBI agents pressed forward, but many were fearful, including potential witnesses. "This informant advised he would not testify under any circumstances because he is concerned for his life and the lives of his family," a Jan. 12, 1965, FBI document reads.

At the time of the killings, Seale and Edwards worked for International Paper Co.

The FBI said the Klan in those days infiltrated unions at that company and others in Natchez. On Feb. 14, 1964, Alfred Whitley, a black employee at Armstrong Tire Co., was abducted and whipped. Two weeks later, Clinton Walker, a black employee at International Paper, was killed on his way home. His car was riddled with bullets.

In 1965, George Metcalfe, an NAACP leader and Armstrong employee was nearly killed when a bomb exploded his car. Two years later, his friend and fellow employee, Wharlest Jackson, died when his truck exploded.

"The Klan ruled then," Thomas Moore recalled. "There were a lot of things that happened back then."

As years passed, the killings of his brother and his friend were forgotten — like so many others from the civil rights era.

In 1998, memories of his brother's killing were rekindled when he read about the dragging death of James Byrd in Texas and decided to write a letter.

Shortly after a judge sentenced Imperial Wizard Sam Bowers to life in prison in 1998 for ordering the 1966 killing of NAACP leader Vernon Dahmer, Thomas Moore wrote District Attorney Ronnie Harper, asking him to look into the case. Harper agreed, but acknowledged he lacked the resources to investigate the matter.

In late 1999, the FBI reopened the 1966 killing of sharecropper Ben Chester White after learning the killing took place on federal property, deep in the Homochitto National Forest. Klansmen killed White in an unsuccessful attempt to lure Martin Luther King Jr. to the Natchez area.

On Jan. 13, 2000, The Clarion-Ledger reported White's killing wasn't the only violence that took place in that forest — so had the beatings of Dee and Moore.

After FBI agents reported they had destroyed their files in the case, The Clarion-Ledger found they weren't destroyed and got copies.

The Clarion-Ledger also tracked down and interviewed Seale, who blamed the newspaper for talk of reprosecution. "You don't have anything better to do but to stir this stuff up," he said.

The FBI reopened the case, only to stall when they believed the FBI's key informant in the case, Ernest Gilbert, was dead.

The Social Security Death Index showed a man of the same name had died in Mississippi in 1999, but the real Gilbert was still alive and living in Clinton, La.

In spring 2000, ABC News producer Harry Phillips tracked him down and got the former Klansman to share his story of a friend's confession to the crime. The FBI then interviewed Gilbert.

Gilbert told The Clarion-Ledger how Seale's brother, Jack, came to him and confessed his involvement in Dee and Moore's killings. "I couldn't live with it," Gilbert said. "I wish I never had been in the Klan. It messed my life up."

But by the end of 2000, authorities let the case grow cold. They still had questions regarding federal jurisdiction and were busy preparing to prosecute Ernest Avants for White's killing.

Federal authorities didn't get interested again in the Dee-Moore killings until July 13, 2005 — a few weeks after jurors convicted Killen in the killings of Chaney, Goodman and Schwerner.

That's when Thomas Moore met with U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton of Jackson, convincing him to have his office take a second look at the case.

Lampton has taken a personal interest in the case, sometimes accompanying FBI agents in their interviews.

No charges are expected against Edwards, who has been interviewed by the FBI and may be a witness against Seale.

Mississippi native Myrlie Evers-Williams, chairman emeritus of the national NAACP, still shudders when she recalls the dark days when the Klan reigned in Mississippi.

"It was fear at its worst. You could easily link it to what took place in Nazi Germany," recalled Evers-Williams, whose husband was assassinated by a Klansman in 1963. "It was being afraid to sit in your living room on a sofa because there was a window."

Mississippi Man Arrested In Killing Of 2 Blacks In '64 (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

ATLANTA, Jan. 24 — A 71-year-old man was arrested Wednesday in Mississippi on federal kidnapping charges stemming from the 1964 killing of two black teenagers who were tied to trees, whipped and drowned.

The suspect, James F. Seale, a former crop-duster, was indicted in Jackson and taken into custody in the southwestern Mississippi town of Roxie, not far from where the two young men were seized.

The charges against Mr. Seale, some seven years after the Federal Bureau of Investigation reopened the case, are the latest in a string of prosecutions of racially motivated slayings from the 1950s and '60s. While virtually all the prosecutions so far have proved successful, investigators have long warned that every passing year makes it more difficult to build a case.

Many of those killings became nationally infamous, like the murder of three civil rights workers — James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner — portrayed decades later in the movie "Mississippi Burning." But like dozens of lynchings in that era, the deaths of the two victims in this case, Henry H. Dee and Charles E. Moore, both 19, were far more obscure.

The discovery of their bodies, in the Old River near Natchez, Miss., attracted attention mainly because it was initially thought that they might be those of two of the three missing rights workers, who, as the nation looked on, were being sought by federal agents, dozens of volunteers and 400 Navy sailors.

Still, the F.B.I. took on the Dee-Moore case, and in November 1964 Mr. Seale, the son of a chapter leader of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, and another man, Charles M. Edwards, were arrested. Local authorities never prosecuted them, however, even though Mr. Edwards, according to the case file, had told federal agents that he, Mr. Seale and others had beaten Mr. Dee and Mr. Moore, who, Mr. Edwards said, were alive when he left them.

Mr. Dee was a sawmill worker; Mr. Moore had recently been expelled from college after participating in a student demonstration. According to a variety of accounts pieced together from F.B.I. files, the Klan mistakenly believed that they were Black Muslims involved in plotting an armed uprising.

That season had been dubbed Freedom Summer by civil rights volunteers hoping to get blacks onto the voter rolls, but in and around Natchez it was a time of terror spread by the Klan. When Klan members saw Mr. Dee and Mr. Moore hitchhiking in early May, they returned with reinforcements and ordered them into a car.

The two were taken deep into the Homochitto National Forest, where they were secured to trees and beaten. They were then driven across the nearby state line to Louisiana, where they were tied to an engine block and thrown into the river with tape covering their mouths.

Mr. Edwards is still living, although The Clarion-Ledger of Jackson reported Wednesday that he was not expected to be arrested and was a potential witness in the case against Mr. Seale. James Newman, the sheriff of Franklin County, which includes Roxie, said Mr. Seale was in poor health and used a cane to walk.

Mr. Edwards is described in the documents from the time as an admitted Klansman. In an interview in 2000 with Jerry Mitchell of The Clarion-Ledger, who has written extensively about the case, Mr. Seale denied being a Klansman or knowing any members, although his family's involvement in the Klan is well documented.

The F.B.I. reopened the case in 2000 after investigative files that had been thought lost were recovered, and after Mr. Mitchell reported that the killings had most likely occurred on federal land, giving federal prosecutors jurisdiction in what was seen as a case potentially involving murder charges. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department declined Wednesday to explain the decision to charge Mr. Seale with kidnapping, and a spokeswoman for the United States attorney in Jackson did not return phone calls.

In 2002, Mr. Seale's son began telling newspaper reporters that his father was dead. But Thomas Moore, the elder brother of Charles Moore, returned to the area with a documentary filmmaker on a trip in 2004, and a local resident directed him to the mobile home where Mr. Seale lived. Mr. Seale ran inside and shut the door.

State, Federal Law Enforcement To Monitor Police-involved Shootings In DeKalb County (AP)

By Errin Haines, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2007

TUCKER, Ga. - Newly appointed DeKalb County Police Chief Terrell Bolton said Wednesday that reducing the number of police-involved shootings is his top priority, and said federal and state authorities will now be called to the scene to monitor those incidents.

Bolton made the announcement flanked by officials from the GBI, FBI and DEA, as well as DeKalb CEO Vernon Jones and district attorney Gwen Keyes-Fleming.

DOJ_NMG_0121578

"Today is a major step for the DeKalb County Police Department," Bolton said. "In our approach to deadly force, my prayer is that it will never be the same."

Bolton, who was hired last month, said his department has nothing to hide, and that the new initiative is meant to encourage transparency and make citizens feel more comfortable.

GBI and DEA agents will respond to police-involved shootings as they happen, working as monitors and reporting inappropriate behavior to DeKalb superior officers.

"If they see something we are doing that is out of order, it will be brought to our attention," Bolton told reporters at a press conference. "Our desire is to have as many eyes and ears as possible."

The FBI will not be involved in investigations, but has offered additional training along with the other two agencies.

The chief plans to meet with the other agencies to further discuss how the partnerships will work.

Last year, DeKalb County officers were involved in 12 deadly police shootings, which those attending the press conference declined to discuss Wednesday. The shootings have drawn federal and local investigations, and the increase in shootings led to an independent review of police training and use-of-force procedures by a consulting firm that found some deficiencies.

Jones said at the time the report was released that there were no widespread problems at the department.

The district attorney's office is reviewing the shootings and the Justice Department is "gathering information" about the shootings, according to a Dec. 12 letter from a Justice official to a community activist.

DeKalb Police Shootings To Be Monitored (AJC)

By David Simpson, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 25, 2007

Monitors from state and federal law enforcement agencies will go to the scene of all future shootings of suspects by DeKalb County officers, Police Chief Terrell Bolton announced Wednesday, responding to a spate of fatal police shootings that have spurred a grand jury investigation.

DeKalb apparently will be the first major metro Atlanta police department to bring state and federal officials to shooting scenes to observe the police investigation.

"Today, the DeKalb County Police Department is saying we have nothing to hide," Bolton said at a news conference, flanked by District Attorney Gwen Keyes Fleming and representatives of the Georgia Bureau of Investigation, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the FBI.

Bolton, in his second week on the job, said he asked the other agencies to help him address concerns raised last year, when DeKalb police shot to death 12 suspects, more than any other department in metro Atlanta. One officer also was killed.

Bolton said the GBI and DEA agreed to his request to supply investigators who will be trained in DeKalb procedures so that they can go to shooting scenes.

FBI offers training

The monitors from the other agencies will not write reports but will immediately alert the police commander on the scene if they see anything "out of order," Bolton said. He said he was confident those agencies would not allow any problems to go unreported, and he promised he would alert the district attorney "or even the FBI" if he had evidence of wrongdoing.

The FBI cannot send a monitor to cooperate with DeKalb police because it could later be called upon to investigate the same incident, Bolton said. But he said the FBI has offered training help to DeKalb police.

Representatives of the DeKalb district attorney's office already go to shooting scenes and review police shooting cases. But The Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported last week that records of many of those investigations are missing, and the surviving records show the DA's office often relied on police reports rather than on independent fact-finding.

A special grand jury is expected to review last year's 12 fatal shootings by DeKalb police. Bolton declined to comment on the cases Wednesday.

Officials in Fulton, Cobb and Gwinnett counties said Wednesday they have not called state or federal officials to the scene of shootings by their county police force. No information was available from Atlanta police.

Change of perceptions

Gwinnett District Attorney Danny Porter said the outside monitors may provide more public assurance than investigative help.

"I don't see what these monitors will accomplish if they are not able to control the investigations of these shootings," Porter said.

"Now I've never said that I felt that DeKalb had a problem with how they investigated their police shootings in the past, because I don't. But they may think this will help change the way the public perceives their investigations."

Porter and Cobb District Attorney Pat Head, who presents all police shooting cases to a grand jury, were surprised that drug agents would participate in shooting investigations.

So was Geoffrey Alpert, a criminology professor at the University of South Carolina who has studied police use of force.

"I think generally inviting other agencies to be part of an evaluation is very, very important. I think it shows some transparency, I think it shows some willingness to do it appropriately," Alpert said.

However, he added, "You want someone who has credentials, who has experience, who has enormous knowledge of police shootings."

Alpert said it is important for outside reviewers to look beyond the question of whether an officer committed a crime and to consider whether officers violated policies — violations that might have contributed to the shooting.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported in November that a review of police shootings from 2001 through 2005 showed an internal review board repeatedly found that officers violated certain key policies, such as forcing confrontations without adequate backup. Most of the officers involved received little or no discipline, and the department did not address the patterns in its training programs.

Keyes Fleming, DeKalb's district attorney, and her two predecessors have said the district attorney has no mandate to look for policy violations. But the special grand jury expected to convene soon could consider whether to recommend additional oversight of police shootings, Keyes Fleming has said.

'Supportive' of officers

Around the country, some police departments are overseen by civilian review boards, some with full-time investigators. Other departments have full-time professional monitors who report to elected officials.

On Wednesday, Keyes Fleming said through a spokeswoman, "I think Chief Bolton's multijurisdictional approach is a good step for DeKalb County and its citizens. We look forward to continuing to work with the Police Department and these other government entities."

Iffat Muhammad, who has helped organize protests since her brother, Abraheem, was shot to death by an officer in August 2006, offered cautious approval of the new policy.

"It sounds good. It sounds like a step in the right direction. But honestly, I don't know," she said.

Muhammad's brother, Abraheem, was killed by a DeKalb police officer in August. Her brother was shot by an officer checking on a trespassing complaint. He attacked the officer and tried to get her gun, police said.

Muhammad said she was disappointed that Bolton did not meet with families or community organizations before announcing his move.

At the news conference, the chief urged the department's critics to judge police on their future actions rather than being "shackled" by the past.

Bolton also assured officers "that we're going to be supportive" and praised county CEO Vernon Jones for his past statements defending police use of force.

"It takes a special leader to stand up for the men and women of the department," he said.

Jones, who attended the news conference, said, "I'm excited about our new beginning here in DeKalb County for this Police Department."

Jones said he earlier visited a new class of police cadets and learned they will receive extra training in "de-escalation" techniques to try to avoid violent confrontations.

Cleveland Officer Investigated On Claim He Beat Suspect (CLPD)

By Mark Puente, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, January 25, 2007

Drug suspect suffered cuts, bruises

A Cleveland police officer is under investigation over allegations he beat a suspected drug dealer to find out where he hid a package of cocaine.

Narcotics Detective Jamal Ansari, a 22-year-veteran, is accused of dragging Damon Alexander, while handcuffed, around his Shaker Heights home last April until Alexander told him where he hid the cocaine.

Ansari is being investigated by the Cleveland police Internal Affairs unit, the U.S. Justice Department and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

Alexander testified in a federal court hearing in November that Ansari repeatedly punched him in the face, kicked him in the chest and slammed his head into walls with enough force to break drywall, federal court records say. Alexander suffered cuts and bruises on his chest, and doctors gave him an electrocardiogram, according to court records.

Ansari testified that he hit Alexander 15 to 25 times to gain control of him even though he was handcuffed. But U.S. District Judge James Gwin did not believe Ansari.

"This testimony is not credible," Gwin wrote in a ruling last month.

Gwin also ruled Ansari violated Alexander's constitutional rights by continuing to question Alexander after his request for a lawyer.

Cleveland police Lt. Thomas Stacho said the city began an investigation last month after learning of Gwin's ruling. The judge's decision is disturbing, he said.

"It's one of the focuses of our investigation," he said. "We take these allegations seriously."

Ansari did not report using force against any suspect between 2003 and Sept. 9, 2006, according to two Cleveland Police Department databases obtained by The Plain Dealer last fall.

A Cleveland police policy requires officers to report any use of force regardless of where it occurred, Stacho said. No investigation by Ansari's supervisor could be found for the incident, he said.

Alexander filed a complaint with the U.S. Justice Department and has passed a polygraph test, court records show. He pleaded guilty in December to intent to distribute cocaine and a weapons charge. He is waiting to be sentenced.

A DEA task force went to Alexander's home after a K-9 officer found a suspicious envelope at an air-mail center containing 5.5 pounds of cocaine, records show.

The Postal Service delivered the package to Alexander's house on April 6. The task force was assisted by postal inspectors and Shaker Heights detectives, who went inside the home after a beeper signaled the package had been opened.

Alexander hid the package in a basement ceiling, but officers could not find it, records said.

Edward Bryan, an assistant federal public defender, said Ansari should be punished for his actions. "It was thuggery at its worst," he said. "They cannot break the law to enforce the law."

Special Agent John Ferster, head of the Cleveland DEA office, declined to comment.

Female Former Agent Testifies In Case Against FBI (MINNST)

By Dan Browning, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 25, 2007

Jane Turner said she had never had an unsatisfactory job review before she filed her harassment complaint.

Ex-FBI agent Jane Turner spent more than five years fighting to get her case against her former employer into federal court, and on Wednesday she told a jury in Minneapolis about what she said was a plot to wreck her career as retribution for a sexual discrimination complaint she filed against her boss in 1998.

But the government described a far different end to a storied career that included investigating child-sex crimes and violent crimes on North Dakota Indian reservations.

By 1999, "she was seriously burned out," Martha Fagg, an assistant U.S. attorney from Iowa, told jurors Wednesday in her opening statement. "She just stopped working."

FBI supervisors didn't try to sideline Turner, Fagg said. To salvage her career, she said, they transferred her from an outpost in Minot, N.D., to Minneapolis, where they tried to help her get back on track.

Fagg said Turner, 55, of St. Paul, has literally made a federal case out of the fact that she was rated "superior" rather than "outstanding" in a routine review of her work.

However Turner, who joined the FBI in 1978, testified in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis that she had never had an unsatisfactory job review until after she filed a sexual harassment complaint against her supervisor, Senior Supervisory Agent Craig Welkin.

That's when Welkin stopped giving her full credit for the job she was doing, Turner said. She said she put up with the slights because she had so many "statistics," or favorable performance points, in her files.

Among her trophies was a personal letter from then-U.S. Attorney General William French Smith for her help in apprehending Christopher Boyce, a Soviet spy made famous in the movie "The Falcon and the Snowman."

However, in the summer of 1998, Welkin tried to block her from working on a case involving an infamous child pornographer who came to be known nationally as "The Internet Killer." Turner testified that the U.S. attorney in North Dakota at the time, John Schneider, tipped her off to Welkin's interference. Welkin only relented and assigned her to the case after Schneider wrote to him, she said.

Turner quickly developed a rapport with the family of the suspect, Larry Froistad, and eventually developed evidence that persuaded him to confess to molesting and killing his 5-year-old daughter, Amanda.

Schneider thanked her in an October 1998 e-mail. "Quite simply, that case and plea was your product," he said.

But Turner said that Welkin did not give her full credit for the case in her annual review, a detail that might hamper her efforts to get promotions or raises. She said he accused her of "poaching cases" and complained that she "sandbagged" him by getting Schneider to ask for her in the Froistad case.

Turner denied doing so, and reported Welkin's comments to his boss in Minneapolis. The FBI launched a formal re-evaluation of Turner's job performance.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Clare Hochhalter testified that he never saw Turner "stop working," as Fagg alleged in her opening remarks. He said Turner pushed hard on cases.

Hochhalter offered strong praise for Turner's investigative and interrogation skills. "I learned from her," he said.

But the formal FBI review in June 1999 found her work "minimally acceptable" in 1999, and she was ordered to transfer to a desk job in Minneapolis in December of that year. She reported to Minneapolis in May 2000 and filed suit Aug. 3, 2001.

Turner later sparked furor in the FBI when she accused a colleague of stealing artifacts from the ruins of the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11 attacks. She retired in the fall of 2003 in the face of possible termination proceedings, allegedly for hurting the bureau's image.

Port Chester Attacks Federal Lawsuit On Election System (NYJN)

By Liz Sadler, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, January 25, 2007

PORT CHESTER - The village filed court papers yesterday that pick apart the federal lawsuit that accuses its election system of illegally suppressing the Hispanic vote.

In the papers, the village asked U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson to deny the government's request to block the March 20 election for two seats on the Board of Trustees.

"There will be irreparable harm if the election does not go forward," the papers say. The village contends that the move could disenfranchise voters in the March mayoral election and that "government may come to an effective standstill due to the expiring terms of current members."

The papers were filed in response to a lawsuit filed by the Justice Department in December claiming that the village's "at-large" method of electing its six trustees violates the federal Voting Rights Act.

Though nearly half of the village's 28,000 residents and 22 percent of its eligible voters are Hispanic, no Hispanic has ever been elected to village office.

The Justice Department is asking the judge to replace Port Chester's at-large system with one in which trustees are elected from six districts.

It has presented a proposal for voting districts, including a majority Hispanic ward.

But the village is questioning the validity of the proposed Hispanic district because the estimated number of Hispanic residents is only eight higher than the number of non-Hispanic residents, fewer than the margin of error, it claims.

In the court papers, the village also argues that there is no past or present discrimination in Port Chester and that Hispanic voters are free to participate in the political process.

The percentage of Hispanic voters who participate in village elections is less than half the percentage of non-Hispanic voters, and the number of votes deciding a typical race is small, the papers say.

The village's response includes 21 statements from longtime village residents, officials and business owners, including people of Dominican, Cuban and Uruguayan descent.

"These individuals have not experienced a history of discrimination in Port Chester," according to the response. "In fact, their experience has been just the opposite."

Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, took his criticism of the lawsuit a step further yesterday in a press release, accusing the Justice Department of fact-twisting and sneaky behavior in an effort to "desperately bolster their bad case."

Piscionere said he had deposed two Justice Department witnesses since the lawsuit was filed and was to interview a third today.

"Before the Department of Justice brought this lawsuit, we told the federal government that their data was bad," Piscionere said. "Now, only after preliminary depositions of the government's experts, do we absolutely confirm the profound weakness of their case."

Yusil Scribner, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, declined to comment on the response, saying it is the department's policy not to speak about pending cases.

Mayor Gerald Logan assailed the lawsuit, saying the federal government does not understand the village election process or the significance of Port Chester's 139-year-old charter.

DOJ_NMG_0121582

"Port Chester is a model of inclusion and diversity," he said in a statement. "The lack of evidence in this case is astounding."

Court dates are scheduled for Feb. 12-15.

NAACP Presses U.S. On Heart Drug (WSJ)

By Keith J. Winstein

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

An NAACP official condemned Medicare for declining to promote insurance coverage of a cardiac medication for African-Americans, in a letter that blamed government policy for disparity in the treatment of blacks with heart failure.

The sharply worded letter, addressed to the Boston regional office of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, or CMS, detailed tension between the local arm of the civil-rights organization and the agency over BiDil, the only drug approved for use by a single race. The NAACP has received a $1.5 million grant from the drug's maker, NitroMed Inc., to improve health care for blacks.

BiDil has been shown to reduce deaths in blacks with congestive heart failure by about 40% a year, but NitroMed says it is used by only about 2% of the 750,000 African-Americans who have the condition.

Many groups, including the American Heart Association and the American College of Cardiology, say there is no evidence that the medication, which costs insurers roughly $1,400 to $2,800 a year to offer to a customer, works any better than its two generic parts -- isosorbide dinitrate and hydralazine -- taken separately. CMS requires insurers offering Medicare Part D plans to cover either BiDil or the generics. Some insurers have been slow to cover BiDil, since the two generic ingredients can cost less than $100 a year. Usage of the generics has also been scant.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People wants CMS to require all of the privately run Medicare Part D plans for the elderly to cover BiDil. The separate generics are no substitute, the letter argues, since a patient would have to take many more pills and even split some pills in half to get the correct dose.

Medicare's stance "is so contrary to evidence-based medicine and so extraordinary that it arouses suspicions of institutional racism," said the letter, from Juan M. Cofield, president of the NAACP's New England council. If BiDil "were not a medication for blacks, their response might be different," Mr. Cofield added in an interview. Until a clinical trial shows that generics work as well as BiDil, the letter argues that Medicare should require all of the Part D drug plans to cover the drug.

Jeffrey Kelman, a senior doctor at CMS in Washington, said NitroMed would have to continue to plead its case with the individual Part D plans. "We've been working with minority groups for two years about this and similar issues," he said, and there's no evidence that BiDil works any better than its separate, much cheaper, ingredients.

NitroMed has been trying to get insurers to put BiDil on their "preferred brand" tiers, which generally require a monthly co-pay of $25 to $30. Even without a requirement from the government, many Medicare Part D insurers cover BiDil, including some plans from AARP, Humana Inc., UnitedHealth Group Inc., Aetna Inc., and the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association.

NitroMed says that with some recent additions of coverage, 57% of elderly African-Americans with health insurance now have coverage for BiDil, up from 20% six months ago. The company, which has no other products, has been struggling because of BiDil's disappointing sales.

ANTITRUST:

Delta Supporters Pack Senate Hearing In DC Grinstein, Parker Both Testify On US Airways Takeover Bid (AJC)

By Marilyn Geewax

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 25, 2007

Washington-Appearing At a Packed hearing before the Senate Commerce Commitee Wednesday, Delta AirLines CEO Gerald Grinstein said both workers and consumers will suffer if US Airways' takeover bid for Delta succeeds.

"Delta does not need to be acquired to be saved," Grinstein declared in an overstuffed hearing room ringed by Delta pilots, standing ramrod straight in their black uniforms.

"The US Airways deal would reverse the hard work and remarkable progress Delta people have made restructuring our airline," Grinstein said. "Delta is poised to emerge from bankruptcy this spring as a strong, fiercely competitive, standalone airline."

DOJ_NMG_0121583

Hundreds of Delta employees and supporters lined up outside the hearing, filling a stairwell for two long flights and spilling into basement corridors in the Senate Russell Office Building.

The takeover "must be rejected and opposed because it is blatantly anti-competitive," Grinstein said.

Sen. Johnny Isakson, R-Ga., introduced Grinstein, whom he said has done "great things" for Delta.

Andrew Steinberg, assistant secretary for the the Transportation Department, said he could not comment on any particular proposed takeover, but felt that in general, consolidation is the "natural consequence of a deregulated industry." When weighing whether to approved a merger, "we have to keep an open mind," he said.

US Airways CEO Douglas Parker urged the government to "let the market work" so that airlines can become more profitable and avoid the need for government bailouts.

Parker, who led America West Airlines' 2005 merger with US Airways, argued that the merger would lead to lower prices for consumers because the company would be in a better position to compete with low-cost carriers such as Jet Blue Airways and Southwest Airlines. The growth of those competitors he said, shows the "tendency of the marketplace to respond."

"New carriers can come in and lower prices," Parker said.

Both airline executives said the industry has made important strides toward rebounding from the financial troubles that they incurred as result of the 2001 terrorist attacks and soaring fuel prices.

The prospect of a US Airways-Delta merger has sparked talk of other possible link-ups among big airlines — and concerns among labor and consumer groups about the fallout. That prompted the Senate hearing.

Several senators said their constituents are concerned that a merger would result in cutbacks to service in small communities, where the per-unit costs of running an airline tend to be more expensive than in big cities with lots of passenger traffic.

"You're an aggressive suitor, but the lady from the South doesn't want to be forced into this shotgun wedding," said Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss, a reference to Delta's Atlanta headquarters.

The hearing occurred amid indications the US Airways bid for Delta may be faltering on its own.

In an interview Tuesday, Parker said US Airways' recently sweetened bid for Delta has generated little response from the Atlanta carrier's bankruptcy creditors, and that time is running out on the offer.

"We have not had any give-and-take negotiations (with the creditors), which you might expect," said Parker, who on Jan. 10 raised the bid nearly 20 percent to about $10.3 billion.

Parker said he still hopes the deal will get done, joining the two carriers under the Delta banner.

But he sounded less optimistic than in the past. "If the creditors don't want to do it, that's their perogative," Parker said by phone from Washington.

US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., has set a Feb. 1 deadline for Delta's official creditors committee to tell management to take initial steps toward a deal.

Its offer is "absolutely, positively retracted" if the creditors don't do so, said Parker. "If they choose to do that, they should know that we're not coming back," he said.

Delta's creditors continue to study the competing plans and have given themselves until Jan. 31 to decide whether to agree to US Airways' conditions, a person familiar with Delta's bankruptcy reorganization told The Atlanta Journal-Constitution.

That person said creditors are considering various aspects of Delta's standalone reorganization plan, such as compensation for Delta's management. They're also weighing the risks of a delay in Delta's Chapter 11 exit that might result while federal regulators consider the deal, and the risk that regulators might not approve it at all.

Delta spokeswoman Gina Laughlin declined to comment on creditors' deliberations.

Meanwhile, Grinstein, in a question-and-answer session with an employee group, said Delta has sought financial information from Northwest Airlines at the request of the creditors. But he added the move was "a far cry from negotiating a merger with them."

Reports earlier this month suggested Delta and Minnesota-based Northwest, which is also in Chapter 11, were feeling each other out about a merger after both leave court.

Grinstein characterized the Northwest overture as intelligence-gathering to update "potential responses to our industry's changing marketplace." He said he felt it was important to "debunk the Northwest rumor."

Grinstein said he is "not anti-merger" — noting that Delta itself has had four — but considers the US Airways proposal "the worst kind of deal" because it joins carriers with largely overlapping routes.

While the creditors' decision on the US Airways bid is largely financial, the airline, employee groups and political allies have waged a high-profile public effort to defeat it. Part of their aim is to show that a merger would be both unpopular with consumers and workers, as well as unlikely to survive regulatory review at the Department of Justice.

Senators Worry Airline Deals Hurt Competition, Consumers (WSJ)

By Melanie Trottman And Corey Dade

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Members of a Senate committee expressed strong skepticism that sweeping consolidation in the U.S. airline industry would be good for consumers and were particularly unenthused about US Airways Group Inc.'s $9.8 billion hostile bid for Delta Air Lines Inc.

A three-hour hearing was punctuated by testiness as US Airways Chairman and Chief Executive Doug Parker defended the Tempe, Ariz., carrier's takeover offer, which was condemned by Gerald Grinstein, Delta's CEO, who insisted that the Atlanta airline would be best to emerge from bankruptcy on its own later this year.

Despite a grilling from lawmakers on the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation, the hearing was somewhat anticlimactic because in recent days the official committee of Delta creditors appears to have been shying away from the US Airways bid, according to people familiar with the situation.

One of the biggest concerns by committee members is that a merger could force Delta to remain in bankruptcy while a deal is ironed out and that resistance by Delta executives could derail the process.

Separately, a group of Delta bondholders yesterday urged that negotiations begin on the US Airways bid. The ad hoc committee of unsecured creditors, an informal group formed in November largely in support of the proposed deal, believes opening talks with US Airways could yield a more lucrative offer and thus fatten the payout to all Delta creditors.

Meanwhile, talks about a possible merger between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. have been put on hold, further deflating speculation that a frenzy of deal-making among U.S. airlines is imminent.

While Congress can't block proposed mergers, yesterday's hearing made it clear that even the prospect of consolidation faces resistance from many lawmakers, especially those worried that mergers would reduce or even eliminate air service to smaller communities.

"I am not a fan of mergers," said North Dakota Democratic Sen. Byron Dorgan. "Inevitably what's going to happen is the other network carriers are going to decide they're going to merge. I think it gives consumers fewer choices, less competition."

Other concerns included the possibility of higher fares and additional impact on airline employees who have suffered steep pay cuts, layoffs and the loss of pension benefits during the industry's latest downturn.

Mr. Parker reiterated his assurance that a takeover of Delta wouldn't result in job cuts of any front-line, or nonmanagement, employees, though he acknowledged the combined work forces would be reduced through attrition.

"You're making a big leap here," said Sen. Trent Lott, a Republican from Mississippi, who complimented Mr. Parker on the merger he engineered two years ago between America West Airlines and US Airways. "I'm not opposed to the [Delta] merger. It does bother me when it's a hostile effort," he said. Another lawmaker recalled that AMR Corp.'s American Airlines pledged to take care of TWA workers when American acquired assets of the carrier in 2001, then eventually left most of them jobless.

The packed hearing room included dozens of uniformed Delta pilots, who stood against the walls wearing "Keep Delta My Delta" buttons.

Mr. Grinstein said Delta was financially strong enough to maintain its independence after exiting bankruptcy, and he disputed Mr. Parker's stance that acquiring Delta would lead to lower fares while maintaining adequate service levels.

Air Merger Faces Flak From Senate Panel (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — Skeptical members of the Senate Commerce Committee questioned Wednesday whether US Airways' hostile takeover of Delta Air Lines would cut service to small cities.

Congress has no official role in the pending takeover bid, but lawmakers can wield considerable influence and possibly decide to change laws dealing with airline mergers.

At issue was US Airways' $10.2 billion hostile bid for Atlanta-based Delta, which has been in Chapter 11 bankruptcy for 16 months. Such a large merger, which would create the nation's largest airline, would have to be reviewed by antitrust regulators at the Justice Department.

From the start, the tone of the hearing was critical. Many of the committee members hail from largely rural states — Alaska, Minnesota, Maine, West Virginia, North Dakota — and worried aloud that consolidation would reduce service to cities in their states.

DOJ_NMG_0121585

About 50 uniformed members of Delta's pilots union, which opposes the deal, lined the standing-room-only chamber wearing "Keep Delta My Delta" lapel buttons.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., echoed colleagues when he questioned whether the merger might result in less air service to small cities now served by Delta or US Airways.

US Airways CEO Doug Parker, the only witness to support the deal, said it would strengthen both carriers. He testified that strong network airlines "are the best hope for small communities" because discounters such as Southwest Airlines generally don't serve those airports.

He said US Airways — itself the product of the 2005 merger between America West and the old US Airways — is now the most profitable network carrier, a category that also includes American, United, Delta, Continental and Northwest.

"That merger has been a tremendous success," he said.

Delta CEO Jerry Grinstein, who is fighting the takeover of his company, predicted a Delta-US Airways merger would bring sharp service cutbacks where the two carriers overlap along the East Coast.

Responding to concerns raised by Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., Grinstein said it would usher in more mergers among the rest of the USA's six network airlines. They'd have to merge to compete, he said.

"If you approve this," Grinstein said, "the industry will devolve into three carriers."

Union leader Robert Roach Jr., representing the International Association of Machinists, criticized US Airways for trying to buy another airline before it has negotiated new labor contracts covering mechanics from the old US Airways and America West.

"You have to finish transaction No. 1 before starting transaction No. 2," he said.

Delta says it's prepared to exit bankruptcy this spring as an independent carrier worth between $9.4 billion and $12 billion. Delta's bankruptcy creditors' committee met in New York on Wednesday, but it still had no official response to US Airways' 2-month-old offer. The creditors must decide whether to back Delta's stand-alone plan, accept US Airways' offer or ask US Airways for more.

Parker has said he will withdraw the offer Feb. 1 unless the creditors signal their support and press Delta to open its books.

US Airways Defends Its Plan To Buy Delta (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

With a critical deadline looming in his hostile takeover bid for Delta Air Lines, the chief executive of US Airways faced tough questions yesterday from senators worried that a combined carrier would reduce service to rural areas and increase fares.

The concerns emerged during a lengthy Senate hearing on the proposed merger of Delta and US Airways, and the potential impact of future airline consolidation. The hearing also put the chief executives of the two airlines, who have been slugging it out in news releases, within arm's length of each other in public for the first time since the merger bid was announced in November.

Democratic and Republican senators expressed fears that a merger would force other carriers to combine. Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), chairman of the Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation's subcommittee on aviation, said such consolidation could harm small towns and other "end-of-the-food chain markets and their prices and their service."

US Airways chief executive W. Douglas Parker repeatedly defended his bid for Atlanta-based Delta, which is operating under Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, by saying that a combined carrier would provide better service to rural areas.

"In general, I would say that healthy network carriers that earn adequate profits are actually good for smaller communities and good for consumers because they can afford the breadth and scope of service that we want to deliver," Parker said.

Two weeks ago, Parker increased his bid for Delta by 20 percent to a total of $9.8 billion in stock and cash. He has set a Feb. 1 deadline for Delta's creditors to accept his offer.

Despite Parker's assurances on preserving service to small communities, senators from Maine to Mississippi expressed skepticism.

"The inevitable will happen, which is to say that we're going to, you know, lose service and also, I think, [the outcome will] result in higher prices," said Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine).

Sens. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) and Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said they did not think the merger would help their residents and were not pleased by the hostile nature of the bid.

"It's one network carrier saying 'I'm going to take over the other network carrier,' " Dorgan said. "I'm not a big fan of that because inevitably what is going to happen is the other network carriers are going to decide we've got to merge. . . . I don't think that gives consumers more choices. I think that gives them fewer choices."

Lott added: "Now, I must say you are an aggressive suitor. But the lady from the South -- Atlanta -- doesn't seem to want to be forced into this shotgun wedding."

DOJ_NMG_0121586

Grinstein agreed with the senators that service to rural areas could be lost. He also questioned the viability of a combined company because it would have about $24 billion of debt.

"If you believe that with the kind of debt that this is going to have, that you're not going to reduce your hubs, you're not going to reduce frequencies, you're not going to consolidate flights and reduce planes, you believe in Tinker Bell," Grinstein said.

Grinstein also denied media reports that Delta and Northwest have been negotiating a possible merger. "Let me be very clear about that: We are not negotiating any such deal with Northwest," Grinstein testified.

Some of the senators also pressed the executives on whether they thought it would be a good idea to re-regulate the industry to promote service to small towns and rural areas. Grinstein and Parker said they would work with the Transportation Department and Senate staff members to study such proposals.

Although the executives were cordial, the high stakes of the fight were not lost on those attending the hearing. The room was packed with Delta pilots and other employees, who burst into applause at one point and wore buttons supporting the carrier's efforts to avoid a takeover.

When Rockefeller called a break so senators could attend a vote, he asked Andrew B. Steinberg, a top official at the Transportation Department, to "maintain your position between those two CEOs."

Senators Wary Of Hostile Bid For Delta (FT)

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

Washington lawmakers on both sides of the aisle on Wednesday expressed deep scepticism about US Airways' $9.8bn hostile bid for Delta.

The poor reception for the deal in Congress raises significant questions about the future of the proposed transaction. The airline merger would lead to a wave of consolidation that would cut sharply the number of national carriers in the US, the lawmakers said.

In a small, packed hearing room to discuss the prospects of the deal, some Democratic and Republican senators appeared unconvinced by promises from Doug Parker, chief executive of US Airways, that the proposed deal, which would create the largest US carrier, would not lead to cuts in service, large-scale redundancies or increased fares.

While Congress does not have a formal say in deciding whether the deal could move forward, lawmakers – particularly those representing rural states – could put political pressure on both the airline industry and the Justice Department, which would review the deal on antitrust grounds. Although the White House has been largely hands-off on merger reviews, the Justice Department blocked a proposed merger between United and US Airways in 2001.

Andrew Steinberg, assistant secretary for aviation at the Department of Transportation, which would likely confer with antitrust authorities on the deal, declined to comment on the US Airways case, but presented mixed signals on where the Bush administration might stand on the issue.

While mergers were "not a panacea" for the airline industry's long-term problems, the government should not assume that having fewer carriers "necessarily translates into detriment to consumers", said Mr Steinberg.

However, even some Republican lawmakers who traditionally do not oppose mergers on competition grounds, such as Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, said they were concerned the deal would lead to the closure of some routes.

"You're an aggressive suitor," Mr Lott told Mr Parker. "But the lady from the South doesn't want to be forced into this shotgun wedding," he said, referring to Georgia-based Delta.

Gerald Grinstein, Delta's chief executive, whose testimony was backed up by the presence of 32 uniformed Delta pilots around the hearing room wearing "Keep Delta My Delta" pins, said the combination would trigger further deals and lead the industry "to devolve into three network carriers". He also testified that Delta was not negotiating a separate deal with Northwest Airlines.

He said: "Approve this [deal] and you will be setting a very low threshold." Mr Grinstein added that, given the roughly $22bn in debt the deal would amass on the combined company's balance sheet, one might sooner believe in Tinkerbell than Mr Parker's notion that the merger would not lead to a disruption in service.

The tone of some legislators' remarks revealed underlying frustration at the airline industry and US Airways in particular for pursuing the merger even though it and other companies have in recent years dumped their pension liabilities on to the federal government.

Lawmakers in the House of Representatives are due to take on the same issue next week at another hearing.

US Airways has said it will withdraw its bid if Delta creditors do not push the carrier to the negotiating table by February 1, allowing it to start seeking regulatory approval. Delta's board is reviewing the revised bid to create the largest US carrier, a move that has triggered talks about potential combinations. However, the final decision will rest with its creditors.

Rumors Of Delta Merger With Northwest Are False, Airline CEO Tells Congress (DEN)

By David Shepardson, Detroit News Washington Bureau

Detroit News, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Delta Air Lines CEO Gerald Grinstein told Congress Wednesday the airline isn't interested in merging with US Airways or with Northwest Airlines, the largest carrier at Detroit Metropolitan Airport.

"One such rumor is that Delta is negotiating a merger or similar deal with Northwest. One point we want to make very clear: We are not negotiating any such deal with Northwest," Grinstein said in prepared testimony before the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation committee.

The hearing was called to discuss the potential impact of airline mergers and industry consolidation.

"In the face of US Airways' hostile takeover bid, our Official Creditors Committee asked us to help gather information about potential strategic alternatives from other airlines, including Northwest."

Grinstein said that to fulfill that request, the airline "recently retained an investment banker to obtain that information, a far cry from negotiating a merger. We are compiling this information, but there has not been any negotiation regarding a merger or similar deal with Northwest or any other airline."

Grinstein heavily criticized US Airways' $10 billion-plus hostile takeover bid, saying it would never be approved by the Justice Department. Analysts have noted that there is a great deal of overlap between the two carriers' route structure, and that a merger could result in the elimination of many duplicative flights.

Grinstein said a US Airways takeover would result in the "likely loss of an estimated 10,000 Delta jobs."

"US Airways principle goal in its hostile takeover attempt is to eliminate its key competitor," Grinstein said. "This merger is being proposed to cut service, shrink hubs and increase prices."

A combined Delta and US Airways would operate 52 percent of slots and 40 percent of gates at major East Coast airports.

US Airways -- which was purchased by America West out of bankruptcy -- defended a takeover of Delta, saying it wouldn't cut service and would reduce ticket prices in dozens of cities.

US Airways Chairman Doug Parker said aggressive cost-management and consumer friendly policies and pricing allowed America West to return to profitability.

He told Congress a combined Delta-US Airways wouldn't drop any cities.

"With the ability to lower costs, gain efficiencies and adjust flying to better align demand and capacity, we believe we can lower fares in dozens of new markets and communities, just as we are doing at US Airways today," Parker said. "Moreover, passengers will benefit from the ability to get to more destinations via more routings; it is far more likely that thanks to the new Delta more passengers will be able to get to their destination at a time convenient for them and at a price that is reasonable, than would be possible under either stand-alone Delta or US Airways."

Parker also said "We will not furlough any frontline employees of Delta or US Airways as part of this merger," but didn't directly address job cuts. "We have put forth a fair and equitable proposal… Our industry stands at a crossroads. We can continue down the current path of boom and bust uncertainty, or we can chart a new course," he said. "We have to break with the failed policies of the past in order to provide a more sustainable future for all stakeholders."

Delta said the merger between America West and US Airways saw employment drop from 43,000 at the time of the merger to 35,000 today.

CME To Dominate Management Of CME-CBOT (AP)

By Stephen Wisnefski And Howard Packowitz, Dow Jones Newswires

AP, January 25, 2007

CHICAGO (AP) -- Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc. Wednesday named those who will be on their post-merger management team, with CME executives dominating the leadership roster.

The exchanges also said they "believe they are on track" to complete the merger by mid-2007, noting that "significant milestones" have been reached recently. The two largest U.S. futures exchanges cited, as examples, the filing in December of a registration statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission, and decisions made regarding a high-level organizational structure and a senior leadership team.

As previously announced, CME Chief Executive Craig Donohue will be CEO of the merged company, to be known as CME Group. CME Executive Chairman Terry Duffy will retain that role in the merged group, and CBOT Chairman Charles Carey will serve as CME Group vice chairman. Also as previously disclosed, CBOT CEO Bernard Dan will serve as a special advisor to the combined company for one year after the merger closes.

The only current CBOT executive who will be on the CME Group's management team is Bryan Durkin, who will serve as chief operating officer. Durkin, who currently serves as CBOT's chief operating officer and has been with the exchange since 1982, will be responsible for overseeing the transition of CBOT's electronically traded products to CME's Globex platform and the transition of CME trading floor operations to the CBOT facility.

Last October, CME announced that it would acquire CBOT for about $8 billion, representing one of the more significant deals in a spate of consolidation activity among exchanges around the globe. CME Group will have dominant positions in trading of futures on products tied to interest rates, stock indexes, currencies and several commodities.

CME and CBOT have seen significant growth in trading volume in recent years as investor grew increasingly interested in the types of derivatives contracts traded at the Chicago exchanges. CME's growth, however, has been more robust, in large part owing to the success of its Globex platform.

Each of the 10 members of CME's current management team will be on the CME Group's leadership team, for the most part holding the same titles and responsibilities they now have.

Phupinder Gill, who has been with CME since 1988, will continue as president of CME Group, though he will relinquish the role of chief operating officer once Durkin takes on that responsibility. Durkin will report to Gill, who will serve in the office of the CEO with Donohue.

With the naming of the new management team, the exchanges said a handful of CBOT executives -- including Chief Financial Officer Glen Johnson, Chief Administrative Officer Kevin O'Hara, Chief Information Officer William Farrow and head of marketing and business development, Christopher Malo -- would stay in their current roles until the close of the merger.

Representatives from both exchanges declined to comment on whether the CBOT executives would remain with CME Group in some capacity after completion of the merger. CBOT spokeswoman Melissa Jarmel said "those decisions haven't been made yet."

The representatives said CME and CBOT are still in the early stages of defining strategy for the merged group and laying out personnel plans. They also declined to comment on when further personnel announcements would be made.

Meanwhile, the exchanges are awaiting results of an antitrust review by the U.S. Department of Justice to determine whether the merged group would create a monopoly.

Contacted earlier this week, a Justice Department spokeswoman provided no timetable for completion of the investigation.

Shares of CME and CBOT, which have been gaining steadily since the start of the year, both hit record highs Wednesday. On the New York Stock Exchange, CME closed up $7.19 at $591.54, after moving as high as $596.30. CBOT shares closed up $2.27 at $175.72, after reaching $176.89 earlier.

TRADE WINDS In Call To Deregulate Business, A Global Twist (WSJ)

By Greg Ip, Kara Scannell And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Prominent figures in the U.S. are warning that the nation's financial markets have been handicapped by post-Enron regulatory overreach. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has made addressing the problem a signature political issue. A blue-ribbon committee chaired by former Bush economist Glenn Hubbard has echoed this sentiment, as does a report commissioned by Sen. Charles Schumer of New York and New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

Their key evidence is data suggesting that U.S. stock markets are increasingly unattractive places for companies to list shares. Mr. Hubbard, now dean of Columbia University's business school, says this is the "canary in the coal mine," an early warning of the increasing costs to U.S. companies of raising money, which in turn threatens investment and growth. Their solution: a lighter touch in regulating corporate behavior.

· The Stakes: If critics are right, U.S. companies are paying more to raise capital, which will limit investment and growth.

Yet this position, which has gone largely unchallenged, downplays a different explanation for why U.S. exchanges are under pressure -- the changing nature of global finance. Stock markets around the world have become better and deeper, encouraging companies to seek IPOs in their home market. Trading across borders has become simpler, cutting the prestige and usefulness of a big-country listing everywhere. And private-equity buyouts are a global phenomenon, not a uniquely American one.

Andrew Karolyi, an Ohio State University economist who specializes in international stock-exchange listings, agrees with Mr. Hubbard that some new regulations, especially parts of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act, impose burdens that outweigh the benefits. But Mr. Karolyi is skeptical of the stock-exchange evidence, which he links instead to transitory global trends.

MARKET SLIDE

See more charts on the competitiveness of U.S. exchanges1. Plus, read reports and speeches on the topic by Henry Paulson and others: · Speech by Henry Paulson on the Competitiveness of U.S. Capital Markets2

Regulations "should be judged on their own merits and not on any evidence of a supposed decline in the attractiveness for prospective listings from overseas," Mr. Karolyi says.

Mr. Paulson acknowledged in a speech last November that foreign markets have improved, which he called "unequivocally...a positive." But he devoted most of his attention to the costs of U.S. accounting and governance rules and the legal climate. Mr. Hubbard's Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, consisting of academics and finance executives and endorsed by Mr. Paulson, spent 148 pages discussing the harm done by U.S. regulatory and legal risks.

Among the charges: Suing corporations for fraud is too easy, resulting in a ninefold increase in the number of shareholder lawsuit settlements between 1997 and 2005. Civil and criminal prosecutors are overzealous, producing civil enforcement penalties more than 100 times higher in the U.S. than the U.K. in 2004. Auditing standards are unreasonably onerous for small companies.

As this criticism has increased in volume, regulators have eased some Sarbanes-Oxley standards for companies' internal financial controls. In addition, they have made it easier for foreign companies to stop adhering to U.S. rules, and the Department of Justice has imposed more conditions on prosecutors seeking evidence when investigating executives.

In an interview, Mr. Hubbard concedes there's "no smoking gun" that proves whether global or U.S.-specific forces are behind the smaller number of foreign companies listing in the U.S. "Both factors are important," he says.

He also cites a complex piece of evidence in favor of the domestic theory. Historically, overseas companies received a boost in their stock price when they listed in the U.S., an indication of how meeting U.S. requirements inspires investor trust. But recently the premium earned by companies from advanced countries has shrunk faster than that for shares in emerging-market companies. For companies already meeting stringent governance standards at home, Mr. Hubbard argues, the costs of meeting U.S. requirements therefore exceeds the benefits.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Paulson said he was unavailable to comment for this article. In a written statement, she said Mr. Paulson sees the global changes as "unquestionably a factor to consider" alongside regulatory and legal burdens. The Treasury is holding a conference this spring to discuss these topics.

There's little doubt U.S. exchanges are facing increasing competition. They're losing out to overseas exchanges for initial public offerings. Many overseas companies are deciding they don't need an American listing. And in the U.S. itself, many companies have decided they're better off private.

Taken alone, the cost of regulation can't explain what's happening to U.S. financial markets, and paring regulations might not alter the outcome, except to give a helping hand to Wall Street.

"Well-functioning capital markets are central to the success of the economy," says former Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers, now a Harvard University economist and managing director at a hedge fund. "What fraction of capital markets transactions runs through New York is of much less broad-based significance."

The IPO Challenge

One piece of evidence Mr. Paulson and others cite is the falling U.S. share of IPOs. At the peak of the U.S. IPO boom in 1999, the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq Stock Market notched 57% of world-wide IPO proceeds, up from 39% in 1990, according to Thomson Financial, a financial-data provider. By last year, that share had fallen to 18%.

Regulatory costs may be one factor. Another big one is the shrinking quality gap between U.S. and overseas capital markets and an explosion in IPOs from the developing world. The world's largest IPO, the $22 billion offering from Industrial & Commercial Bank of China, listed in October in both Hong Kong and Shanghai. The biggest gainer in IPO business has been Hong Kong, which snagged 16% of world IPO proceeds in 2006 compared with zero in 1990.

"The Hong Kong market is deep enough and liquid enough that there's really no need to list elsewhere," says Paul Calello, Asia chief executive for Credit Suisse, one of the managers of ICBC's IPO.

Another gainer is the London Stock Exchange's Alternative Investment Market, set up in the 1990s to cater to small companies with little operating history. AIM has far less government oversight of governance, accounting and disclosure than the LSE's better-known Main Market or U.S. markets. Its foreign listings -- not all of which are IPOs -- have skyrocketed to 306 from 31 in 2000, and include some U.S. companies.

AIM's success is seen by some as evidence that some companies have sought a haven from U.S. rules. Protonex Technology Corp., Southborough, Mass., a maker of fuel-cell power systems, went public on AIM in 2006. Scott Pearson, its chief executive officer, says it would have cost three times as much to list in the U.S., in large part due to legal and auditing costs related to Sarbanes-Oxley.

But many of AIM's companies probably couldn't have listed in the U.S. even before 2002, either because they didn't meet U.S. requirements or were too small to attract interest from U.S. underwriters and investors. "Many of the companies listed on AIM today wouldn't come anywhere close to meeting an NYSE listing standard," says Noreen Culhane, executive vice-president of listings at the NYSE.

A Global Affliction

In addition to IPO share, listings of foreign companies on U.S. markets have fallen. Since their peak in 2002, foreign listings on the NYSE have fallen 4% to 451 by the end of 2006, although that's up slightly from 2000. Since 2000, foreign listing have fallen 34% to 321 on Nasdaq.

It's hardly an American disease. Excluding AIM, the London Stock Exchange's blue-chip Main Market has seen foreign listings decline 23% since 2000. The Deutsche Börse is down 58%; Tokyo down 39%.

The world has changed for all big-country stock exchanges. For years, says Mr. Karolyi, investors "were trapped in their local markets" because foreign stock exchanges had differing standards, for example over how to finalize payments. Over time, those standards have been strengthened and harmonized, increasing "global investors' appetite for going directly into those markets." Shanghai, for example, has 842 listed companies, up from 188 in 1995.

Furthermore, says Mr. Karolyi, a U.S. listing may have had particular appeal to foreign companies in the late 1990s because of the buoyant stock market, which faded with the market's downward turn after the tech bubble burst. Most of the delisted companies had little trading volume, and trading in those that remain is generally healthy.

Cellphone maker Nokia Corp., based in Finland, shows how companies make decisions in light of these changed circumstances. Nokia sought a London listing in 1987 to raise its profile, and listed on the NYSE in 1994. In 1995, about 45% of trading in Nokia stock occurred in New York, 31% in London and 24% in Helsinki.

Then, as a condition of joining the European Union in the mid-1990s, Finland began permitting brokers in other EU countries to trade on Helsinki's stock exchange. In the late 1990s, Helsinki launched an electronic trading system and Finland adopted the euro as its currency. By 2003 Helsinki had captured 60% of Nokia's trading volume, leaving the LSE with less than 1%. Nokia delisted from London and Paris, where its shares were also traded.

"People still could trade Nokia, but we did not have to pay annual listing costs to the London and Paris stock exchanges," says spokeswoman Arja Suominen. Today, 91% of Nokia's shares are held outside Finland, but 68% of the trading occurs in Helsinki and about a quarter in the U.S.

Meanwhile, U.S. investors are less insistent that foreign companies list in the U.S. before they'll buy shares. Mitchells & Butlers PLC, a British operator of taverns, delisted from the NYSE in 2005. It says the low volume of trading -- less than 1% of the total -- didn't merit the annual $1 million cost, which included filing SEC statements and auditor fees related to Sarbanes-Oxley.

This makes little difference to Ray Mills, who owns about $10 million in Mitchells & Butlers shares for the $2.4 billion stock fund he manages for T. Rowe Price Group Inc., a Baltimore mutual-fund house. He bought the shares in London even though they were listed on the NYSE at the time, and isn't bothered that they no longer are.

"We want to go where the liquidity is," Mr. Mills says. Mitchells's stock was more liquid -- that is, easier to trade -- in its home market than in New York. "We have trading desks not just in the U.S. but Hong Kong and London [so] we have 24-hour coverage of the markets."

Private-Equity Rules

In his November speech, Mr. Paulson suggested many publicly traded companies are selling to private-equity firms -- removing themselves from public trading and SEC scrutiny -- because of the "regulatory requirements" of being a public company in the U.S. But the buyout boom, too, is not merely a U.S. trend but a global one.

DOJ_NMG_0121591

Between 1996 and 2002, private-equity buyouts represented 2% of all mergers and acquisitions in the U.S. and 3% in the rest of the world. Between 2002 and 2006, the fraction has increased to 11% in the U.S. and 10% in the rest of the world, according to Thomson Financial.

David Rubenstein, managing director of Carlyle Group, Washington, D.C., one of the world's largest private-equity firms, attributes much of the boom to the simple fact that firms such as Carlyle have so much cash -- from investors eager to share in the sector's impressive returns and from banks, hedge funds and others ready to lend on easy terms.

Regulations have also been blamed for the growing number of venture- and private-equity backed companies being sold privately. "The costs and regulatory hurdles to go public in the U.S. today are driving venture-backed companies away from our capital markets system," Keith Crandell, managing director of Chicago's Arch Venture Partners, told Congress last year.

Carlyle's Mr. Rubenstein cites another reason. It's easier for private-equity firms to recoup their entire investment by selling to another private-equity firm, rather than the small portion they typically sell in an IPO.

Early last year, Carlyle filed to sell a stake in industrial manufacturer Rexnord Corp., through an IPO, for up to $400 million. A few months later, Carlyle instead sold the entire company to Apollo Management LP, another private-equity firm, for $1.8 billion.

The importance of Sarbanes-Oxley in the decision of many public companies to go private "has probably been overstated," Mr. Rubenstein says. More important, he says, is "not just the quarterly but hourly" pressure from Wall Street for stock and earnings performance.

Differential Equations

Mr. Hubbard's committee worried about how the U.S. regulatory burden has risen relative to that of other countries. The bigger the differential, the greater the potential competitive disadvantage.

Yet even as the U.S. debates whether it has gone too far, other countries are tightening their rules. The EU, Canada, Mexico, Australia, Hong Kong, Brazil, the U.K. and Germany have to varying degrees beefed up standards for audit committees. This means many companies won't escape tighter regulation by avoiding the U.S.

Major provisions of Sarbanes-Oxley "have not competitively disadvantaged U.S. markets, simply by virtue of the fact that they have been widely adopted elsewhere," says a 2006 study by Ethiopis Tafara, director of the Securities and Exchange Commission's office of international affairs.

The Netherlands' ABN AMRO Bank NV dropped its London listing last year because of low trading volume, and now trades only on the NYSE and Euronext, two exchanges in the process of merging. Spokesman Jochem van de Laarschot says while the U.S. regulatory burden has risen, the same is true of most countries where it operates.

In 2004, Hong Kong's then-chief securities regulator, Andrew Sheng, told a Senate panel that Sarbanes-Oxley brought global attention to corporate governance. Hong Kong, he said, has moved "closer to the U.S. SEC regulatory model," though without as much detail and prescription. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said yesterday at a conference that his agency's recent guidance on Sarbanes-Oxley, relaxing its implementation, "benefited greatly" from other countries' experience with similar rules.

Europe is moving, too. "Pretty soon the vast majority of Sarbanes-Oxley will be applicable either at the European level or at the national levels," says Andrew Bernstein, a Cleary Gottlieb partner in Paris who advises many French corporations. "The regulatory costs are in the process of converging."

Juror Dismissed In Microsoft Trial (AP)

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- A juror was dismissed Wednesday for undisclosed reasons from the class-action antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp.

The dismissal leaves 11 jurors to review allegations that Microsoft used anticompetitive practices that caused thousands of Iowans to pay more for the company's software than they would have otherwise.

Judge Scott Rosenberg said he considered the dismissal a personal matter and would not say why the juror was dismissed.

Plaintiffs attorneys Roxanne Conlin and Richard Hagstrom said juror dismissals are not unusual in lengthy trials.

"It will not affect our case," they said in a statement Wednesday.

Rich Wallis, a Microsoft lawyer, said he does not anticipate any other dismissals, though he expects the remaining jurors will be in court longer than the six months initially predicted.

Seven men and five women were seated Nov. 21 to hear the case in Polk County District Court. They began hearing opening statements Dec. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0121592

Conlin and Hagstrom said experts will place damages in excess of $300 million.

Microsoft, which denies any overpricing, says its products have been widely accepted by consumers because of their low cost and high quality.

More than 80 prospective jurors were questioned before 12 were chosen for the civil trial, which would normally have eight jurors. The lawyers and Rosenberg agreed in this case to allow 12 in case some had to be dismissed or leave.

Both sides agreed to allow all jurors remaining at the end of the case to deliberate. They also agreed to permit the jury to fall to as few as six jurors.

ERG Denies Conspiring To Fix Fuel Prices (AP)

Italian Refiner ERG Denies Conspiring to Fix Retail Fuel Prices

ROME (AP) -- ERG SpA, Italy's biggest independent refiner, denied on Wednesday it had conspired to fix retail fuel prices, in a statement released one day after the country's antitrust regulator started an investigation.

The Italian Competition Authority opened an inquiry into whether nine of the biggest oil companies agreed gasoline prices in the country's service station network, limiting competition and keeping prices at the pump at one of the highest levels in the European Union.

The companies being investigated are Eni SpA, the Italian units of Royal Dutch Shell PLC, Total SA and ExxonMobil Corp., as well as Kuwait Petroleum Italia SpA, Tamoil SpA, local firms ERG SpA, Anonima Petroli Italiana SpA, or API, and IP SpA. Privately-held API bought IP from Eni in 2005.

ERG said it had a "total lack of involvement" with the alleged price fixing of gasoline and diesel. Eni declined to comment.

The antitrust regulator has said it would conclude its probe by March 31, 2008.

AFP, January 25, 2007

BRUSSELS (AFP) - EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes stepped up her anti-cartel crusade, hitting 11 companies with a record fine for fixing prices and carving up the market in electrical generation equipment.

After bumper fines in 2006, the EU competition watchdog demanded ABB, Alstom, Areva, Fuji, Hitachi Japan AE Power Systems, Mitsubishi Electric Corporation, Schneider, Siemens, Toshiba and VA Tech pay 750 million euros (972 million dollars) for running a cartel.

The total fine was the second biggest EU regulators have imposed in a cartel case after slapping 855 million euros in penalties on eight vitamin makers in 2001. That fine was later reduced to 790 million euros by an EU court.

Siemens was told to pay 418 million euros (543 million dollars) for its leading role, the biggest fine EU regulators have ever slapped on a single company for participating in a cartel.

"The Commission has put an end to a cartel which has cheated public utility companies and consumers for more than 16 years," EU Competition Commissioner Kroes said.

She has made cracking down on cartels a top priority and last year imposed fines totalling 1.8 billion euros against the illegal clubs, a new annual record for regulators at the European Commission.

ADVERTISEMENT

"The Commission has once more shown that it will not tolerate cartels in Europe and the damage that they do in any area of business," Kroes said.

"The case also demonstrates that the Commission can and will bring down such cartels even if the companies concerned use sophisticated technology to cover their tracks," she added.

EU regulators found that between 1988 and 2004 the companies rigged bids for procurement contracts, fixed prices, divided up projects among themselves and shared sensitive information in the market for gas insulated switchgear.

Acting on a tip-off from ABB, regulators conducted raids on the groups' premises in May 2004. Two years later, the EU competition watch-dog took the final step before official sanctions against them by issuing statements of objections.

The fine of 215 million euros on ABB was waived because the company revealed the cartel to regulators.

Contesting the charges lodged against it, Siemens said it was shocked by what it described as the "completely exaggerated" fines and vowed to appeal at the European Court of Justice.

"We consider the fines to be completely exaggerated and cannot understand them at all," the chairman of Siemens Power Transmissions and Distribution unit, Udo Niehage, said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0121593

Of the 418 million euro total imposed on Siemens, 396 million was slapped on the German parent company and 22 million euros on Siemens Austria. Siemens bought Austrian group VA Tech in 2005.

Toshiba denied breaking EU law and said that it would appeal while Hitachi and Mitsubishi Electric said they would consider challenging the ruling.

Although the Japanese firms play a negligible role in the European market, EU regulators accused them of agreeing with their European rivals to stay off each other's turf.

Mitsubishi Electric was fined 119 million euros, Toshiba 91 million euros, Hitachi 52 million euros, Alstom 65 million euros and Areva 53 million euros, Schneider 8.1 million euros, Fuji 3.7 million euros and Japan AE Power Systems 1.35 million euros.

Commission officials said that some of the individual fines could vary slightly because of joint ventures between some firms, but that it expected the total to be 750 million euros.

Norway Declares Apple's ITunes Illegal (FT)

By David Ibison In Stockholm, Emiko Terazono In London And Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

Apple was dealt a blow in Europe on Wednesday when Norway's powerful consumer ombudsman ruled that its iTunes online music store was illegal because it did not allow downloaded songs to be played on rival technology companies' devices.

The decision is the first time any jurisdiction has concluded iTunes breaks its consumer protection laws and could prompt other European countries to review the situation.

The ombudsman has set a deadline of October 1 for the Apple to make its codes available to other technology companies so that it abides by Norwegian law. If it fails to do so, it will be taken to court, fined and eventually closed down.

Apple, whose iTunes dominates the legal download market, has its proprietory system Fairplay. Songs and tunes downloaded through iTunes are designed to work with Apple's MP3 player iPod, but cannot be played on rival devices.

Torgeir Waterhouse, senior adviser to the Norwegian Consumer Council, who originally launched the complaint, told the Financial Times he was in negotiations with pan-European consumer groups to present a unified position on iTunes' legality.

Sweden and Finland have already backed Norway's stance, but have yet to take action, and Mr Waterhouse said the campaign was joined on Wednesday by Germany and France.

"We are satisfied the Federation of German Consumer Organisations and the French UFC Que Choisir are addressing this important issue. It means that iTunes is now being told by more than 100m European consumers to offer them a fair deal," he said.

Apple signalled that it would fight efforts in Norway and elsewhere in Europe to prise open the iTunes service, though it struck a more conciliatory tone than early last year when it attacked a proposed French law as "state-sponsored piracy".

"Apple is aware of the concerns we've heard from several agencies in Europe, and we're looking forward to resolving these issues as quickly as possible," it said in a statement. "Apple hopes that European governments will encourage a competitive environment that lets innovation thrive, protects intellectual property and allows consumers to decide which products are successful."

The development comes as competition in the multi-billion dollar global market for digital music is intensifying.

Nokia, the world's largest mobile phone maker, has set up a rival to iTunes, while Microsoft, the US technology company, has also launched its own digital music player called Zune to compete with the iPod.

However, the lack of interoperability has been blamed by some consumers and technology companies for hampering the growth of the legal digital music download market.

Record companies insist that the issue of interoperability is one for technology companies, and stress the importance of digital rights management in order to prevent piracy.

The IFPI, which represents record groups around the world, said that it "thoroughly supported interoperability, but wanted a market solution rather than one imposed by authorities".

Siemens Plans To Buy UGS For $3.5bn (FT)

By Lina Saigol In London, Richard Milne In Munich, Tobias Buck In Brussels And James Politi In New York

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

Siemens, Europe's largest engineering group, is set to strengthen its core automation division by paying about $3.5bn to buy private equity-owned UGS as it seeks to show it has not been paralysed by bribery allegations.

Details of the plan emerged as Siemens suffered a fresh blow to its reputation and finances on Wednesday, when the European Commission ordered the German engineering group to pay a record €397m fine for its "leadership role" in a long-running price-fixing cartel.

DOJ_NMG_0121594

In addition to the UGS deal, the German conglomerate was last night also considering whether to float its VDO division, one of the world's largest car parts suppliers with annual sales of about €10bn, according to people close to the situation. Both measures were discussed last night at a supervisory board meeting but because of worker sensitivities on disposals, it is possible the plans could be disrupted. The approach on VDO was "undecided", one person familiar with the discussions said.

The moves highlight the determination of Klaus Kleinfeld, Siemens' chief executive, to push ahead with strengthening and restructuring his businesses despite being enmeshed in harmful corruption allegations. UGS, a US company specialising in product lifecycle management, is currently owned by US private equity groups Silver Lake, Bain Capital and Warburg Pincus.

The private equity consortium bought UGS from Electronic Data Systems in a $2.1bn deal in March 2004. This marks one of the first exits from the latest cycle of software investments by private equity firms. Before agreeing to a sale, Warburg, Bain and Silver Lake had been considering an IPO of UGS.

The news is likely to be overshadowed on Thursday by a torrent of criticism from investors over a €420m corruption scandal and under-performing businesses at the conglomerate's annual meeting.

Siemens intends to appeal the European Commission fines, calling them "totally exaggerated". The Munich-based group denied the Commission's "blanket accusation", saying in a statement that price-fixing only took place in a "few projects" and only between October 2002 and April 2004.

The 11 groups involved in the cartel were fined a total €751m, the largest fine for a single cartel.

In addition to Siemens, the groups fined included Mitsubishi Electric, which was told to pay €119m; Toshiba, €91m; and Hitachi, €52m. Alstom was fined €65m but may escape part of the penalty because it sold the subsidiary involved in the price-fixing to Areva in 2004. The French nuclear power group was jointly liable for €54m of Alstom's fine, the Commission said.

ABB, the Swedish/Swiss group, was part of the cartel but escaped punishment because it blew the whistle.

By Mike Esterl In Munich, Jason Singer In London And Dennis K. Berman In New York

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Accelerating a restructuring drive, Siemens AG said it would acquire software maker UGS Corp. of Texas for $3.5 billion, including debt, and sell a minority stake in its automotive-electronics unit through an initial public offering.

The steps follow a flurry of moves in the past 18 months by Germany's largest conglomerate, which is overhauling far-flung industrial holdings that manufacture items including steam turbines, medical scanners, high-speed trains and light bulbs.

A share listing of Siemens VDO Automotive could generate significant cash for the Munich-based company. The unit booked €10 billion ($13 billion) in revenue and €669 million in operating profit in the most recent fiscal year ended Sept. 30. Siemens didn't say how big a minority stake it would float.

Management said last year it would narrow its focus to three fast-growing areas: energy and environment; automation, and public and private infrastructure; and health-care.

While the automotive division doesn't fit neatly into that blueprint, UGS does. UGS makes software that helps companies manage products from inception to production. Siemens plans to fold the business -- which had just under $1.2 billion in revenue and $241 million in operating profit in fiscal 2005 -- into its factory-automation unit, one of the company's largest and most profitable divisions.

The UGS acquisition marks Siemens's largest purchase since last June, when it agreed to pay €4.2 billion for the medical-diagnostics division of Bayer AG. Europe's largest engineering company by sales, Siemens also has been investing heavily in areas such as wind power and water treatment.

Management at Siemens is pushing ahead with the restructuring drive even as it grapples with a widening fraud investigation. Siemens said last month it had uncovered €420 million in suspicious transactions stretching back seven years. Authorities suspect employees set up slush funds to pay bribes to potential customers.

Prosecutors are focusing on alleged corruption at the unprofitable telecommunications-equipment division that Siemens is trying to dismantle. A plan to transfer the bulk of that business into a joint venture with Nokia Corp. of Finland was put on hold last month until a compliance review can be completed.

Siemens today will publish its earnings report for the most recent fiscal quarter.

Dispute Threatens CSN's Bid For Corus (FT)

By Jonathan Wheatley In Brasília And Peter Marsh In London

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

The bid by Companhia Siderurgica Nacional, the Brazilian steelmaker, to acquire the Anglo-Dutch group Corus for £5.7bn ($11.2bn) could be blown off course by a legal dispute in Brazil, it has emerged.

DOJ_NMG_0121595

The dispute, over CSN's rights to an iron-ore supply that would be crucial to a merged business, could lend fresh impetus to rival bidder Tata Steel of India. Tata is expected in the next few days to raise its £5.5bn bid above CSN's offer. Both bidders are due to finalise their offers for the world's eighth biggest steelmaker by next Tuesday.

The tussle arose after Companhia Vale do Rio Doce, the Brazilian mining group, said it would challenge CSN's ability to supply iron ore to Corus should its bid succeed. A big part of the rationale behind CSN's offer is that it would be able to supply cheap iron ore from its Casa de Pedra mine in Brazil to Corus's European plants. Tata has limited supplies of iron ore and, under Indian export regulations, is unlikely to be allowed in the next few years to ship it overseas.

But José Martins, CVRD's director for ferrous operations, told the Financial Times that CVRD would question CSN's ability to ship iron ore under the terms of a contract signed between the companies in 2001.

One interpretation of this accord is that CVRD has the first rights to any extra iron ore from Casa de Pedra. Mr Martins said the idea CSN could take iron from the mine to send to Corus "cannot be affirmed in advance".

"If CSN buys Corus, we will look closely at how the deal is done to see if our right [to the ore] remains in force," he said.

Juarez Salipa, CSN's mining director, said: "This is pure malevolence by CVRD. They will answer in court for any damage they cause by this type of statement."

Bush Makes Sales Pitch For Proposal On Energy (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

New York Times, January 25, 2007

WILMINGTON, Del., Jan. 24 — President Bush made a big deal about ethanol, the fuel derived from plants, in his State of the Union address Tuesday night. Wednesday morning, he got up close and personal with it, poking his head through stalks of corn and wheat while scientists for DuPont gave him a crash course in ethanol production in a tour of their research greenhouse here.

The presidential visit to the DuPont Experimental Station, which conducts federally financed research into the development of alternative fuels, amounted to a sales pitch for Mr. Bush's plan to reduce projected gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years.

After hearing a minilecture on how plants are converted into sugars, and the sugars then distilled into fuel, Mr. Bush, a former Texas oilman who has proclaimed Americans "addicted to oil," lifted up a glass beaker of switchgrass, a perennial grass that looks like hay, and stared into a bank of television cameras to drive his point home.

"What our citizens need to know," Mr. Bush said, with a microbiologist, Armando Byrne, by his side, "is that because of the research you're doing here, with some of their taxpayer dollars, that switchgrass, that can be grown all across America, can end up being made into fuel that powers their automobiles."

Mr. Byrne nodded in agreement.

"That's important," the president declared.

Later, in a speech to DuPont employees, Mr. Bush said he had ordered the federal government to buy more hybrid vehicles that use ethanol or alternative fuels, and to buy hybrid plug-in cars "as soon as they hit the market."

Most federal agencies already have alternative-fuel vehicles. Of the more than 586,000 vehicles in the federal fleet, 866 are hybrids and 106,869 are alternative-fuel vehicles, White House officials said.

"We set the goal," Mr. Bush told the DuPont employees. "It doesn't make much sense for the federal government to set the goal and not participate."

The trip itself, however, was hardly energy efficient. Mr. Bush made the short jaunt to Wilmington aboard Air Force One, spending a mere 30 minutes in the air on the way up and 20 minutes on the way back. On the ground, he traveled in the usual motorcade of about two dozen vehicles, including sport utility vehicles carrying gun-toting Secret Service agents, and vans carrying camera-toting members of the press.

There was nary a hybrid among them.

President Travels To Promote Emphasis On Alternative Fuels (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 25, 2007

WILMINGTON, Del. — President Bush went on the road Wednesday to begin making his case for more alternative fuel sources.

DOJ_NMG_0121596

A day after highlighting energy and other domestic issues in his State of the Union address, Bush toured a plant that develops biofuels from corn, switch grass and wood chips. He also touted his plan to reduce the use of gasoline over the next decade to an audience of more than 1,000, most of whom were DuPont employees.

In Washington, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee debated and passed a resolution opposing Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop levels in Iraq. In Tuesday's speech, Bush appealed to Congress to give his strategy "a chance to work."

Focusing his remarks on energy and never mentioning the Iraq war Wednesday, Bush said alternatives to imported oil are not only essential to the economy and the environment, they are important to protecting national security. "If you're dependent on oil overseas … and a regime hostile to the United States produces that oil, you become vulnerable," he said.

Bush noted that in a global economy, dependence on oil imports has a pocketbook effect: "The more dependent we are … the more likely it is that somebody else's demand is going to affect what you pay at the pump for gasoline."

Bush continues his campaign to sell his State of the Union ideas today in Lee's Summit, Mo., where he will discuss his plan for granting tax deductions for health insurance. Bush also plans a speech on the economy next week in advance of releasing his 2008 budget plan Feb. 5.

"The American people remain concerned about the situation in Iraq, as is the president," White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said. "But issues like health care, education and driving your car touch the lives of every American."

"We got a lot of wind — particularly in Washington," Bush said jokingly.

Michele Riley, a human resources coordinator at DuPont, said she supports Bush's domestic agenda but noted he faces combative Democrats and an unpopular war.

"It makes it difficult," Riley said. She said she didn't sense much "warmth" from congressional Democrats toward Bush.

Vivian Adams of Wilmington, who owns a swimming school, said she agrees with Bush on energy and immigration, but "I'm not sure about the Iraq war."

She agreed cooperation from Democrats would be essential to Bush's success.

Bush's speech Tuesday was watched by more people than his address in 2006: 45,486,000 viewers vs. 41,699,000, according to preliminary figures from Nielsen Media Research.

The president returned to the White House in the afternoon to meet with Army Gen. Dan McNeil, the incoming commander for the NATO-led forces in Afghanistan. Bush also hosted his annual meeting with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the leaders of the military's combat commands.

Bush Calls For Cleaner Federal Vehicles (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Janet Wilson

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

WILMINGTON, DEL. — President Bush ordered the federal government Wednesday to move toward purchasing hybrid-powered vehicles and reducing the federal fleet's petroleum consumption by 2% each year, part of an effort to boost alternatives to gasoline.

Bush announced the executive order during a morning devoted to promoting new-technology fuels. In his State of the Union address Tuesday night, he set a goal of reducing the nation's gasoline consumption by 20% over 10 years, mainly by boosting ethanol production and toughening mileage standards for cars and light trucks.

In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's senior environment and energy advisors said they had major concerns about Bush's strategy — saying his proposals to increase the use of alternative fuels could sharply increase greenhouse gas emissions by opening the door to heavily polluting oil shale, tar sands and coal.

They also worried about California's low-carbon fuel policy being preempted by federal proposals.

While emphasizing that they were still studying Bush's plans, California Environmental Protection Agency Secretary Linda S. Adams, California Air Resources Board Chairman Robert F. Sawyer and other officials said that the state's program for reducing the use of traditional fuels does not call for increased use of any particular alternative fuel, such as ethanol. Instead, they said, it lets the market decide if ethanol, plug-in or hybrid vehicles or other biofuels should be used to reach the state's goals.

Sawyer said that, depending on how it's produced, ethanol can have either a negligible or a very substantial effect on greenhouse gas emissions. Other fuels could be even worse, he said.

"We're concerned some of the alternatives, such as tar sands, coal and oil shale — these sources of alternative fuels can increase [greenhouse gas] emissions as much as a factor of two over petroleum. So, we view that as a very negative direction to go in," Sawyer said.

DOJ_NMG_0121597

Adams and Dan Skopec, undersecretary of the state EPA, expressed concern that existing federal renewable fuels mandates on refineries, combined with Bush's new policies, could be implemented in ways that would preempt California's landmark greenhouse gas law, which requires a 25% reduction of greenhouse gas emissions by 2020.

"It will potentially be problematic, and of course it depends on what the president proposes, and what Congress chooses to act on. So, the devil will be in the details on this issue of renewable fuels," Skopec said.

In Delaware, Bush toured a research center at DuPont, the international chemical company. Scientists there are working to develop cellulosic ethanol, a fuel brewed from various forms of vegetative growth — woodchips, weed-like switch grass and corn stalks, for example, rather than the corn kernels that are now used to produce ethanol.

Bush said he was directing the government to purchase plug-in hybrid vehicles, if they become commercially available, and to purchase other hybrid and flexible-fuel vehicles that can use ethanol.

Bush also urged pressing ahead with the revitalization of the nation's nuclear power industry, and with offshore drilling for deep pockets of gas, which he said could be conducted in an "environmentally friendly way." Nuclear energy, he said, is "going to be good for your children. It's going to make us less dependent on natural gas from overseas, and it's going to make us better stewards of the environment."

Bush Calls Biofuels "An Opportunity" (DELNJ)

By Jeff Montgomery

Delaware News Journal, January 25, 2007

President Bush followed his State of the Union call for expanded use of biofuels with a speech today at the Hotel DuPont in Wilmington on what he described as “an interesting opportunity for our country”

Dependence on oil, Bush said, creates both a national security problem for the country and environmental concerns.

“We can get beyond the pre-Kyoto era with a post-Kyoto strategy, the center of which is new technologies,” Bush said during the first minutes of his speech, referring to the international push to reduce emissions of heat-trapping greenhouse gases linked to global climate change. The treaty was never endorsed by the White House.

Bush thanked DuPont workers, saying they are “really putting this country on the leading edge of technological change.”

“At this company you've got 2,500 scientists, some of the smartest people in the country working here, all trying to develop new technology to help us solve this problem.”

More than 1,200 DuPont employees and other guests piled into the hotel's auditorium for the address, some arriving hours ahead of his arrival. The President was flanked by about 50 DuPont scientists and researchers seated on two bleachers, and standing in front of a projected banner that read: “Strengthening America's Future.”

The remarks came hours after Bush called for a rapid increase in the use of alternative fuels, including the type of ethanol fuels that DuPont hopes to commercialize. Bush said that the nation should replace about 20 percent during the next 10 years.

Earlier today, in a tour at the Experimental Station greenhouse in Alapocas with DuPont CEO Charles O. Holliday and U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, Bush was shown jars of bio-butanol and cellulosic ethanol, two alternative fuels that DuPont is working on producing for the mass market.

Unlike the ethanol currently available on the market which is produced from corn kernels, cellulosic ethanol can be derived from corn stover, wood chips and switchgrass, among other things.

Bush spent the first 15 minutes of his address focusing on other energy sources, and made a call for increased use of nuclear power," a source that he described as clean and essential for the country's development of energy independence.

"This is a reality, this is something we can live by," Bush said after touring DuPont's Experimental Station and viewing biofuels research work. "I was incredibly encouraged by what I saw."

Battle Lines Drawn On Fuel Economy (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

Washington Post, January 25, 2007

President Bush and Congress appear to be on a collision course on how best to increase motor-vehicle fuel efficiency.

Transportation Secretary Mary Peters said yesterday that Bush would oppose attempts by Congress to raise fuel-efficiency standards if its approach differs from the administration's. On Tuesday, Bush called for changing standards to reach a goal of saving 8.5 billion gallons of gasoline in 2017. Scientists say Bush's plan would require automakers to lift overall fuel efficiency to 34 miles per gallon, from 24 mpg today.

Lawmakers from both parties are beginning to push for stronger action, including Sens. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii) and Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.). Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) has introduced legislation to increase the passenger-car standard to 40 mpg. The government's average fuel-economy standard for passenger cars has been 27.5 mpg since the 1980s.

Peters said Bush wants to change how the government regulates fuel economy for passenger cars. Currently, Congress sets standards for cars while the administration sets them for trucks and sport-utility vehicles. Peters said Bush wants the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration to have power over passenger-car fuel standards.

NHTSA updated the fuel-efficiency standard for trucks last year, setting in motion an increase to 24 mpg in 2011 from 22.2 mpg this year. Environmentalists have complained that the increase was too small.

At the Washington Auto Show yesterday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) expressed hope that Congress and the administration would work out their differences. Asked whether there could be bipartisan legislation on fuel economy, she said "absolutely."

Auto executives are pressing the federal government for financial support for costly fuel-saving technologies.

In the Bush plan, Peters said, regulators would require that automakers improve fuel economy by 4 percent a year starting in 2010 for passenger cars and 4 percent a year for trucks and SUVs beginning in 2012. The plan would also give automakers the ability to buy and sell fuel-efficiency credits among themselves, though the details have not been worked out.

Sharp changes in fuel standards have encountered stiff opposition from the auto industry, which fears that they would cut into profits. The companies have outlined approaches similar to the Bush plan, which Peters called "the most friendly to Detroit."

U.S. automakers are trying to pull out of a deep slump after consumers fled to more-fuel-efficient vehicles when gasoline prices rose significantly. Some observers think the industry would benefit from making cars with better mileage -- even if that is forced upon it and increases costs.

"Raising fuel-economy standards will save auto jobs in the U.S.," said David Freidman, research director for the clean vehicles program at the Union of Concerned Scientists. "One of the biggest threats to auto-industry jobs besides poor management decisions is high gas prices."

Ethanol Industry Gets A Boost From Bush (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 25, 2007

At the State of the Union address Tuesday night, Don Endres relished the strange applause rituals, the pomp and ceremony, and even the dinner in the Capitol beforehand at which he rubbed elbows with leading lawmakers.

But most of all, Endres, the chief executive of the nation's second-largest ethanol maker, relished President Bush's message: that the government should sharply raise the mandate for ethanol use in motor fuels, setting a floor for alternative and renewable fuel use in 2017 that is equal to seven times the current ethanol output.

That is good news for Endres's company, VeraSun Energy, which will nearly triple its capacity by the end of 2008, to 670 million gallons a year from 230 million. VeraSun's shares soared this week. Even after profit-taking by investors yesterday, VeraSun closed at $17.49 a share, up 5 percent since Friday's close.

Endres owns 41.7 percent of the company, which went public in June and has a market capitalization of $1.35 billion. He raised seed money by building and selling companies in the debit card, electronic equipment and Internet payment businesses. Only Archer Daniels Midland, with more than 1 billion gallons a year of ethanol capacity and half again as much on the way, is bigger than VeraSun.

Not everyone thinks Bush's speech is good news. Oil refiners complain about mandates telling them how to blend fuels. Critics of Bush's proposal say it will be impossible to hit the proposed requirement of 35 billion gallons a year by 2017 because the main renewable fuel used now, ethanol made from corn, is already driving up corn prices and will use much or all of the U.S. corn harvest. And technology for producing "cellulosic" ethanol from other feedstocks, such as switch grass, has not been proved on a commercial scale yet.

Ethanol boosters are not counting on available technology, however. They are counting on new advances for making ethanol and continued government subsidies. A tax credit to refiners amounts to 51 cents per gallon of ethanol; without that credit, ethanol makers such as VeraSun, which earned about $1 a gallon in the second and third quarters last year, would have to slash prices to make their product economical.

"My grandfather grew 40 bushels of corn per acre," said Endres, who grew up on that farm in Watertown, S.D. "My father grew 80 bushels per acre. My brothers are getting 160 bushels an acre. Every generation, we double corn production per acre."

Endres says that in addition, more farmland could be devoted to growing corn, including a quarter of the land now used to grow soybeans.

Critics see this as ethanol in the sky, but the VeraSun chief executive also preaches another gospel: that technological advances will make ethanol manufacturing more efficient. "The industry is still in its infancy," Endres said, adding that refineries now get 20 to 30 percent more ethanol from the same amount of feedstock than five years ago.

The prospect of technological advances was promoted yesterday by Bush. After touring a DuPont research facility in Wilmington, Del., where scientists are developing methods for mass-producing ethanol made from cornstalks, switch grass and wood chips, Bush said he was confident that the technology was in place to meet his goals.

"I came wondering whether or not cellulosic ethanol was one of these things down the road that may be happening, may not, could end up being science or science fiction," Bush said. "It's going to be science." DuPont plans to open its first pilot plant to manufacture cellulosic ethanol by next year, and officials say they are confident that the fuel could hit the market two years after that, said Stephanie Jacobson, a public affairs official with DuPont.

Earlier in the day, Bush signed an executive order to reduce the federal government's use of gasoline, increase its use of alternative fuels and buy more flex-fuel vehicles.

Despite criticism from economists and oil refiners, Endres says government support for the ethanol industry is justified because of the need to reduce oil imports. "Why do we subsidize oil with double depreciation and royalty relief?" he said. Subsidies, he said, are a "proven practice, especially when dealing with matters that are strategic to the country."

With Bush's commitment to a new mandate for alternative motor fuels, companies like VeraSun are counting on continuing strong demand for corn ethanol. Endres says the industry will have to grow at the current breakneck pace for the next decade to meet Bush's goal.

"We think that once some of the laws are formulated it gets rid of some of the oversupply risk," said Jacques Rousseau, an energy analyst at Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group. "That was one of the things that had spooked some investors."

Investor enthusiasm for ethanol stocks is cooler than it was last summer, when VeraSun hit a high of $30.75 a share. As oil prices went down from peak levels and as corn prices skyrocketed to $4 a bushel, ethanol companies got squeezed. In November, Rousseau raised his estimate of 2007 corn prices and slashed his estimates of VeraSun earnings, though he still recommends the stock. "If we're going to need this much ethanol, we're going to need a lot of corn," he said.

Rousseau, who also follows major oil companies, noted that for all the hullabaloo about ethanol, "the whole ethanol industry is the size of one big oil refinery: It's still very small in the grand scheme of things." But he said that if oil prices drop and corn prices continue to rise, then some distilleries might get left on the drawing board.

"We built our business on $35 to $40 oil," Endres said. Crude oil yesterday closed at $55.37 a barrel. Endres said that even if oil prices sink, "we're convinced that we'll weather the storm."

Deck's Stacked Against Ethanol These Days (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, January 25, 2007

Even as President Bush called for new investment in corn-based ethanol in his State of the Union address, many investors trying to cash in on the gold rush in ethanol are coming away with husks.

Rising corn prices, aggressive building of new plants and falling gasoline prices have so far thwarted the easy money investors expected. The disappointment continued Wednesday, even after Bush's positive mention Tuesday night, when shares of all the major publicly traded ethanol companies sold off.

Shares of Aventine Renewable Energy, Pacific Ethanol, VeraSun and Archer Daniels Midland suffered losses ranging from 2% to more than 7% as traders who had jumped into the stocks ahead of the president's speech bailed out. And that's added more pain to some brutal dot-com style losses the stocks have suffered since last year.

Investors and traders have lost their enthusiasm for ethanol due to:

·Economic reality. The beauty of ethanol was that cheap corn could be turned into expensive gasoline. But prices of corn, the biggest raw material of ethanol, have been soaring, says Francis Gaskins of IPOdesktop.com. "Corn is not a free commodity," he says. "It's not as economical as people think."

Meanwhile, oil prices have been plummeting. The price of a barrel of crude is down 9.3% this year and 28.1% off its high.

When oil prices fall, it makes the push for ethanol and other alternative energy less urgent. "Cheap oil could certainly slow things. At some point it's not economical to build the plants," says Jonathan Lichter of Sidoti. Oil must be above $40 a barrel for ethanol to make economic sense, says Jason Henderson of the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City.

·Surge of competition. There's a race to produce ethanol, and it's unclear if that'll drive corn prices even higher. There are currently 111 refineries generating a total of 5.4 billion gallons of ethanol a year, says Renewable Fuels Association. That capacity will double to 11.7 billion gallons once the 75 new plants and eight expansions now in construction are completed. That's just the start: Bush on Tuesday called for the production of 35 billion gallons of alternative fuel a year by 2017.

There's simply not enough corn to meet that goal, Lichter says. That'll force ethanol producers to try turning corn waste or grass into ethanol, a process that's even more difficult than using corn.

Such worries have made ethanol investing stomach-churning. Shares of the major ethanol stocks are down 49%, on average, from their 52-week highs.

But there's a kernel of truth in the ethanol boom. Despite short-term issues, the nation will seek new energy sources, and ethanol is the leading candidate, says Paul Resnik, analyst at Dutton Associates.

"There's still room for growth for ethanol," he says. "These companies will do well over the long haul."

U.S. Car Makers Stand To Gain From Bush Plans (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon, Mike Spector

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

President Bush's broad new proposals to change the nation's health-care and energy policies have an important but little-noticed common thread: White House aides hope they will boost the ailing American auto industry, whose pleas for help have largely been ignored by Washington in recent years.

The question now is how much chance those hopes have of becoming reality, particularly with the Democratic majority in Congress controlling the fate of Mr. Bush's agenda.

The energy proposals -- crafted in a way that would erase some of the advantages enjoyed by the U.S. industry's Japanese competitors -- appear to have a shot at becoming law. The health program, which critics say could help auto companies but hurt auto workers, seems unlikely to gain traction anytime soon.

One thing is certain, however. No industry would be directly affected more than the auto sector by the domestic program the president laid out in Tuesday night's State of the Union address. "The president obviously recognizes some of the challenges the domestic auto makers have been facing," Joel Kaplan, a White House deputy chief of staff, told reporters in advance of the speech.

Still, industry executives, whose calls for aid have been spurned repeatedly by the Bush administration, cautioned that any benefit Detroit derived from the proposals would depend on how the final rules were drafted and how they were implemented.

"We agree with the president in that there's a clear need to cut America's dependence on foreign oil. However, it's our belief the decision should be one of customer choice," said David Elshoff, a spokesman for DaimlerChrysler AG. The president's health-care proposal, Mr. Elshoff added, "clearly addresses the uninsured and the underinsured. But it doesn't address the need to level the playing field for companies who have made the commitment to provide health care for their employees."

While Mr. Bush used Tuesday night's speech to tout the overall health of the economy, Democrats were quick to point out Americans' widespread anxiety about the security of their jobs and benefits, fears heightened by the struggles of many U.S. manufacturers, particularly auto makers.

With their U.S. operations in the red, General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. have eliminated a total of more than 70,000 jobs during the past year -- largely through employee buyouts -- and plan to close more than two dozen North American factories between them as they shrink to adapt to declining U.S. sales.

Japan's Toyota Motor Corp., meanwhile, is on track to overtake Ford as the No. 2 auto maker in the U.S., perhaps as early as this year, and is gunning to replace GM as the world's leading auto maker shortly thereafter. DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group, which previously appeared healthier than its two Detroit rivals, is now in the red, too. Next month it is expected to roll out a restructuring plan calling for plant closings and job cuts.

Though many factors have contributed to the industry's woes, soaring health-care costs are a big part of the problem. The Detroit giants are paying the price for years of buying labor peace by agreeing to provide rich health-care and other benefits to their unionized workers. GM, for example, has said its health-care costs average as much as $1,200 for each car it sells in the U.S.

At a White House meeting with Mr. Bush in mid-November, chief executives of the Big Three auto makers made a special plea for help controlling runaway health-care costs. White House officials said this week that Mr. Bush's proposal would do that.

"In general, anything that can reduce the cost of health care is positive for the industry," said David Cole, head of the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, Mich.

Mr. Bush's chosen method for promoting wider health coverage, however, could hurt some employees -- like auto workers -- who get especially generous health benefits from their employers. And that reduces the chance of Congress enacting his proposal.

The Bush proposal would tax the value of employer-provided health benefits in excess of $15,000, and give tax breaks to people with less-generous plans. The administration says most workers would get a tax break under the plan. But because some union policies are worth more than $15,000, those workers would face a tax increase.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow, a Michigan Democrat re-elected in November with strong backing from the United Auto Workers, said in an interview that the Bush plan would "tax health-care benefits for middle-class families....It's absolutely the wrong direction for them to go."

Alan Reuther, legislative director for the UAW, said the plan also could encourage younger workers to desert employer-provided plans, leaving them with older and sicker people to cover.

In addition to the toll taken by health-care costs, the Big Three have lost ground to Japanese rivals, especially as demand for more-fuel-efficient cars has grown in recent years. The Bush energy proposals could tip the balance more in Detroit's favor.

One way is through the proposed reform of fuel-economy rules. Under the current Corporate Average Fuel Economy, or CAFE, system, auto makers need to meet a fleetwide minimum average requirement of 22.2 miles per gallon for light trucks and 27.5 miles per gallon for passenger cars sold in the U.S. That means that companies selling larger, less fuel-efficient cars need to sell more small, fuel-efficient cars to bring up their average.

Detroit auto makers, whose big cars are more profitable and competitive than their small cars, say the current system handicaps them against Toyota and Honda Motor Co., which have sold more-fuel-efficient fleets in the past and can use credits amassed under the system to offset less efficient, larger vehicles.

The president's plan would make a significant change in the way passenger-car fuel economy is regulated, and one much desired by the Big Three. The new system would assign fuel-economy targets to car models based on their size, instead of mandating a fleetwide average. A car like the full-size Chevrolet Impala, for example, would be required to meet the standard for its size class. Such a change has already been adopted for light trucks. Depending on how the rules were written, the change could give Detroit more freedom to sell its more-profitable lower-mileage cars without having to rev up sales of smaller less-profitable models.

The UAW may oppose that change, however. Union leaders argue that the current laws encourage Detroit to make small cars in the U.S. Absent the fleetwide rule, they fear those small-car factories would close.

One uncertainty for auto makers is how much the administration might increase fuel-efficiency standards as it overhauls them. "The key for us is we're going to have to see the details and how it all flushes out," said Paul Ballew, GM's top market analyst. "It's one thing to go to categories. It's another thing to go to categories and change the standard."

Another White House priority -- a huge increase in federally mandated use of alternative fuels like ethanol -- could also be a boost for American auto companies. While Japanese companies dominate the market for fuel-efficient hybrids, the Big Three think they would gain an advantage if broader ethanol use became the preferred approach to reducing the nation's gasoline consumption. American companies, unlike their Japanese rivals, have long experience with building ethanol-burning engines in places like Brazil, and already sell more ethanol-capable "flex fuel" vehicles in the U.S.

In response to Mr. Bush's address, Ford's group vice president for corporate affairs, Ziad Ojakli, said in a statement: "Ford supports reducing gasoline usage through an increase in alternative fuels such as ethanol. We have produced almost two million flex-fuel vehicles, with ethanol capability. In addition, we have announced plans to make half our annual vehicle production flexible fuel vehicle capable by 2012."

Boosting ethanol is politically popular with both Democrats and Republicans, particularly in farm states. But technical hurdles remain to mass distribution. "One key component that needs to be considered is infrastructure," a GM spokesman said. "What are the incentives to increase both storage and availability of pumps?"

At an appearance at a DuPont Co. research facility in Delaware yesterday, Mr. Bush also appeared to promise more federal funds for research to improve another technology -- the batteries that help power hybrid vehicles, a top priority of U.S. auto makers, who lag behind their Japanese rivals in that area.

Bush Welcomed To Climate Debate (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

It was overlooked by Beltway pundits and ignored in the Democratic rebuttal, but President Bush's brief State of the Union comments on "the serious challenge of global climate change" sparked sharp interest, comment and criticism around the globe.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, United Nations global-warming chief Yvo de Boer and senior business leaders at the posh annual gathering in Davos, Switzerland, all seized on Mr. Bush's Tuesday night remarks on energy, oil and the environment as a sign that the United States has a new appreciation for the problem.

"I do believe that this whole debate is now moving in a completely different and more positive direction," Mr. Blair told the House of Commons yesterday. Mr. Blair has pushed a reluctant Washington to move the issues of climate change, global warming and greenhouse gases to the center of its foreign-policy agenda.

Mr. de Boer, speaking to reporters on a trip to Tokyo, called the energy-conservation measures outlined by Mr. Bush in his address "very encouraging," saying it was significant that the president linked his policies for the first time to the climate-change issue.

Mr. Bush "has put the actions he intends to take in the context of confronting the serious -- and he used the word 'serious' -- global challenge of climate changes," Mr. de Boer said.

Advance word Tuesday of the president's plan to double the size of the U.S. strategic petroleum reserve -- to be tapped in times of crisis -- sparked the sharpest one-day increase in world oil prices since mid-2005, up nearly 5 percent to $55.

Mr. Bush devoted the largest single portion of his address to the war in Iraq.

There is virtually no expectation the U.S. government will reverse course and embrace the binding caps on greenhouse-gas emissions contained in the Kyoto Protocol. One of Mr. Bush's first actions as president in 2001 was to pull out of the Kyoto pact, citing its harmful impact on the economy and the lack of caps for developing countries such as China.

But on the day when former Vice President Al Gore, Mr. Bush's opponent in the 2000 presidential race, picked up two Oscar nominations for his documentary on global warming, Mr. Bush announced steps to cut U.S. energy use, slow the production of greenhouse gases and reduce U.S. dependence of foreign oil suppliers.

James Cameron is chief executive of London-based Climate Change Capital, an investment bank that invests in environmental projects and technologies. He told the World Economic Forum in Davos that Mr. Bush's remarks could be a major turning point in the debate on global warming.

"If the U.S. is moving in that direction, it's a tremendous realignment with the rest of the world and should make it easier to get international agreement on climate change following the end of the Kyoto Protocol," he said, according to the Associated Press.

Mr. de Boer, executive secretary of the U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change, also said that U.S. participation is critical if a new global-warming pact is to succeed.

"I think it makes no sense whatsoever trying to address the question of climate change without the active participation from the United States," he said. "The United States accounts for about 25 percent of global emissions."

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change will release a new study early next month that reportedly includes its gloomiest forecast to date. The U.N. study asserts that greenhouse gases are at their highest levels in 650,000 years, with soaring risks over the next century of droughts, floods and other climate-related disasters.

Foreign environmental groups criticized Mr. Bush's proposals as inadequate, even as they credited him with raising the issue of climate change at all.

"He is diluting the issue by talking in terms of cutting the United States' oil dependency, rather than in terms of the serious environmental consequences," said K. Srinivas, a global-warming activist for Greenpeace India, at the Davos gathering.

Merkel Calls For Challenging Emissions Controls (FT)

By Chris Giles And Gillian Tett

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

The twin demands of action to prevent climate change and enhance energy security requires Europe to commit to challenging mandatory controls on greenhouse gasses after 2012, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, said on Wednesday. VIDEO: Davos

Lord Levene warns that weather-related catastrophes could cause up to $100bn losses

In a marked contrast to George Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday, when he set an ambition to reduce gasoline usage in the US by 20 per cent over the next 10 years, Ms Merkel said she welcomed the opportunity for the European Union to "offer a [greenhouse gas] reduction target of 30 per cent, but we expect other large emitters to participate in that".

With the US still refusing to set a mandatory limit on its emissions, the transatlantic differences remain wide, even though Ms Merkel welcomed the moves made by President Bush.

Climate change is at the top of the agenda for business leaders at the world economic forum at Davos. In rhetoric at least, business leaders in the Swiss ski resort were far closer to the German chancellor's position, wanting certainty and expecting stronger action on climate change than that of Mr Bush.

Alain Belda, chief executive of Alcoa, the aluminium company, for example, said it was untenable for the US climate change agenda to be set by individual states. "I think the country needs one rule," he said.

In another interactive session, 71 per cent of delegates voted against a proposal that markets and voluntary actions were superior in reducing carbon emissions and insisted the motivation for action had to come from government.

Separately, both Lord Levene, chairman of the Lloyd's insurance syndicate, and Jacques Aigrain, chief executive officer of Swiss Re, welcomed the comments by President Bush about climate change but called for more action.

DOJ_NMG_0121603

"The fact that there is a recognition that the concern [about climate change] is valid... and a debate about solutions is extremely encouraging," said Mr Aigrain.

"Climate change is the big theme that everyone is talking about here in Davos and that is welcome," said Lord Levene.

Climate change is already forcing the insurance industry to prepare itself for rising losses as a result of increasingly costly natural disasters, Lord Levene warned.

Indeed, in recent months Lloyd's has started conducting behind-the-scenes scenario planning for weather-related catastrophes that could cause up to $100bn losses - such as a major hurricane hitting the wealthiest parts of the American East Coast.

This would be significantly bigger than the record $80bn losses that the industry suffered in 2005, as a result of storms such as Hurricane Katrina.

"People ask who might bear the cost of climate change but the fact is that insurance sector is already bearing real costs," Lord Levene said. "The real problem is that we just don't know what is happening anymore," he added, pointing out that the biggest challenge for the industry was the rising volatility of weather patterns.

In an effort to protect itself, the insurance industry has already started raising premiums for customers in potentially vulnerable sectors, such as housing on the US East Coast.

However, this move is now triggering rising protests from consumers – particularly given the benign conditions last year – and concerns about the issue this week prompted the state of Florida to create an additional fund for catastrophe reinsurance using taxpayers money, in the first such move seen in the US.

Whitman: Bush Missed Chance (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 25, 2007

Former Environmental Protection Agency chief Christine Todd Whitman said President Bush missed the "perfect opening" to call for a cap on greenhouse gas emissions in his State of the Union address Tuesday night.

While such a move would have represented a major policy shift for the administration, Whitman said she had hoped the fact that 10 major American companies called for a cap earlier this week would have provided sufficient political cover.

Those companies, which include General Electric, DuPont and Alcoa, joined four non-profit groups that have advocated for limits on emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases to form the U.S. Climate Action Partnership. The group backs government-imposed limits on greenhouse gas emissions, but is not backing a specific policy proposal.

In the days preceding the State of the Union, a rumor circulated that Bush might change course, but Press Secretary Tony Snow denied that would happen.

While Bush did not call for a carbon cap, Whitman, who as EPA director often butted heads with White House officials over the need to address global warming, credited her former boss for acknowledging the climate was changing in his State of the Union address Tuesday night. The president called global climate change a "serious challenge."

"That's not insignificant," Whitman said, given how carefully the speech is vetted.

The slight concession in Bush's speech, along with recent comments from the Council on Environment Quality Chairman James Connaughton, seem to suggest the White House is willing to work with Capitol Hill on global-warming bills and leaves Whitman "more and more hopeful" that a greenhouse gas emissions measure could be passed.

Support from big business and some evangelical groups may put the White House in a "position to accept a cap on carbon," if not actively push for one, Whitman said.

Whitman, who was governor of New Jersey prior to joining the Bush administration, now heads a coalition with a Greenpeace founder, Patrick Moore, that is pushing for further development of nuclear power. The group is called Clean and Safe Energy, or CASEnergy.

Nuclear power plants do not produce greenhouse gases, and any carbon cap likely would benefit the nuclear-power industry. The process of using nuclear power to produce electricity does leave radioactive spent fuel rods. A permanent repository in Yucca Mountain in Nevada is still in development.

Environmental groups such as the Natural Resources Defense Council, a member of the U.S. Climate Partnership, continue to resist governmental policies that encourage development of nuclear power, which could complicate efforts to pass a greenhouse gas emissions cap.

But Whitman said she has noticed a shift here, too. More environmental groups, while not yet accepting of nuclear power, seem more amenable to compromise.

"They are willing to talk. They haven't been in the past," she said.

Energy Rhetoric, And Reality (NYT)

New York Times, January 25, 2007

For six years, off and on, President Bush has been talking about the need for alternative fuels and conservation to make the country less beholden to unreliable sources of foreign oil. Yet all he has to show for it is a growing dependence on foreign oil, a growing climate problem and an increasingly cynical public. Mr. Bush talked the same game on Tuesday night, offering several impressively specific goals. But whether these new pledges turn out to be as empty as the old ones depends on his capacity for follow-through, and history is not encouraging.

Mr. Bush was true to form on one subject. The White House had promised nothing on global warming, and he delivered nothing. He mentioned “global climate change” but showed no sense of urgency on the issue. Nor was there any sign that he had even heard the ever-louder entreaties from Congress — and from many of his friends in the business community — that he support a national program of mandatory reductions in greenhouse gases.

At one point, he did suggest that his proposals for alternative fuels and more efficient automobiles could also help reduce greenhouse gases. But these gains would be marginal — passenger vehicles account for only one-fifth of these gases. And even these gains will greatly depend on what alternative fuels are chosen.

Mr. Bush’s enthusiasms mainly involved energy independence. He called for replacing 35 billion gallons of gasoline with renewable or alternative fuels by 2017, and for modest but steady improvements in the efficiency of cars and light trucks, a category that includes S.U.V.’s.

But he offered no specifics on where these 35 billion gallons in alternative fuels are going to come from. Corn ethanol, a favorite of farm state politicians, cannot be expected to provide more than 15 billion gallons without driving up food prices. Cellulosic ethanol, made from grasses and woody material, shows great promise. But there is no commercial refinery in operation today, and there is not expected to be one for several years. Hydrogen, a longtime Bush favorite, is even further down the road.

That leaves gasoline derived from coal, a method now being championed by governors and senators from coal-producing states. The technology is well established. But refining and then burning a gallon of gasoline derived from coal would send nearly twice as much carbon dioxide into the atmosphere as a conventional gallon of gasoline and would thus be a disaster for global warming. Trying to sequester the carbon dioxide underground during the refining process would be hugely expensive.

Which raises the next question about the Bush plan: Where’s the money coming from? Despite growing interest among venture capitalists in environmentally friendly technologies, it seems unrealistic to depend on the private sector alone. Washington must help. But federal research and development spending on energy has been in free fall for more than 20 years. And even after Mr. Bush made a big deal about cellulosic ethanol in last year’s address, he came up with only about $30 million in new money to help move the technology forward.

Once again, we have heard this president make big promises about energy independence. Once again, we fear that very little will change. It would be nice, for once, to be surprised.

Fuel For Thought (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

IT DOESN'T TAKE MUCH to get a standing ovation during the State of the Union address. One of President Bush's crowd-pleasers on Tuesday was a new energy policy designed to show his environmental side. It deserved no more than a golf clap. Nice putt, Mr. President. Too bad it took you 10 strokes to reach the green.

Bush's rigid attitude toward climate change is beginning to thaw, though not quite as fast as the polar ice caps. His ideas for reducing oil consumption were tougher than anything he's offered before, and his mandate for 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels by 2017 was a nice gesture. But his plan does much too little to make a dent in the carbon emissions that are fueling global warming.

Beyond the politically painless ritual of calling for more production of ethanol and other alternative fuels, it was mostly a rehash of past half-measures. And for the president to say he wants to step up oil production in "environmentally sensitive ways" by drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge indicates that he still doesn't understand the meaning of the phrase.

What's worrisome about the president's embrace of alternative fuels is that his policy fails to mention their comparative cleanliness. It's worth noting that "alternative" fuels are not the same as "renewable" ones; the former includes coal, which from a carbon-emissions standpoint is disastrous. Focusing on reducing oil consumption while ignoring emissions could do more environmental harm than good.

Another key Bush proposal is tightening vehicle fuel standards, a marvelous idea considering they haven't been improved in 20 years. But the president's approach is misguided. Currently, the average fuel economy of an automaker's entire passenger-car fleet has to be at least 27.5 miles per gallon. Rather than boost that standard, Bush wants to tie fuel economy improvements to a vehicle's weight class.

The Senate has a better solution. A bill introduced Monday would increase the average fuel economy standard by 10 mpg by the 2019 model year, setting the kind of target that will require prompt and significant change in Detroit.

Meanwhile, California's two Democratic senators, Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein, are backing competing bills aimed at reducing greenhouse gases. Feinstein's could stand to be tougher; it might let California power generators emit more than they could under state law. And Boxer should reconsider her unrealistic call for a whopping 80% reduction in greenhouse gas emissions from 1990 levels by 2050.

Still, in general the senators' approaches make more sense, environmentally and politically, than anything the president described Tuesday night. Somewhere in between their two bills — and outside the president's initiatives — lies a policy that can help the U.S. become both more efficient and independent.

Environmentalists Angry As Navy Gets OK To Use Sonar (FINDLAW/AP)

By Audrey Mcavoy, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2007

(AP) - HONOLULU-Angering environmentalists, the U.S. Defense Department exempted the Navy from complying with the Marine Mammal Protection Act for the next two years so sailors can practice tracking submarines with sonar.

Environmentalists on Tuesday said the Navy was not doing enough to protect whales, dolphins and other marine mammals from the harmful effects of the underwater sound technology.

Navy officials said they need the exemption, allowed for under the 2004 National Defense Authorization Act, to give them enough time to conduct environmental impact statements for sonar use at major underwater training ranges off Hawaii, southern California and the East Coast.

"We cannot stop training for the next two years," Don Schregardus, deputy assistant secretary of the Navy for the environment, told reporters. "That would put our sailors in the Navy at considerable risk."

Sailors use active sonar by pumping sound waves through the ocean and listening to the echo as it bounces off objects. Navy leaders have made practicing sonar techniques a top priority as other nations have bought more advanced diesel submarines, which are quieter than earlier models and harder to find.

But environmentalists cite incidents of marine mammals that have died or been stranded en masse on beaches after being exposed to sonar.

The Natural Resources Defense Council is suing the Navy in an attempt to force it to adopt more aggressive protection measures for marine mammals.

"The Navy has more than enough room in the oceans to train effectively without injuring or killing endangered whales and other marine species," Joel Reynolds, the organization's senior attorney, said in a statement. "Because the Navy trains with this dangerous technology in some of the richest underwater habitat on earth, it is legally obligated to take simple, commonsense steps to protect marine life."

The Navy says the new exemption will allow sailors to go ahead with 40 separate exercises over the next two years.

Cara Horowitz, another lawyer for the Natural Resources Defense Council, said the Navy could adopt a larger safety zone around its ships, reduce the power of sonar at night when marine mammal are harder to see, and avoid training in rich marine mammal habitats.

The Navy has argued there is not enough scientific evidence to mandate all the measures the council and other groups are demanding.

Court Rejects Senator's Bid To Eliminate Fish Agency (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

SEATTLE, Jan. 24 -- In a slap at the power of a single U.S. senator to change federal policy, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit struck down today an attempt by Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) to eliminate a small agency that counts endangered salmon in the Columbia River.

Craig tried to eliminate all funding in 2005 for the Fish Passage Center, which is based in Portland, Ore., and has 12 employees, because he said its data were "cloaked in advocacy."

The Fish Passage Center has documented how the federal Columbia-Snake River hydroelectric system has killed salmon and pushed several species to the brink of extinction. It is a primary source of information for the federal judge who oversees the protection of endangered salmon in the Columbia, as well as for fish agencies in Oregon, Washington and Idaho.

DOJ_NMG_0121606

Craig, who has received large campaign donations from the hydroelectric industry, has long regarded the center and its findings as suspect. He inserted a sentence in a spending bill that directed the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA), which sells power generated by federal dams, to stop funding the center, which has a $1.3 million budget.

The San Francisco-based appeals court said that the BPA "acted contrary to law in concluding that the congressional committee report language carried the force of law." It ordered the BPA to honor its contractual agreements to provide money to the center.

Through a spokesman, Craig said he was "disappointed" with the decision. He added that the implication that report language in a spending bill carries no weight with funded agencies "completely disrupts decades of congressional oversight and direction."

19 Arrested In Federal 'Ragdoll' Investigation (FRHN)

By By:John Moss, Herald News Staff Reporter

Fall River Herald News, January 25, 2007

FALL RIVER - Nineteen people have been charged in a multi-state drug trafficking ring in which the lead target of the federal investigation ran a drug distribution operation based in this city.

Seized in the investigation, in which four others from this city were charged, were several kilograms of cocaine allegedly sent through U.S. Mail.

Kevin J. O'Connor, U.S. Attorney for the District of Connecticut, announced Wednesday that a federal grand jury, sitting in Hartford, returned an eight-count indictment, charging the suspects with various narcotics offenses, involving the large-scale distribution of cocaine and heroin in Hartford, Bridgeport, Conn., Fall River, and other northeastern cities.

The indictment was returned June 29, 2006, and remained sealed to allow for the arrests. The case was subsequently unsealed, and, earlier this month, two of the remaining three fugitives were arrested. To date, 18 of the 19 charged have been arrested. Two of them have pleaded guilty.

The charges stem from an Organized Crime and Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation, dubbed "Operation Ragdoll," which was spearheaded by the Drug Enforcement Administration in Hartford.

As alleged in the indictment, from January 2006 to June 20, 2006, the lead target of the investigation, Luis Joel Soto-Solivan, also known as "The 27," ran a drug trafficking operation based in Fall River, which supplied narcotics to various distributors in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania.

Alleged distributors include co-defendants, Samuel Martinez, also known as "Muelo" and "Sammy," in Hartford; Jimmy Valentin in Brockton; Andres Hernandez, also known as "El Pelu" and "Andy," in Rochester, N.Y., and Domingo Guzman, also known as "Mingo," in Bridgeport, Conn.

Also, Guzman allegedly operated his own drug trafficking network based in Bridgeport that supplied narcotics to various wholesale distributors in Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Pennsylvania, including co-defendants Soto-Solivan in Fall River; Banger Vergara, also known as "Valdil" and "Bangel," in Holyoke, and Marcos Rivas, also known as "El Negro," in Pennsylvania.

According to the indictment, Carmelo Rondon Feliciano, also known as "Panzon," of Puerto Rico, supplied Soto-Solivan and Domingo Guzman with quantities of heroin and cocaine. One method that Rondon Feliciano allegedly used to ship narcotics was to send them from Puerto Rico to the continental United States, using U.S. Postal Service Express Mail. The indictment alleges that, from February 2006 through June 20, 2006, Feliciano and other suppliers sent at least 15 Express Mail packages believed to contain controlled substances to Soto-Solivan and Domingo Guzman.

On June 1 and 15, law enforcement officers with the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service intercepted and seized two of the express mail packages. The June 1 package was sent to Soto-Solivan at 25B Pleasant View, and contained two separately-wrapped kilograms of cocaine, and about 250 grams of a non-narcotic, cutting agent commonly used as a dilutant with cocaine. The June 15 package was sent to Domingo Guzman in Bridgeport, and contained two separately-wrapped kilograms of cocaine.

The investigation involved the use of wiretaps on cellular telephones used by Soto-Solivan and Domingo Guzman, as well as the controlled purchase of various quantities of heroin and crack cocaine from both individuals.

The investigation is a collaborative effort of the DEA, Fall River and New Britain, Conn., Police Departments.

The indictment charges the following defendants with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and distribution of, cocaine:

DOJ_NMG_0121607

Soto-Solivan, 34, of 275 Old Colony St.; Guzman, 30, of Bridgeport; Aurea Casiano, 53, of Chicago; Edgardo Diaz, also known as "Galdy" and "Orejas," 33, of Puerto Rico; Rondon Feliciano of Puerto Rico; Moises Figueroa, also known as "Indio," of Puerto Rico; Joel Guzman, 32, of Bridgeport; Andres Hernandez, also known as "El Pelu" and "Andy," 31, of Rochester, New York; Samuel Martinez, 30, of Hartford; Marcos Rivas, also known as "El Negro," Shirley Rivera, also known as "Sheila," 29, of Bridgeport, Conn.; Angel Santiago, also known as "Mambru," 34, of Pleasant View; Hector Santiago, also known as "Pito," 32, of Hartford; Joso Santiago, also known as "Neylom," 31, of Brockton; Angel Soto, 30, of 275 County St.; Wilmary Torres, 30, of 25B Pleasant View; Windy Torres, 27, of 7D Pleasant View; Jimmy Valentin, 29, of Brockton, and Vergara, 31, of Holyoke.

Also, a criminal forfeiture count seeks forfeiture of narcotics proceeds and items used to facilitate narcotics trafficking, including more than $100,000 in cash, and four motor vehicles with a collective value of more than $100,000.

The DEA in Connecticut arrested several suspects in June and July, and the DEA in Puerto Rico apprehended several in September and October. The DEA in Connecticut arrested Vergara in Massachusetts on Jan. 9, as he was appearing in state court to face trial on unrelated drug charges. Vergara was arraigned on the charge on Jan. 16 before U.S. Magistrate Judge Donna F. Martinez. After a detention hearing, Martinez entered an order detaining Vergara until trial.

On Jan 12, law enforcement officers in Chicago, served Casiano with the federal arrest warrant. She was arraigned on the charge Tuesday in New Haven, Conn., federal court. Casiano was released on bond pending trial.

Marcos Rivas is currently being sought by law enforcement.

As to Soto-Solivan, Domingo Guzman and Rondon Feliciano, the indictment charges that the conspiracy involved five kilograms or more of cocaine. If convicted, each faces a maximum term of life imprisonment, a mandatory minimum term of 10 years and a maximum fine of $4 million.

As to Hernandez, Martinez, Angel Santiago, Valentin, Diaz, Joel Guzman, Rivas and Vergara, the indictment charges that the conspiracy involved 500 grams or more of cocaine. If convicted, each faces a maximum of 40 years in prison, a mandatory minimum term of five years and a maximum fine of $2 million. As to Figuero, Jose Santiago, Soto, Wilmary Torres, Windy Torres, Casiano and Rivera, the indictment charges that the conspiracy involved a quantity of cocaine. If convicted, each defendant faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $1 million.

The indictment also charges Soto-Solivan, Domingo Guzman, Rondon Feliciano, Martinez, Hector Santiago and Vergara with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and distribution of, 100 grams or more of heroin. If convicted, each faces a maximum of 40 years in prison, a mandatory minimum term of five years and a maximum fine of $2 million.

In most cases, the filing of a second offender notice under the federal statute would double penalties.

The indictment also charges Soto-Solivan with three counts of distribution of heroin, which each carry a maximum of 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $1 million; and one count of distribution of 100 grams or more of heroin, which carries a maximum of 40 years imprisonment, a mandatory minimum term of five years and a maximum fine of $2 million.

Finally, the indictment charges Domingo Guzman with distribution of 50 grams or more of cocaine base ("crack cocaine"), which carries a maximum term of life in prison, a mandatory minimum term of 10 years, and a maximum fine of $4 million.

Last week, Jose Santiago pleaded guilty to a Substitute Information that charged him with using a communications facility to aid the conspiracy to distribute heroin. He is to be sentenced April 9, at which time Santiago faces a maximum of four years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

On Tuesday, Valentin pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute 500 grams or more of cocaine. Dorsey has set sentencing for April 12, at which time Valentin faces a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of five years, a maximum term of 40 years and a fine of up to $2 million.

As to the remaining defendants, O'Connor stressed that an indictment is only a charge and is not evidence of guilt. Each defendant is entitled to a fair trial.

O'Connor commended law enforcement agents and officers who conducted the investigation and praised their "devoted efforts to identify, disrupt and dismantle this substantial narcotics trafficking operation."

NFL Toughens Drug-testing Rules (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

After four months of negotiations, the league and union announces more extensive testing for performance-enhancing drugs and the addition of the blood-boosting substance EPO to its list of banned substances.

NEW YORK — The NFL is going deeper into the wallets of players who get caught using steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs.

After four months of sometimes intense negotiations, the league and union announced Wednesday more extensive testing for performance-enhancing drugs and the addition of the blood-boosting substance EPO to its list of banned substances.

DOJ_NMG_0121608

The union also agreed that players suspended after testing positive will, for the first time, forfeit a portion of their signing bonuses in addition to the salary they will lose during their time away. That is significant because the signing bonuses often are the only guaranteed portion of a player's salary and can be larger than salaries, which sometimes are kept artificially low to keep the team under the salary cap.

"It is important that the NFL and its players continue to be leaders on the issue of illegal and dangerous performance-enhancing drugs in sports," NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell said. "These latest improvements will help ensure that we continue to have a strong and effective program. As we have done in the past, we will review and modify the policy on an ongoing basis."

In addition to the new test for EPO, the agreement includes an increase from seven to 10 of the number of players on each team randomly tested each week during the season for steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. That means there will be 12,000 tests each season, up from the current 10,000.

The new policy will make the NFL the only North American sports league to regularly test for EPO. Urine will be tested, not blood, for EPO. Baseball did a round of urine testing for EPO in 2005. Rob Manfred, MLB's executive vice president for labor relations, said Wednesday there were no positives among the 500 samples tested.

Baseball conducts urine tests of major and minor league players for performance-enhancing drugs and stimulants, with each player tested at least twice randomly per year. Baseball does not conduct blood tests and does not test for EPO or human growth hormone. Baseball and its players union have agreed they will test for HGH if a urine test for that drug is validated.

A baseball player who tests positive for steroids is banned for 50 games for a first violation. A player who tests positive for stimulants is required to undergo counseling for a first violation and is subject to at least six additional tests over the next year.

The NBA randomly tests players four times a season. Players who test positive for steroids or performance-enhancing drugs get a 10-game suspension for a first offense, a 25-game ban for a second offense, a one-year suspension for a third offense and disqualification if they're caught a fourth time.

In the NHL, every player is subject to up to two random tests a year. A first-time offender gets a 20-game suspension without pay and mandatory referral to the league's substance abuse program. A second positive test carries a 60-game suspension.

The NFL policy mandates a four-game suspension for a first steroids offense and a year for a second. Unlike its policy for street drugs such as marijuana or cocaine, for which there is no suspension until a second violation, a player who tests positive for steroids or a supplement is suspended for the first positive test.

The enhancements to the drug policy have been pending for almost six months — from about the time Goodell succeeded Paul Tagliabue as commissioner. The league and union began negotiating on additional tests and substances in September, but didn't reach agreement until this week.

Those discussions followed congressional reaction to a story in the Charlotte Observer on steroid prescriptions given to Carolina Panthers players by a South Carolina doctor during the 2003 season.

"These changes show what sports leagues and their players' associations can accomplish when they set their minds to eradicating steroids from their sports," said Davis, who, as chairman of the Government Reform Committee in the last Congress led three hearings on steroid use among pro athletes.

"I especially want to commend the NFL which, out of all the sports leagues, has been the most consistent in its approach to testing and taking other steps to end steroid use among its athletes."

One provision of the new agreement increases the unpredictability of random testing during the season and off-season, making it harder for players using performance-enhancing substances to regulate their usage because they won't know when they might be tested.

EPO, which provides users more stamina by increasing their number of red blood cells, is used primarily by long-distance runners and cyclists. That testing will begin this summer when teams go to training camp.

The program also includes additional use of carbon isotope ratio testing on a random basis to detect for doses of testosterone. All players now will be subject to those tests, previously used only to confirm positive tests.

N.F.L. And Union To Strengthen Steroid Testing (NYT)

By Judy Battista

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

The National Football League and its players union said yesterday that they had agreed to strengthen the league's testing program for performance-enhancing drugs, including increasing the number of tests and adding endurance-boosting EPO to the list of banned substances.

DOJ_NMG_0121609

The new policy also adds financial penalties, with players who are suspended for drug use forfeiting part of their signing bonuses. Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the National Football League Players Association, said in an interview that as soon as next season, players who tested positive could also be barred from consideration for postseason awards. Such recognition became an issue during the regular season that ended last month when Shawne Merriman, a San Diego Chargers linebacker, was suspended for four games after a positive steroids test, but was named to the Pro Bowl.

The N.F.L. is considered to have the most stringent testing policy among the major American sports leagues. But loopholes in its program drew increasing scrutiny after The Charlotte Observer reported last summer that Carolina Panthers players had received prescriptions for steroids — including two players just days before the team played in the 2004 Super Bowl — yet none tested positive during that time period. The league and the union had been negotiating since September to strengthen the policy.

"These latest improvements will help ensure that we continue to have a strong and effective program," Roger Goodell, the N.F.L. commissioner, said in a statement. "As we have done in the past, we will review and modify the policy on an ongoing basis."

Under the policy changes announced yesterday, the number of players randomly tested each week during the preseason, regular season and postseason would increase to 10 from 7 per team. Last year, the N.F.L. increased the maximum number of times a player could be tested in the off-season to six times from two. Combined, those changes should amount to more than 12,000 drug tests administered to about 1,800 players next season, an increase of about 2,000 tests. Upshaw said that off-season testing would begin more quickly after the end of the regular season. That testing used to start in late March but will now begin in February to decrease the time period when players are not subjected to random testing.

The N.F.L. policy already mandates a four-game suspension for a first offense and a year suspension for a second, penalties that will remain in effect.

But the league will use the sophisticated carbon isotope test with greater frequency, it said. The use of that test has been limited in most drug-testing programs by its high price. It was previously used by the N.F.L. only to confirm positive tests. Now, the league will use it randomly on all samples. The test examines the atomic makeup of testosterone in the urine and can determine if it is natural or synthetic. It is the same test that found synthetic testosterone in a urine sample from Floyd Landis after his victory last summer in the Tour de France.

The N.F.L.'s decision to include EPO on its banned list adds a substance more common to cycling and long-distance running. EPO, or erythropoietin, is a synthetic hormone used to improve stamina by increasing the body's production of oxygen-rich red blood cells. No other professional sports league in the United States tests regularly for EPO.

The policy changes were praised yesterday by Dr. Gary I. Wadler, an associate professor of medicine at New York University who is a member of the World Anti-Doping Agency. But Wadler said in a telephone interview that the league still needed to include testing for human growth hormone, or HGH.

There is no reliable test for HGH. The N.F.L., pledged a minimum of $500,000 for the development of an HGH test yesterday. Wadler said that amount is a fraction of the millions of dollars the antidoping agency spent on research each year. Wadler said the league should have a provision in its collective-bargaining agreement that allowed for blood samples to be collected and frozen until a reliable drug test came to fruition. Blood collection, he said, would at least provide a deterrent to the use of HGH until a test was developed.

"They should at least have paved the way by saying that blood testing is an acceptable means of obtaining bodily fluid specimens," Wadler said. "They've made some moves in the right direction, but I don't think we should be in a position of incrementalism."

Upshaw remains adamant that blood testing is not open for discussion because there is no reliable HGH test. "I'm still not willing to have our players stuck like a pin cushion," Upshaw said. "What use would it be for you to find something out two or three years from now and we've already played games? We have 25 percent turnover each year. What good is that? It's almost like changing the speed-limit sign after you've passed."

NFL, Union Beef Up Drug Program (WP)

By Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The NFL and the players' union completed an agreement to strengthen the sport's steroid-testing program, they announced yesterday.

The modifications, which had been under discussion for months between Commissioner Roger Goodell and NFL Players Association chief Gene Upshaw, include an increase in the number of random tests to which players are subjected during the season, more extensive use of the sophisticated carbon isotope ratio test and the addition of the blood-boosting drug erythropoietin (EPO) to the list of banned substances.

DOJ_NMG_0121610

"It is important that the NFL and its players continue to be leaders on the issue of illegal and dangerous performance-enhancing drugs in sports," Goodell said in a written statement released by the league. "These latest improvements will help ensure that we continue to have a strong and effective program. As we have done in the past, we will review and modify the policy on an ongoing basis."

The changes come near the end of a season in which one of the top defensive players, San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman, served a four-game suspension for testing positive for a performance-enhancing drug. Merriman and his representatives said he ingested the drug, nandrolone, unwittingly because it was in a supplement he was taking.

Saying the new policy had a number of flaws, anti-doping expert Gary Wadler criticized the NFL for continuing to "sidestep" a major issue: that it oversees and carries out its own program instead of turning the business over to an independent agency such as the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency.

"I think it moves a little bit in the right direction, but you need to go the full way," said Wadler, a member of the World Anti-Doping Agency's prohibited substances committee. "The NFL was a pacesetter in anti-doping before 1999, when the landscape changed. . . . They should be a pacesetter again.

"They cannot keep up with the science. That's not their business. Their business is putting on great championships like we had last weekend."

In this round of modifications, the two sides agreed to increase the number of random tests from seven players per team to 10 players per team each week during the preseason, regular season and playoffs. Under the existing terms of the policy, every player is tested during training camp and a player can be tested as many as six times during the offseason. A first positive test results in the player being suspended four games without pay. A second positive test results in an eight-game suspension and a third positive test brings a one-year suspension.

According to the league, all tests now will be subject to random carbon isotope ratio testing to detect low levels of testosterone. Previously, such testing was used only to confirm positive tests for testosterone. Testing for EPO, a drug used to stimulate the production of red blood cells and more commonly associated with endurance sports, is to begin this year in the spring or summer, the league announced.

The league also announced that it was forming a working group to study issues related to human growth hormone; that it had awarded a grant of at least $500,000 to the UCLA Olympic testing laboratory and other researchers working to develop new methods to test for growth hormone; that it would take unspecified steps to enhance "the unpredictability of the year-round testing schedule"; and that, under the terms of the sport's labor agreement approved in March, it would make players automatically refund portions of their signing bonuses for violations of the steroid policy.

Growth hormone is on the NFL's list of banned substances, but league officials have said they don't test for it because there is no test they deem reliable. Upshaw has said he would not agree to allow players to be subjected to blood-testing for growth hormone.

NFL Notes: Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones interviewed Jason Garrett yesterday for the team's offensive coordinator job. Garrett, a former backup quarterback for the Cowboys, is the Miami Dolphins' quarterbacks coach. The Dolphins, according to an NFL source, granted the Cowboys' request to interview Garrett only after Jones agreed to make a decision by today as to whether he'd hire Garrett.

People around the league say they believe that if Jones hires Garrett, he's likely to hire Chargers defensive coordinator Wade Phillips as his head coach to replace Bill Parcells, who announced his retirement Monday. San Francisco 49ers offensive coordinator Norv Turner, the former head coach of the Washington Redskins and Oakland Raiders, also appears to be a possibility. He was the Cowboys' offensive coordinator before being hired by the Redskins and remains close to Jones. . . .

NFL, Union Agree On Tougher Testing For Performance Enhancers (USAT)

By Skip Wood, Usa Today

USA Today, January 25, 2007

The NFL and its union announced new standards and penalties for the use of banned substances Wednesday that include testing for EPO, believed to improve stamina.

POLICY PRAISED: Reaction positive

The league also will increase the number of randomly tested players on every 53-man team from seven to 10 each week, totaling 12,000 tests a season. First-time offenders will be suspended four games, and a second positive test results in a year-long suspension without pay. Under the new policy, suspended players will lose a prorated portion of their signing bonus.

"It is important that the NFL and its players continue to be leaders on the issue of illegal and dangerous performance-enhancing drugs in sports," NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell said in a written release. "These latest improvements will help ensure that we continue to have a strong and effective program."

That program does not include HGH, or human growth hormone, but the commissioner said he is "investing money for doing that." Blood tests are the reliable measure for HGH, and the players union has balked at taking blood from players.

Indianapolis Colts defensive end Dwight Freeney, who said he was randomly tested Wednesday, supports the new tests: "I'm a clean guy, so whenever you can catch some cheaters, it makes my job easier. ... Anything you can do for the integrity of this game is good, especially for the young people to know they have to do things the right way."

Goodell recently pointed out the new policy, effective immediately, no doubt will evolve.

"As we have done in the past," he said, "we will review and modify the policy on an ongoing basis."

Before the BALCO investigation, conventional thinking was that only endurance athletes benefited from EPO. But sprinters were also revealed to be taking the popular drug.

Column: NFL Steps Up With Drug Testing (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

Filed at 10:37 p.m. ET

Those more cynical about these things might question the timing. What better way to kick off Super Bowl hype, after all, than with a feel-good announcement about the NFL's new and improved drug testing program.

Take a closer look, though, and there's some real meat on the bone that the NFL served up during the traditionally slow media time leading up to Super Bowl week.

Sure, it may have taken a bit of prodding from some Washington politicians to get everyone moving. But give some credit to the league for twisting the arm of its always-wary players' association and coming to terms on a tougher plan.

Players will be tested more often, and it will be harder for them to cheat. When they are caught, they will fork over some of their lucrative signing bonuses as well as their weekly paychecks.

For the first time, players in a major professional sports league in the United States will be tested for EPO. And, also for the first time, the league is at least beginning to study how to deal with human growth hormone, which many say is the drug du jour among NFL players.

It's far from perfect, but it's the furthest any league has gone to make sure the playing field is level and that the people who pay the salaries aren't taken in by a bunch of cheaters.

Whether fans really care is another story.

They seem to care about baseball, where the revelations about Barry Bonds have made him such a pariah that even the San Francisco Giants seem to be having second thoughts about re-signing him. And neither Mark McGwire nor Rafael Palmeiro likely will ever be in the Hall of Fame.

Contrast that to the way the citizens of San Diego acted when their quarterback-busting linebacker, Shawne Merriman, was himself busted for steroid use and forced to sit out four games of the regular season.

Merriman returned to a hero's welcome, and a stadium filled with people wearing his jersey. So much for former commissioner Paul Tagliabue's theory that the risk of public humiliation would help stop some players from cheating.

Of course, Merriman didn't really cheat. He merely ingested a tainted supplement. That's his story and he's sticking to it, though he's been strangely quiet about just what supplement it might have been or how he got it.

Whatever happened, it cost Merriman four games and, quite possibly, the award as the league's best defensive player. You will still see him at the Pro Bowl, though, where his conversations with Miami defensive end Jason Taylor should be interesting.

"You really shouldn't be able to fail a test like that and play in this league, to begin with," Taylor said last month. "To make the Pro Bowl and all the other awards, I think you're walking a fine line of sending the wrong message."

Taylor's reaction aside, the 60 or so active players who have tested positive for steroids since the NFL first began testing have largely escaped the kind of wrath that engulfed the likes of McGwire, Bonds and Palmeiro.

That may be because football players are more anonymous on the field, one of 53 on a team and identified only by their numbers. Or it may be because it's harder to relate steroid use to statistics in football.

Common sense tells you that home run totals skyrocketed for some reason. But just because a linebacker is juiced doesn't mean he'll necessarily get more sacks.

DOJ_NMG_0121612

Still, the NFL deserves credit for being the first U.S. major sports league to begin testing for steroids in 1989, about the same time Jose Canseco was shooting up himself and who knows who else in the Oakland A's clubhouse and baseball was pretending performance-enhancing drugs didn't exist.

But the NFL system has always been a frail one, with players subjected to random testing on such an infrequent basis that many presumably were able to work their way around it. That became evident when the Charlotte Observer detailed how a doctor gave steroid prescriptions to players on the city's 2003 Super Bowl team.

The key to the NFL's upgraded program may be just how random the random tests are. Assuming they are truly random, every player in the NFL can be expected to be tested an average of four times during the season and up to six times during the offseason.

Add to that the EPO testing and the threat of forfeiting a percentage of signing bonuses -- which are often far larger than yearly salaries -- and it's hard to find a lot of fault with the league's new plan.

Sure, the suspensions could be tougher, and more substances could be tested. There could also be more of an urgency about HGH.

For now, though, there's nothing wrong with a feel-good story that feels pretty good.

Prosecutor Stepping Down: Kevin Ryan Confident He Did Job (USAT)

By Bob Nightengale

USA Today, January 25, 2007

Outgoing U.S. attorney trailed BALCO and Bonds

SAN FRANCISCO — Kevin Ryan peeks out the window of his spacious 11th-floor office at the Phillip Burton Federal Building in downtown San Francisco and, off in the foggy distance, can see the church steeple of St. Ignatius Preparatory College.

This is the site of his past. His future. In many ways, the origin of his crusade against steroids.

This is where he was a star high school running back three decades ago, hurling his body into the line 25 times a game. There was nothing fancy about his style, leading the West Catholic Athletic League in rushing. Oh, he was fast, captain of the track team, but at 5-11, 175, it was Ivy League Dartmouth recruiting him to play football. The football powers such as Southern California and Ohio State weren't interested.

"Kevin could have been a star," says Greg Suhr, the San Francisco deputy police chief and Ryan's childhood friend. "If he had used steroids or something like that, you're talking about another 25 pounds of muscle, more speed and a whole lot more recruiters. But he … played by the rules. You do the best with what you got. That's what he's always believed in.

"What he's doing now with BALCO, and Barry Bonds, and all of these guys who cheat, he's striking a blow for the good guys."

Ryan, the outgoing U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, has been lead prosecutor since the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative case broke in 2002. He and his staff have brought seven indictments and five convictions. He's not done yet.

"I think we have galvanized the national debate on this," says Ryan, 49, a San Francisco native. "We've engaged the public and Congress and the policymakers into addressing it, as well. It has had huge ramifications beyond the criminal sphere that we normally involve ourselves (with) … from the health effects, to talk of kids contemplating suicide, to the issue of cheating in sports, and that's a good thing.

"I think we've done our job."

It just might forever change the way the American public will view sports, too. "How can it not?" Ryan says. "People are better educated now about this issue, and whether you're a sports fan or not, I think people generally have the opinion that steroids should not have a place in sports."

Baseball, with a strong union that had adamantly opposed drug testing, now has what Commissioner Bud Selig says is the "most stringent steroid testing program in sports." A player is suspended 50 games for a first positive test. The NFL has toughened its drug-testing policies, including stricter guidelines announced Wednesday. Several track stars, believing their designer-drugs were undetectable, have been disgraced.

BALCO has been the case of a lifetime, says Ryan, who in the next few weeks likely will head off to private practice. He's one of 11 top federal prosecutors who have resigned or announced their resignations since a provision in the USA Patriot Act reauthorization last year enabled the U.S. Attorney General to appoint replacements without Senate confirmation.

"I think to ask U.S. attorneys to resign in the middle of a case is the wrong thing to do," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D.-Calif., said through a spokesperson.

Ryan doesn't acknowledge whether he was asked to resign, but he says he considered stepping down last July. He has one son who's a senior at St. Ignatius and another who's a sophomore. Yet he wanted to stay in office long enough, he says, to oversee several breaking cases outside sports, and, of course, BALCO.

"When I leave, this (investigation) won't just fall off the map," Ryan says. "If the opportunity presents itself in the future that I can still be involved in it, I'll avail myself to it. I'm not going to walk away from something that I feel strongly about."

Criticism and responses

Ryan continues to investigate Bonds for perjury and tax evasion, and the slugger's attorney, Mike Rains, will be happy to see Ryan leave. He accuses Ryan of being "an autocrat" who had a dysfunctional office because of his management style.

"I think he was a disaster as a U.S. Attorney," Rains says. "I have had dealings with him, none of them good, which probably puts me in the majority. Probably his greatest claim to fame is the BALCO thing. I think he screwed it up.

"If they somehow, some way, get a hold of Barry and indict him, they went about it in one of the most irresponsible manners I can imagine. … By all accounts, the Ryan-led BALCO team has been heavy-handed, overzealous and almost acted independently of the law."

Ryan's office also was accused by Rains and other lawyers of leaking grand-jury testimony, with transcripts appearing in the San Francisco Chronicle. Ryan denies any responsibility.

"I know we weren't the source," he says. "It bothers me when people point the finger at individuals without any evidence."

Despite charges of Ryan running a dysfunctional office that led to the departure of several attorneys, Rains acknowledges the lead prosecutor can take some pride in baseball's three-year-old steroid testing policy.

"Baseball probably did need to step up to the plate more than they had," Rains says, "and maybe he can take credit for that. But the media can enlighten people and change the attitude. You don't have to send overzealous prosecutors out to do that.

"In the pure prosecution sense, you wonder just how much has this man and his army spent so far just to get Barry."

Ryan says he doesn't know the cost of the case, but the argument is, he has done exactly what had to be done.

"Not everyone agrees with me," Ryan says. "But on a personal level, this was the right thing and it had the right impact. We're not conducting a poll here before we make a decision. We're doing our job under the guidelines of our department and we will continue to do so."

Roger Wirth, IRS special agent in charge of the Oakland field office which investigated BALCO, agrees with Ryan. "This case, and what Kevin Ryan has helped accomplish … has had a worldwide beneficial effect in the world of sports. He has helped get steroids out of sports. I haven't always agreed with every step of this investigation, and I'm not going to say we made every right move, but we've made an impact. A major impact."

Says Suhr: "Everybody sure seems to have gotten a whole lot smaller, haven't they?"

Baseball under scrutiny

Although NFL players, Olympic sprinters and even a world-class cyclist have been snared in the BACLO case, it's baseball, and the steroid probe centering on Bonds, that has grabbed everyone's attention, Ryan says.

"There's something about baseball and the American experience," he says. "I remember Field of Dreams, one of my favorite movies, and you take away just how important baseball is to our pastime and to our country and to many Americans. It has been there in good times and bad.

"Everyone recognizes that it's a business, and breaking records is good for business. But it's also a sport played under rules. Fans have a right to believe that things we see in this game are real and not a trick."

Last month, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Ryan's office can use the 104 positive steroid results that came out of Major League Baseball's survey testing in 2003. The results could lead to much more troubling evidence, ruining the legacy of plenty others.

The Major League Baseball Players Association has said the seizure of results violates players' Fourth Amendment rights. It has requested a full court review and said it might appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"The court has turned over evidence to us," Ryan says, "that we think is relevant to an ongoing investigation. It certainly opens up new avenues. … If the 9th Circuit allows us to keep it, it can be very helpful.

"Look, someone testing positive for drugs, no matter what it is, they got drugs from someone. Well, we'd like to know where they got it from. That's what we do. We follow the evidence."

Don't get Ryan started on the debate that everything was perfectly legal in baseball before its drug-testing program. Those who used steroids before 2003, he says, are just as guilty as the players caught today.

DOJ_NMG_0121614

"Those people are forgetting the fact that possession of controlled substances without a prescription is illegal," Ryan says. "The use of such substances by athletes — whether high school, college or on the professional level — is wrong. It violates the integrity of sports."

Remembers Alzado

Ryan, who grew up a die-hard San Francisco Giants and 49ers fan, still attends games and roots unabashedly for the Giants. Yet when asked if he hopes Bonds breaks Hank Aaron's all-time home run record, he smiles and politely declines to comment: "I'm not going to touch that one."

Ryan is careful not to speak directly about Bonds or BALCO. It's an ongoing case. Bonds' personal trainer, Greg Anderson, remains imprisoned for refusing to testify about Bonds. Ryan won't say whether they have evidence to indict Bonds without Anderson's testimony.

His first recollection of athletes possibly using steroids, he says, occurred in the 1980s when former Oakland Raiders defensive lineman Lyle Alzado was diagnosed with brain cancer.

"There was a lot of speculation at the time that it was related to steroid use," Ryan says. "We all remember the East German teams when the Olympics came around, but this was the first time I associated a big-name athlete with performance-enhancing drugs and the potential dangerous side effects."

Cheaters vs. regulators

Ryan, the son of Irish immigrants, became a naturalized citizen in 1969. He loves to hike with his wife, Anne, and go skiing in Aspen (where Bonds owns a home) with his two boys. He says one day he'll write a book. But he hopes there will be enough evidence in the coming months and years that will lead to further indictments and convictions, telling the story in court.

Ryan wonders if drug testing will catch up with the cheaters. The latest Victor Conte, founder of BALCO, could be around the corner. Surely, Ryan believes, there were plenty of other steroid labs that went undetected.

"How can you help but not wonder?" Ryan says. "If you listen to some of the chemists and folks that work on the medical side of this, there's a great concern that the basement chemists will continue to design steroids that are undetectable. The cheaters, if they want, will always be one step ahead of the regulators."

In the meantime, Ryan, Wirth and the hundreds of investigators and attorneys will be watching. They don't expect to catch everyone. Yet with the help of congressional leaders, Ryan says, cheating no longer will be tolerated.

"There's an honor system in sports, and people in sports have to abide by this honor system," Ryan says. "The parameters are in place now. The public is now expecting every sport to regulate itself.

"We've done our job. We should be proud."

BALCO Investigation Timeline (USAT)

USA Today, January 25, 2007

Key dates in various investigations of BALCO and athletes linked to the lab or punished for using THG and modafinil, two drugs that play a key role in the BALCO investigations. Does not include track and field doping cases not related to BALCO, THG or modafinil.

Jan. 18, 2007: House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich., and Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., ask the Attorney General to drop his subpoena against reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams.

Jan. 17, 2007: U.S. attorney Kevin Ryan, who is resigning, tells USA TODAY that the BALCO probe will continue. "When I leave, this (investigation) won't just fall off the map. The infrastructure is in place. We have good prosecutors on it. A good review process. Good institutional knowledge. So when I move on, there are those that can carry forward with it without a problem."

Jan. 11, 2007: Reports emerge that Barry Bonds tested positive for amphetamines during the 2006 season.

Dec. 27, 2006: Government investigators may keep evidence seized in 2004, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals rules.

Dec. 23, 2006: Prosecutors argue for a contempt-of-court sentence of up to 18 months for reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams.

Dec. 21, 2006: Yahoo! Sports says Troy Ellerman, a defense attorney who had worked for Victor Conte and James Valente, is under investigation in the FBI's probe of leaked grand jury evidence.

Dec. 14, 2006: Cyclist Tammy Thomas is indicted on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. Thomas, a former World Championship medalist banned for life in 2002 after a positive test for the steroid norbolethone, is accused of telling a grand jury she had not used steroids.

Sept. 21, 2006: Judge Jeffrey White tells San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams he will order them jailed for up to 18 months if they do not comply with his order to reveal their sources.

Sept. 6, 2006: A doping case against Marion Jones collapses when her "B" sample tests negative for EPO. Bother the "A" and "B" samples must test positive to incur a doping penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0121615

June 29, 2006: Olympic and world champion Justin Gatlin reveals that he has tested positive for testosterone. His coach is Trevor Graham.

June 22, 2006: E-mails seized by federal authorities identify Victor Conte, the convicted founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, as a source in the San Francisco Chronicle's reporting on the steroids scandal, according to an online court filing that accidentally revealed confidential information.

March 16, 2006: BALCO founder Victor Conte says he " never gave" steroids to Barry Bonds. Speaking to USA TODAY by phone from a California prison where his four-month sentence is about to end, Conte also does not directly address whether the San Francisco Giants slugger could have gotten steroids that someone else received from BALCO.

"My relationship with Barry Bonds was 100% about his nutrition," Conte says.

Conte also releases a statement to USA TODAY denying he gave Bonds steroids and denying statements attributed to him by federal investigator Jeff Novitzky on the day BALCO was raided, Sept. 3, 2003.

Feb. 24, 2006: Remi Korchemny is sentenced to one year of probation. ...

Oct. 18, 2005: BALCO founder Victor Conte is officially sentenced to four months in prison and four months of house arrest as part of a plea deal for his role as mastermind behind a scheme to provide professional athletes with undetectable performance-enhancing drugs.

James Valente, BALCO's vice president, received probation after pleading guilty to reduced charges of steroid distribution. Greg Anderson, Barry Bonds' trainer, was sentenced to six months after pleading guilty to money laundering and a steroid distribution charge. He will spend three months behind bars and three months in home confinement.

Anderson and Conte remain free on bond and are scheduled to surrender to prison authorities Dec. 1.

Oct. 16, 2005: 60 Minutes broadcasts an interview in which former football player Bill Romanowski says he used steroids and human growth hormone. He names Victor Conte as the source of the drugs.

Aug. 1, 2005: Baseball player Rafael Palmeiro, who emphatically denied steroid use before a House panel in March, is suspended for a positive test he later blames on a vitamin B-12 shot.

July 29, 2005: Track coach Remi Korchemny pleads guilty to reduced charges, a move that likely will keep him out of prison. The plea agreement, the fourth and final one in the case, ends a drug prosecution that prompted tighter testing rules in professional sports.

July 21, 2005: The Court of Arbitration for Sport rules Alvin and Calvin Harrison, along with Michael Johnson, Antonio Pettigrew and Jerome Taylor, may keep their gold medals from the 4x400 relay in the 2000 Olympics despite the previous decision to strip Jerome Young of his gold. Young, who ran in the first two rounds of the relay but not the final, had a positive test in 1999 in a case not known to be linked to BALCO. Young was later banned for life after a second drug offense. The Harrison twins have been punished for BALCO-related drug offenses, but these were not part of the investigation into the 2000 Olympic case.

July 15, 2005: Victor Conte pleads guilty to steroid distribution and money laundering in a deal with federal prosecutors. Conte will spend four months in prison and four months under house arrest. Greg Anderson, Barry Bonds' longtime friend and personal trainer, pleaded guilty to the same charges in exchange for a six-month prison sentence.

May 19, 2005: Michelle Collins' ban is reduced to four years as part of an agreement in which she drops her appeal.

March 17, 2005: Several current and former major league baseball players testifiy in front of the House Government Reform Committee on steroids in baseball. Mark McGwire, Jose Canseco, Curt Schilling, Sammy Sosa and Rafael Palmeiro were in attendance, while Frank Thomas testified via satellite. Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi were not required to attend due to their involvement in the ongoing BALCO case.

March 16, 2005: A USA TODAY survey shows that baseball players think steroids have had a substantial impact on the game.

Dec. 15, 2004: Marion Jones files a $25 million defamation lawsuit against BALCO founder Victor Conte, claiming damages from potentially lost endorsement deals after Conte claimed in two interviews that he saw Jones use several drugs before and during the 2000 Olympics. Jones later challenges Conte to take a polygraph test, something her defense team claims she has taken and passed.

Dec. 10, 2004: Michelle Collins gets an eight-year ban, later reduced to four, from a panel of members of American Arbitration Association and the North American Court of Arbitration for Sport. Collins never tested positive but was found to have used EPO, THG and a testosterone cream. She is the first athlete without a positive test to argue her case before arbitrators.

Collins also forfeits all results since Feb. 1, 2002, including her 200-meter world indoor championship in 2003. Lawyer Michael Coffield says he will appeal on Collins' behalf to the international Court of Arbitration for Sport before the end of the year.

Dec. 7, 2004: The International Olympic Committee says it will investigate Victor Conte's doping allegations against Marion Jones. IOC and WADA officials suggest that the three-year statute of limitations on challenging Olympic decisions may not apply.

Dec. 3, 2004: The San Francisco Chroniclereports more grand jury testimony, this time from San Francisco Giants star Barry Bonds. The Chronicle says Bonds admitted to unknowingly using steroids known as "the clear" and "the cream" during the 2003 season. Bonds said his personal trainer provided the steroids. The Chronicle also reported that prosecutors showed Bonds documents from 2001-03 alleging that he used various drugs, including human growth hormone and Depo-Testosterone. Bonds repeatedly has denied using performance-enhancing drugs. The report also says Bonds' former teammates Armando Rios, Benito Santiago and Bobby Estallella admitted to the grand jury that they used performance-enhancing drugs.

Also, BALCO founder Victor Conte appears on ABC's 20/20, claiming that he gave drugs to several athletes: track stars Marion Jones, Tim Montgomery and Kelli White; football players Bill Romanowski, Barret Robbins, Chris Cooper, and Dana Stubblefield. In ESPN The Magazine, Conte describes how he started in his business of legal supplements and gradually turned to steroids. Conte says he gave a steroid to Chryste Gaines, Alvin Harrison and Calvin Harrison in 1999, then started to provide Jones with various drugs a few weeks before the 2000 Olympics. He says he also started a doping program for Montgomery at the Olympics but later severed ties with Jones and Montgomery, only to get back into the doping business with White and Dwain Chambers. Conte says in the ESPN interview that he knew little about the baseball end of the business, which he says was in the hands of James Valente, but he says he gave drugs to Greg Anderson without knowing the purpose.

Dec. 2, 2004: The San Francisco Chroniclereports that in grand jury testimony, New York Yankees slugger Jason Giambi admitted injecting himself with human growth hormone in 2003 and using steroids that he obtained from Barry Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson, for at least three seasons. Giambi played only 80 games in 2004 because of a tumor, which the New York Daily News reported was in his pituitary gland; medical experts told the Chronicle that one of the drugs Giambi said he thought he had taken can exacerbate a tumor of the pituitary gland. The report also says Giambi's brother, Jeremy, used many of the same drugs.

Nov. 28, 2004: The United States is stripped of its 4x400-meter relay gold medal from the 2003 World Championships due to Calvin Harrison's second doping violation (see Aug. 2, 2004). One of Harrison's teammates was Jerome Young, who had received a lifetime ban earlier in the month for doping violations that had no known relation to BALCO, THG or modafinil. Harrison's other teammates to lose their world title are Tyree Washington and Derrick Brew, who are not linked to BALCO and are not facing doping charges.

Oct. 19, 2004: USADA announces that sprinter Alvin Harrison has accepted a four-year suspension for drug violations. Harrison admitted to the use of testosterone, THG, HGH and erythropoietin (EPO).

Oct. 11, 2004: Gary Sheffield tells Sports Illustrated that he was introduced to BALCO by Barry Bonds, with whom he has since severed ties. According to the magazine report, officials at the lab gave Sheffield a testosterone-based steroid known as "the cream" to be applied to a scar on his right knee. Sheffield says he didn't realize the "cream" was a steroid. Baseball officials say they will not punish the Yankees outfielder. Because of his association with BALCO, Sheffield was one of several high-profile athletes called to testify before the grand jury in 2003.

Sept. 24, 2004: Barry Bonds undergoes a random steroid test, which each major league is required to do under baseball's new collective bargaining agreement. "I'm glad this is finally happening," Bonds tells MLB.com. "They'll get the results and it will clear my name. It'll show that there's nothing behind what I've been doing (on the field) all year." Bonds goes on to lead the National League in batting average, slugging and on-base percentage on his way to winning a record seventh league MVP award.

Sept. 14, 2004: The NFL fines Chris Cooper, Barret Robbins and Dana Stubblefield three game checks each after the three current and former Oakland Raiders tested positive for THG. A fourth player, Bill Romanowski, is reported to have tested positive but has retired. The four are the only positive tests in the league. The three active players are also warned that any subsequent positive test will result in an eight-game suspension.

August 2004: Athens Olympics take place. No athletes test positive for THG or modafinil. Marion Jones, the only athlete under BALCO-related scrutiny to take part in the Games, finishes fifth in the long jump. Greek athletes Kostas Kenteris and Katerina Thanou miss drug tests under mysterious circumstances, miss the Games and are later linked to BALCO.

Aug. 2, 2004: USADA hands Calvin Harrison a two-year suspension for his positive modafinil test. Harrison's punishment is more severe than that given to other modafinil offenders because his is considered a second offense. As a junior sprinter in 1993, he tested positive for pseudoephedrine. The punishment also means the U.S. loses its 4x400-meter relay gold medal from the 2003 World Championships (see Nov. 28, 2004).

July 17, 2004: Regina Jacobs accepts a four-year ban and is stripped of her 2003 U.S. title at 1,500 meters. Jacobs says she wanted "to avoid being subjected to what I believe would be an unfair hearing."

July 9-18, 2004: Most athletes linked to the BALCO scandal fail to qualify for the Olympic team, sparing the U.S. difficult decisions on whether to proceed with athletes who might later be banned. Michelle Collins withdraws injured. Alvin Harrison finishes far behind in the 400-meter semifinals. Tim Montgomery reaches the 100-meter final but finishes seventh. Chryste Gaines is convincingly beaten in the 100-meter semifinals. Regina Jacobs retires. Calvin Harrison finishes fifth in the 400 and is named to the relay pool, but his suspension Aug. 2 renders the decision moot. Marion Jones, not officially charged with any doping offense, is the only BALCO-connected athlete to make the team, though she only makes the team in the long jump.

June 24, 2004: The San Francisco Chronicle reports Tim Montgomery told the grand jury that Victor Conte gave him weekly doses of THG in 2001. He testified that he used the banned substance for eight months before splitting with Conte in a money dispute. Montgomery also gave secondhand testimony in which Conte told him he had given Barry Bonds the steroid Winstrol. Attorneys for Montgomery and Bonds question the validity of the Chronicle report.

June 16, 2004: Marion Jones calls for a public hearing in an effort to clear her name and prevent drug allegations from keeping her out of the Athens Olympics. "I am not going to engage in the United States Anti-Doping Agency's secret kangaroo court. I will answer questions in a public forum that will be open for the entire world to see, hear and evaluate," Jones said. USADA says it is required to treat matters in confidentiality but that athletes are not bound by that requirement.

June 8, 2004: USADA confirms that it has sent letters to several track and field athletes notifying them of potential drug violations. The athletes are reported to be Tim Montgomery, Chryste Gaines, Michelle Collins and Alvin Harrison.

May 24, 2004: Marion Jones and her attorneys meet with USADA. Afterward, Jones' attorneys show the media some portions of evidence they say USADA contends links Jones to BALCO. The attorneys dispute that the documents pertain to Jones.

May 19, 2004: Kelli White accepts a two-year ban for use of undetectable steroids and EPO. She is eventually stripped of all results since Dec. 15, 2000, including her world titles in the 100 and 200 meters. White never tested positive for a substance other than modafinil; USADA cites evidence obtained from the BALCO investigation in announcing her ban.

May 17, 2004: A New York judge dismisses a suit brought by Regina Jacobs against USADA and USATF. Jacobs had sought to go outside the usual arbitration process.

May 15, 2004: Marion Jones reasserts that she is drug-free and threatens to sue if USADA imposes a sanction that's based on anything other than a failed drug test.

May 6, 2004: The Senate Commerce Committee turns over evidence from the BALCO investigation to USADA.

May 4, 2004: Kevin Toth receives a two-year ban for THG and modafinil use, USADA announces. The shot putter loses his 2003 U.S. championship and fourth-place finish at the World Championships.

April 29, 2004: Melissa Price and John McEwen receive two-year bans for THG use, USADA announces.

April 25, 2004: The San Jose Mercury News reports that a government memorandum from September claims Conte admitted providing steroids to 27 athletes. Conte's lawyer acknowledges the existence of the memorandum but denies that his client made the comments. The athletes listed include five baseball players (Barry Bonds, Gary Sheffield, Jason Giambi, Jeremy Giambi, Armando Rios), seven football players (Bill Romanowski, Dana Stubblefield, Josh Taves, Barret Robbins, Chris Cooper, Johnnie Morton, Daryl Gardener) and 15 track and field athletes (Marion Jones, Tim Montgomery, Regina Jacobs, Kevin Toth, Alvin Harrison, Calvin Harrison, Kelli White, Chryste Gaines, Eric Thomas, Michelle Collins, Ramon Clay, Dwain Chambers, John McEwen, Zhanna Block, Olga Vasdeki).

April 20, 2004: Chryste Gaines, Sandra Glover, Eric Thomas and Christopher Phillips are sanctioned for modafinil use. All receive public warnings and are stripped of results, including Thomas' U.S. championship in the 400-meter hurdles and Phillips' fifth-place finish in the 110-meter hurdles at the World Championships.

Feb. 24, 2004: British sprinter Dwain Chambers, who trained with Remi Korchemny, receives a two-year ban for taking THG.

Feb. 16, 2004: The USOC says Kevin Toth has tested positive for THG. All four U.S. athletes who had positive tests in 2003 are now officially named. Toth says he has retired, though he intends to fight to clear his name.

Feb. 13, 2004: Four men plead innocent to federal drug possession and distribution charges detailed in a 42-count indictment.

Feb. 12, 2004: Attorney General John Ashcroft announces a 42-count indictment against four men — Victor Conte, BALCO executive James Valente, track coach Remi Korchemny and trainer Greg Anderson, who has worked with baseball player Barry Bonds. Among the charges: conspiracy to distribute and possess with intent to distribute anabolic steroids, conspiracy to defraud through misbranded drugs, and money laundering.

Jan. 13-16, 2004: The USOC announces three more positive tests: Melissa Price (THG), Regina Jacobs (THG) and Calvin Harrison (modafinil). Though modafinil would be a lesser offense under the rules at the time, Harrison would face a two-year ban as a second offender.

Dec. 30, 2003: The USOC, following its protocol for releasing names 30 days after USADA's board says it will proceed in a doping case, announces seven positive tests. Six are track and field athletes linked to positive tests for modafinil: Kelli White, Chryste Gaines, John McEwen, Chris Phillips, Sandra Glover and Eric Thomas. McEwen also is reported to have tested positive for THG. All six athletes dispute the findings.

Dec. 7, 2003: The USATF approves a new "zero tolerance" policy that would include lifetime bans for first offenses on steroids, if such a ban is legal. The IAAF considers strengthening its first-offense penalty from two years to four, but legal questions arise for that move as well.

Fall 2003: Many athletes testify before the BALCO grand jury. Among those testifying: track and field athletes Marion Jones, Kevin Toth, Regina Jacobs, Chryste Gaines and Tim Montgomery; baseball players Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi, Gary Sheffield and Benito Santiago; football players Bill Romanowski and Barret Robbins; swimmer Amy Van Dyken; and boxer Shane Mosley.

Nov. 7, 2003: British sprinter Dwain Chambers is suspended pending a hearing after U.K. Athletics announces a positive B-sample for THG. Chambers is later banned for two years. Under British rules, he also faces a lifetime ban from the Olympics.

Oct. 22, 2003: USA Track & Field CEO Craig Masback says four U.S. athletes have turned up positive A-samples (the first of two samples examined in a given test) for THG. The number had been thought to be significantly higher. The athletes are eventually revealed to be shot putter Kevin Toth, middle distance runner Regina Jacobs, hammer thrower John McEwen and hammer thrower Melissa Price.

Oct. 21, 2003: The IAAF says it will re-examine all samples from the World Championships using the new THG test. By the time re-testing is complete, no new names are added to the list of positive tests. Samples from swimming's World Championships and the 2002 Winter Olympics also are re-tested, with no positive results reported.

Oct. 16, 2003: USADA releases a statement detailing its knowledge of THG. The agency says an anonymous coach provided the agency with a used syringe containing the substance, which was previously unknown. A lab at UCLA found that the substance was a steroid and quickly developed a test.

The coach pointed to BALCO's Conte as the source of the drug, the USADA statement said. USADA says it then contacted the Justice Department.

Sept. 3, 2003: Local and federal authorities raid BALCO offices.

Aug. 30, 2003: The IAAF announces that Kelli White, who won the world title in the 100 and 200 meters earlier in the week, has had an initial positive test for modafinil. The substance isn't specifically banned, but IAAF regulations allow for "related substances" to be added. Modafinil is eventually classified as a stimulant punishable by forfeiture of results and a public warning on a first offense, though several independent physicians dispute whether it is a performance-enhancing drug. WADA later takes steps to make modafinil punishable by a two-year ban, though that punishment will not be enforced for those who tested positive in 2003.

White claims that the drug was prescribed to treat narcolepsy and that she checked its legality with proper authorities. The doctor who prescribed the drug is Brian Goldman, a former medical director at BALCO.

Summer 2003: The first hint of THG emerges when USADA receives a tip and a used syringe containing a mysterious substance. The tipster is later identified as Trevor Graham, a sprint coach whose clients include Marion Jones, Tim Montgomery and Justin Gatlin.

2002: Federal investigation of BALCO begins.

Oct. 1, 2000: The U.S. Anti-Doping Agency begins operation. It assumes responsibility for drug testing that had previously been done by U.S. sports federations.

Sept. 26, 2000: The IOC and IAAF announce shot putter C.J. Hunter, Marion Jones' husband at the time, has tested positive on four separate occasions for the steroid nandrolone. Victor Conte appears at the news conference and said it's the result of a mislabeled nutritional supplement. Conte also said Jones was not taking the supplement. Conte accused of the IOC and IAAF of withholding information that could have helped Hunter avoid a doping offense, according to a BBC report.

1999: Marion Jones begins getting ZMA from BALCO. She says in June 2004 that she still takes the supplement but no longer gets it directly from BALCO.

DOJ_NMG_0121619

1988-1996: BALCO claims that many successful Olympic athletes from this period took its legal supplement ZMA, which contains zinc and magnesium.

1984: Victor Conte, a former bassist for Tower of Power and other bands, forms BALCO. He does chemical analysis on athletes using an ICP spectrometer, which is used in a variety of fields.

Coalition Meeting In Oakland Vows To Focus Gang Crime (SFC)

By Jason B. Johnson, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 25, 2007

OAKLAND -- A coalition of law enforcement, educators and civic leaders from 13 California cities meeting in Oakland today pledged to fight crime statewide by working together to address the root causes of street gangs.

Participants in the first California Cities Gang Prevention Network, which includes San Francisco, Oakland, Richmond and Los Angeles, said during a press conference at the Waterfront Plaza Hotel that the two-day conference would produce a blueprint that could be used nationwide by cities struggling with rising crime rates.

Oakland Deputy Police Chief Howard Jordan said he's looking for new ways to combat a surge in violence last year that resulted in 148 homicides, compared to 94 in 2005. About 38 percent of those murders were attributed to gang members.

Oakland had about 150 known gang members 10 years ago, compared to 1,500 today, Jordan said.

"We didn't spend nearly enough time on intervention as we did on enforcement. As a result of that we're changing our focus," he said.

San Jose Police Chief Robert Davis said he wants local law enforcement to do a better job of sharing information on different gangs and successful programs.

"We still don't have collaboration with other cities, and I think that's the piece that's missing," Davis said. "If we don't do that, then shame on us as a Bay Area community."

Davis said the increase in gangs now taking place in Oakland is similar to a surge in San Jose gang activity more than 10 years ago.

"If we see some of the problems in Oakland occurring that we saw in the South Bay 10 years ago, then shame on us for not helping," said Davis.

Teams of delegates will meet to outline procedures for sharing crime data and information on successful anti-gang programs. Cities represented at the conference also include Santa Rosa, San Diego, Stockton and Fresno. The main sponsors are the National League of Cities and the Oakland-based National Council on Crime and Delinquency.

Violent crime rose 3.7 percent nationally and 4.1 percent in California in the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period in 2005, according to FBI statistics.

And, 2005 saw approximately 30,607 more violent crimes than 2004, the largest single-year increase in violent crimes in 14 years, according to the FBI's 2005 Uniform Crime Report.

Gangs were involved in 56 percent of all crimes in the Western region of the country in 2005, according to the federal Justice Department's National Gang Threat Assessment.

"After years in which it looked like the crime problem was abating, it's starting to kick up again, especially in regard to homicides," said Barry Krisberg, president of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency in Oakland. "While this is a challenging development, it's also an opportunity to get things right."

Ex-ATF Agent Says She Feared Corrupt Cop (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 25, 2007

A former federal agent who alleges the Chicago Police Department protected corrupt officers and destroyed her career testified Wednesday that she feared for her life after confronting notorious former Officer Joseph Miedzianowski.

Diane Klipfel, a former agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, has sued the city and Miedzianowski, charging that Miedzianowski turned investigators against her after she tried to report that he had stolen from a drug dealer.

Miedzianowski eventually was arrested in 1998 for running a massive drug ring and was convicted of drug conspiracy and racketeering charges in federal court.

Klipfel's husband, ATF agent Michael Casali, also contends he was retaliated against by Miedzianowski.

DOJ_NMG_0121620

Lawyers for the city and Miedzianowski have denied the accusations and promised to show that the Police Department was not notified in a timely fashion that Miedzianowski might be corrupt.

Klipfel told jurors hearing the federal civil trial that she began to suspect Miedzianowski six years earlier, when he was working an ATF detail that targeted gangs and drugs. Agents and officers conducted a search at the home of a drug dealer, she said, and she saw Miedzianowski going through the dealer's pants and wallet.

"He was looking over to see if I was watching him," Klipfel said.

She told jurors the drug dealer later confided in her that Miedzianowski and some of his fellow officers were systematically stealing from him. She confronted Miedzianowski, she said, who became irate when she met up with him to discuss the allegation.

He cussed her out and kicked her car door, she said.

"It was beyond rage," she said. "He was like in a froth."

Later in an impromptu meeting at a convenience store with other officers to discuss the allegations further, Miedzianowski made more threats, she said.

"He said, 'Bitch, you're stupid,'" Klipfel said. "He said, 'There's four of us who will say you stole off this warrant'" and other warrants.

She said Miedzianowski went on to threaten to get her fired, and to say: "Think about your darling kids. We could light up your house."

Klipfel said in the coming months, Miedzianowski proceeded to make allegations against her that started a police internal affairs investigation and an internal probe at ATF. She was demoted and sent out of Chicago, she said, while Miedzianowski harassed her by paging her to call sex hot lines and the zoo.

She said she feared for the lives of her three children and had them sleep in a closet away from the windows, even moving them out of state for a time.

Klipfel could be cross-examined as soon as Thursday.

Berwick Woman Sentenced In Federal Firearms Case (FDD)

By Jennifer Keefe, Democrat Staff Writer

Foster's (NH) Daily Democrat, January 25, 2007

Bolduc was charged with making a false statement in the purchase of a firearm in New Hampshire in May 2006 as she showed a New Hampshire address on her ATF form, a document required by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives at the time of a firearms purchase.

It is a violation of federal law to make a material false statement in connection with the purchase of a firearm.

The .22-caliber revolver Bolduc purchased from Renaissance Firearms in Gonic, N.H., was later recovered in Somersworth, N.H., by police in connection with the May 2006 arrests of a 19-year-old Rochester man, a 20-year old Philadelphia, Pa., man and a 19-year-old Bronx, N.Y., man on charges of possession of 43 grams of crack cocaine and the .22-caliber handgun with ammunition.

Bolduc was sentenced Monday in U.S. District Court in Concord to six months of home confinement and two years probation.

Agents from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, together with the Somersworth Police Department, conducted the investigations leading to Bolduc's prosecution.

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Renews "Amnesty" Defiance (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

House Republicans opposed to amnesty vowed yesterday to fight President Bush's proposal to legalize millions of illegal aliens as outlined in his State of the Union address on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0121621

"The president worked hard to get a Congress that agrees with him on this and now he's got it," said Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, in reference to the Democratic takeover of both chambers of Congress in the November elections. "But we're still going to fight him on it."

Mr. Bush on Tuesday reissued his call to welcome foreigners with a guest-worker plan, and he called for a path to citizenship for millions of those here illegally.

"We need to uphold the great tradition of the melting pot that welcomes and assimilates new arrivals," Mr. Bush said in his speech to uneven applause. "We need to resolve the status of the illegal immigrants who are already in our country, without animosity and without amnesty."

More Democrats than Republicans rose in applause.

Mr. Tancredo, a longtime advocate of immigration reform, termed the refrain "same song, second verse."

"It's the same thing we've been hearing from the president for a long time," he said.

Rep. Sam Johnson, Texas Republican, called Mr. Bush's immigration proposal "empty and implausible."

"I'm sensing a real lack of commitment to combating illegal immigration," he said.

Mr. Johnson said he has seen little evidence in Texas that the administration's efforts to stop illegal entry are working.

"Our borders are out of control," he said yesterday. "Illegal immigrants are running free across the borders."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, welcomed "the president's renewed commitment" to comprehensive immigration reform.

"The president has been a leader on this issue and I am hopeful that he will continue his efforts with members of his party so that we can pass legislation that will solve the problem once and for all," he said after Tuesday's address.

For House Republicans, Mr. Kennedy's stamp of approval was proof that Mr. Bush does not share their concerns.

"Once again, we see the president is pushing amnesty," said Rep. Ed Royce, California Republican. "The president claims this is not amnesty, but the very definition of amnesty is changing someone's status from illegal to legal. As a matter of national security, we need an immigration system that is sound, and this one is not."

As evidence of its stand against illegal entry, the administration has announced raids on businesses that hired illegal aliens.

"I think they were just for the purposes of rhetoric so the president could say he was doing something," Mr. Tancredo said, adding that he has followed up with those employers and learned that the illegals have been almost entirely replaced with, presumably, legal citizens who had been looking for work.

"If these raids prove anything, it's that we do not need a guest-worker program," he said.

Mr. Tancredo said farmers are hiring illegals despite a federal guest-worker program already in place because of the cumbersome requirements to pay certain rates and provide certain living conditions.

"Why shouldn't they ignore it?" Mr. Tancredo said. "Their own government ignores it."

He said House Republicans have "lost a lot of momentum" since pushing through a bill last year to construct about 800 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"It's back to playing defense, I suppose, but that's a role I've played for six or seven years," he said.

Mr. Tancredo has announced the formation of a presidential exploratory committee, which he considers a good vehicle to continue his crusade while in the minority party.

He hopes to pull off a surprise victory on the presidential campaign trail and perhaps with an amnesty bill in the House.

"There are enough [conservative Democrats] to create a pretty significant problem for the new majority," he said with a broad smile. "A lot of them campaigned on our side of this issue and would have a lot of explaining to do back home."

TAX:

Tax Preparation Firm Banned From Practice (BUFFNEWS)

Buffalo News, January 25, 2007

Duffek, O'Connor & Associates of Hamburg can no longer legally prepare returns because an investigation showed that the firm prepared tax returns for clients that included deductions for "fictitious and inflated charitable contributions," the U.S. Justice Department said.

According to the Internal Revenue Service, the firm understated tax liabilities of its customers by more than $2 million.

DOJ_NMG_0121622

"[The] government alleged that the returns prepared by the defendants claimed fictitious and inflated employee expenses for such items as work clothes, teaching and coaching supplies, student and athlete rewards and cellular telephone expenses," the Justice Department said in a news release issued Tuesday.

According to the release, U.S. District Judge William M. Skretny issued a permanent injunction barring the firm, Brian Duffek and Patrick O'Connor from preparing federal returns.

The firm is no longer listed in telephone books and could not be reached to comment.

Rich States, Poor States (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

If you're searching for the next big thing in American politics, it's wise to keep an eye on the states. Here's one possibility: the abolition of state income taxes.

In Georgia, Missouri and South Carolina, Governors and state legislatures are drafting serious proposals to repeal their income taxes to promote economic development. St. Louis, one of America's most distressed cities, may overturn its wage/income tax as a way to spur urban revival. And in Michigan, the legislature is in the last stages of phasing out its hated business income tax -- the most onerous in the land. "States are now in a ferocious competition to attract jobs and businesses," says economist Arthur Laffer, who is advising several Governors and legislators on the issue, "and one of the best ways to win this race is to abolish the state income tax."

The timing for fixing state tax codes could hardly be more ideal because states are swimming in budget surpluses thanks to the booming national economy. This should be a big year for state tax cuts. Governors in Arkansas, Florida and West Virginia have already announced major tax relief plans for 2007. Even New York City has a $1 billion surplus and Mayor Michael Bloomberg is promising a property tax cut.

But the biggest target is the income tax. Newly re-elected South Carolina Governor Mark Sanford is talking of reviving his plan to phase out the income tax over 18 years. Mr. Sanford ran into opposition from the legislature in his first term, but he tells us that "I still consider this one of my top priorities and if the legislature wants to do it, I would be ecstatic."

Georgia may beat Mr. Sanford to the punch. House Republicans in Atlanta have announced that one of their top priorities is to use the half-billion-dollar budget surplus as a downpayment to "dismantle the current tax code." House Republican Majority Leader Jerry Keen tells us the debate in Atlanta is between a flat-rate income tax and a plan that would "do away with the personal income tax but broaden the sales tax by eliminating 107 exemptions. We're committed to a pro-growth tax plan that announces to the country that Georgia is open for business."

In Missouri the legislature is reviewing a plan by the state think tank, the Show Me Institute, that would increase the rate of the sales tax to 7.5% and limit spending growth to population plus inflation, in return for eliminating the state's income tax over 10 years. House Speaker Carl Bearden says "I would like to see a phasing out of our current tax structure in Missouri. . . . Eliminating the income tax can have a huge positive impact on a state's economy."

The idea of financing state services without an income tax is hardly radical. Nine states today -- Alaska, Florida, Nevada, New Hampshire, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Washington, and Wyoming -- manage well without one. With a few exceptions, the non-income tax states are America's most prosperous. Meanwhile, the high income tax states, which tend to be congregated in the Northeast, keep surrendering jobs, people, and voters to the South and West.

State lawmakers also seem to have learned from two of the most recent states to adopt an income tax: New Jersey and Connecticut. As recently as 1965 New Jersey had neither an income nor sales tax, but managed to balance its budget every year. Now it has both taxes -- its income tax is the 5th highest in the nation -- but the state is facing what Stateline.org calls a "staggering budget deficit." Allied Van Lines reports that the Garden State is now one of the leading places for people to flee.

The latest state to adopt an income tax was Connecticut in 1991, but a new report by the Yankee Institute reveals that the tax has been a calamity. The state has ranked last in employment growth since 1991, losing 240,000 of its native born citizens between 1991-2002. No other state has since enacted an income tax, and lawmakers in Georgia, Missouri and South Carolina say Connecticut is now the model for how not to run a state economy.

Whether these states will be able to eliminate their income taxes in the next few years is an open question. But what's undeniable is that the debate in state capitals has swung decisively in the direction of chopping income tax rates, not raising them.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Experts Examine Bush Health Plan (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Economists are still sorting out the implications of the broad health-care proposals President Bush unveiled this week, but already some clear winners and losers are emerging.

Families with generous employer-sponsored coverage would be worse off, while those who buy insurance on the individual market, or whose health plan costs less than $15,000 annually, would come out ahead. But some of the winners will probably become losers over time, analysts said.

Moreover, while Bush's plan would alter a historic imbalance in the tax code that favors generally better-off consumers who get insurance through their jobs, it also could undermine coverage for some sicker, older people and erode the employer-sponsored system that still provides coverage to more than half of all Americans.

Some experts questioned whether the plan would have any impact on holding down spiraling health costs or extending health coverage to some of the 47 million people in the nation who have none.

"It's not solving the uninsured problem and it's not solving the cost problem, so it's not really advancing what we need to have happen," said Karen Davis, president of the Commonwealth Fund, a nonprofit health policy research organization. "What it does is favor individual insurance. . . . The question is, should you try to undermine employer coverage? Employer coverage has lower administrative costs and it covers everybody in a firm, not just those who are healthy enough to pass a medical exam."

Bush would treat the contributions that employers make to their employees' coverage as taxable income, no longer exempting from payroll and income taxes the money workers use to buy health insurance.

Instead, the president would create a new tax break for everyone who buys health insurance, regardless of where they get it. The government would allow each family to deduct $15,000 a year from its taxable income to offset the cost of its policy; individuals would be allowed to deduct $7,500.

Democrats on Capitol Hill have panned the plan.

"The president's proposals are an opportunity missed," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said. "They will not improve access to good coverage and won't help working families afford the spiraling cost of health care."

Under the plan, which would take effect in 2009, winners would vastly outnumber the losers -- at least at first.

Families that spend less than $15,000 on their health coverage (either on their own or with an employer's contribution) would come out ahead, because the new deduction would apply to all of the money spent on premiums. A family that spends, $13,000 a year on health insurance could claim the full deduction. The administration says about 100 million people with employer-sponsored coverage would see their tax bills go down.

Other winners include the 17 million people who buy health insurance on the individual market, who would for the first time enjoy a tax break on the money they use to pay health premiums.

On the losing side are consumers with more expensive policies, especially those financed by employers, who would have to pay taxes on the money used to pay premiums exceeding $15,000. About 30 million people with employer coverage would see their tax bills go up in the first year, the administration says.

"You've got a Republican president willing to take from the rich and redistribute to the poor, which, symbolically, is a really big deal," said Thomas A. Scully, a former head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services under Bush. "It's breaking the ice to where the real source of revenue is and redistributing it from overinsured people to poor people. . . . The concept is a huge step in the right direction."

Advocates said the proposals would hold down health-care costs by motivating people to seek plans that cost $15,000 or less, and would help put basic insurance within reach of about 5 million of the uninsured. Still more people would gain coverage with the help of another Bush proposal to redirect some federal health money to new grants to assist states in finding innovative ways to cover the uninsured.

"It gives everyone a strong incentive to search for less-costly health care," said Mark B. McClellan, a health economist and former Bush adviser.

Other experts said the proposals were interesting but flawed.

The $15,000 deduction would increase annually with inflation, but health-care premiums typically rise faster. The administration estimates that in 2009, 80 percent of policies will fall under the $15,000 deduction.

After 10 years, though, only about 60 percent will, so more people would be hit by the tax, according to an analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a project of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute. The administration's own figures show the government losing as much as $40 billion in tax revenue in the first year but breaking even over a decade as more revenue rolls in.

Wealthier families who benefit from the deduction would get a much greater value than less-affluent families. The $15,000 deduction would be worth $5,250 to a family taxed at 35 percent but only $1,500 to one taxed in the 10 percent bracket. Moreover, more than half of the uninsured are too poor to owe any taxes and would see no benefit, according to an analysis by the conservative Tax Foundation. A more effective strategy, some said, would be to offer the poor tax credits to pay for health insurance, a strategy that Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said yesterday the administration has considered.

Others fear the plan would prompt more employers to drop health coverage and offer employees an immediate increase in wages to buy coverage on the individual market. But those plans tend to be more expensive, less comprehensive and harder to get for consumers who are already sick.

"We're tilting the playing field toward this very flawed market," said Robert D. Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute.

By Sandra Block

USA Today, January 25, 2007

Many workers with employer-provided health insurance sign up for a plan during annual enrollment and move on with their lives.

President Bush's proposal to provide a standard deduction for all who buy health insurance is intended to encourage workers and their employers to pay more attention to the cost of health care. It's also designed to make health insurance more affordable for the 47 million Americans who are uninsured.

The plan faces stiff political resistance. Some lawmakers in the Democrat-led Congress said they wouldn't even hold hearings on the plan, arguing that it would hurt many Americans who do have insurance coverage. But Bush's proposal has managed to focus attention on the uneven tax treatment of health care benefits.

Currently, employees aren't taxed on employer-provided health insurance. The self-employed can deduct the cost of a health insurance plan. But taxpayers who work for an employer that doesn't provide insurance can't deduct the cost of buying an individual policy.

President Bush's plan would address that by creating a standard deduction for all taxpayers who obtain health insurance. Taxpayers would receive a standard deduction of $15,000 for family coverage or $7,500 for single coverage. They wouldn't pay taxes on employer-provided insurance unless their insurance exceeded the deduction.

Individuals who buy individual policies would see their taxable income reduced by the amount of the deduction, even if they spent less on their insurance.

Q: Who would be the biggest winners under this plan?

A: Individuals and families who buy individual insurance plans because they're not covered by a plan at work would get a big tax break. The White House estimates that an uninsured family of four with annual income of $60,000 that bought private insurance would get a $4,545 tax break in 2009.

Healthy workers who decline their employers' plans in favor of an individual policy with lower premiums could also come out ahead, says Edwin Park, senior health policy analyst for the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. Those workers would still receive the full tax deduction, even if their premiums cost less, he says.

But critics say the plan would disproportionately aid high-income taxpayers, who have the most to gain from a tax deduction.

Unlike a tax credit, which is a dollar-for-dollar reduction in your actual taxes, a deduction cuts taxable income. As a result, a $15,000 deduction is more valuable to someone in the 35% tax bracket than someone in the 15% bracket.

Q: Who would be hurt?

A: Workers who are covered by employer plans could lose their coverage, critics say. The Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution, predicts that some small and midsize employers would drop their coverage.

Q: What about low-income people who pay no income tax?

A: They wouldn't get much of a benefit. The Tax Foundation estimated that the majority of uninsured Americans pay no income tax, so they wouldn't gain from the tax deduction.

DOJ_NMG_0121625

But the plan includes an exemption from Social Security and Medicare taxes for those who certify to their employers that they've bought an individual plan. Nearly all workers pay those taxes. A young uninsured worker who earns $20,000 wouldn't owe income tax, but she'd still save about $1,100 — enough to pay up to 70% of the cost of an individual plan, says Joseph Antos, an analyst at the American Enterprise Institute.

Q: If the proposal becomes law, how hard will it be to find a private insurance policy?

A: There's a lot of debate on this issue. Critics of the proposal say private insurers are primarily interested in insuring healthy people. Studies have found that individuals with even minor health problems, such as allergies, are charged higher premiums in the private market, Park says. And people with serious problems might not be able to obtain coverage at any price.

The AEI's Antos counters that greater demand for individual policies would spur competition.

Bush's Gambit On Health Insurance (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull, Gregory M. Lamb

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2007

With pressure building to reform America's healthcare system, President Bush has launched what may be his most ambitious bid to tackle the issue from a free- market basis.

Lately, the momentum has appeared stronger in another direction: States have been considering mandates on employers and individuals to purchase health insurance.

Mr. Bush, by contrast, wants to help more Americans get health coverage by creating new tax deductions. He's trying to wipe away a longstanding problem that America's tax code has nurtured: that health insurance is more affordable for large employers than for small employers or individual households.

Democrats in Congress say the president's idea is too little. And some analysts say that, coming seven years into his administration, it is too late.

Still, the debate over how best to contain spiraling costs and cover millions who are uninsured is far from over. Bush has made a bid for conservative ideas to be on the table as voters weigh this issue in the run-up to the next presidential election.

"I think it will help push [healthcare] further up the agenda in 2008," says Robert Blendon, an expert on health policy at Harvard University in Cambridge, Mass. "He sets the floor,... that government has some role in trying to deal with this and has to make some very substantial changes."

Political pressure for a healthcare fix has been mounting for several reasons. Costs keep rising faster than inflation. That's a problem for anyone paying for care, but for many employers it's a matter of global competitiveness. The rising cost of health benefits are one big reason, for instance, why US automakers are having trouble competing with foreign rivals. The soaring costs also mean that many small employers don't offer insurance. About 16 percent of Americans – 46 million people – lack coverage.

Three paths toward reform

The debate now includes three major paths down which America's health system can travel:

·Trying to preserve and improve elements of a free market, with competition and information for consumers holding prices in check. Call it the Bush plan.

·Mandating that all employers provide insurance to their workers, or contribute a share of their payroll to help government insure the workers. This is the path many states are taking.

·Shifting toward a single-payer system, the model in many developed countries, where Congress would expand a program like Medicare to be an insurance provider for all Americans.

Health insurance is currently a blend of federal, state, employer, and individually purchased coverage – and it's likely that the nation will maintain some form of hybrid system.

But with Democratic victories in last fall's election, momentum has shifted toward proposals that involve stronger government involvement.

In his State of the Union address Tuesday night, Bush acknowledged the need for Washington to do more, but he also tried to define a limit.

"Government has an obligation to care for the elderly, the disabled, and poor children," Bush said. "For all other Americans, private health insurance is the best way to meet their needs."

He outlined two major proposals.

One would be a standard tax deduction for health insurance, $15,000 for families, $7,500 for individuals. But health insurance that costs more than that – whether obtained through an employer or individually – would be considered taxable income.

In effect, this would help level a playing field in which employer-based insurance enjoys tax-free status, while individuals must buy insurance with after-tax dollars. This would save $4,500 for a family of four earning $60,000 a year, thus helping to put insurance "within reach" for more Americans, Bush said. The new taxes on those with high-end insurance would help offset the cost of this plan.

Second, he said the government should provide grant money to help states that are coming up with innovative ways to cover the uninsured.

Those could include states such as Massachusetts, which is seeking to achieve nearly universal insurance through a mandate that all individuals obtain insurance. In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger recently launched a similar proposal.

Support for leveling the playing field

Many healthcare experts support the notion of leveling the playing field, in terms of tax treatment, for employers and individuals.

And by taxing those with expensive insurance, it would counter the regressive nature of the current tax system. (As businesses deduct their healthcare expenses, top-tier workers with the costliest coverage are reaping the largest government subsidy.)

But many experts also say the plan does not go far enough. For one thing, they say, it won't result in coverage for most of the uninsured.

"We have to have a system of universal insurance coverage," says Henry Simmons of the National Coalition on Health Care, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group in Washington.

The coalition is one of several lobbying for more sweeping changes to expand coverage, control costs, and improve the quality of care.

Universal coverage could be achieved through mandates on employers or individuals, or through expansion of government programs, Dr. Simmons says.

Business groups, for their part, say they welcome a full debate of these and other options. But they are wary of a single-payer approach.

In part, that's based on skepticism of whether it will be effective at containing costs that are rising faster than overall inflation.

Some experts say the fast-growing spending isn't necessarily a bad thing. Medical technology and treatments are improving, they say, so it's natural that health spending has grown to about 16 percent of the national economy.

And they say that a single-payer system would reap big reductions in administrative costs.

But others note that countries with purely single-payer systems are not all happy with their systems, and some are trying to shift in a more market-oriented direction to curb costs and expand consumer choice.

In the US, the cost of Medicare alone promises to strain the federal budget in the years ahead, and even that program doesn't cover all health costs for the elderly Americans it serves.

"I have yet to hear a proposal coming out of the single-payer crowd [to address soaring costs] other than 'Trust me, things will be better,' " says Joseph Antos, a health policy expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

Dr. Blendon, at Harvard, predicts that Democrats won't generally push for a single-payer system. He expects a Democratic plan to extend public coverage to children, expand Medicaid, "but the rest of their efforts will be to get working populations into private coverages."

That leaves plenty to debate this year and beyond.

Bush Health Plan Shifts Onus To The Consumer (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang, Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

President Bush's proposal for easing the nation's health-care woes -- encouraging families to buy insurance on their own instead of relying on employer-provided insurance -- differs from approaches favored by Massachusetts and California as well as many Democrats in Congress.

In their bids to extend health-care coverage to millions of uninsured, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, both Republicans, aim to shore up existing coverage, which has been offered by fewer employers in recent years. The Massachusetts plan, which was supported by Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, requires all but the smallest employers to offer health insurance, or else pay an assessment to the state. In California, a similar requirement would compel employers that don't offer insurance to pay a 4% payroll tax.

Both states would require all residents to have health insurance, offering government coverage or subsidies to those who are without coverage through an employer.

Mr. Bush, in contrast, avoids mandates and instead would use the tax code to make individually purchased health insurance more appealing and affordable. In a break with the past, he would make employer-provided health insurance taxable, but create a tax deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for singles, for everyone who gets insurance, through work or on the open market. That is designed, the White House says, to be fair -- by treating individuals who buy insurance and now receive no tax break, the same as employees who are covered through their work and can exclude the value of the insurance from taxable income. Another part of the president's plan would help states extend coverage to the uninsured by diverting money from hospitals that care for the poor into state insurance pools.

"What you are seeing is indicative of sharp philosophical differences," said Robert Laszewski, a health-policy analyst. "One is to build on the employer-based system that most Democrats embrace and the other is to develop an entirely new system controlled by the consumer, not the employer," which many -- though far from all -- Republicans and the president endorse.

Whether Mr. Bush's plan will contribute to a further erosion of employer-sponsored health coverage was debated yesterday. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt told reporters that the president's plan will "absolutely not" have a negative effect on the employer-based system. Rather, he said, it does something that states can't: changes the federal tax code to help individuals buy health insurance. "I do not see employers leaving the employment-based system," he said.

Not everyone in the administration agreed. At a White House briefing on Tuesday, Joel Kaplan, deputy chief of staff for policy, acknowledged that the proposal could accelerate the trend of employers dropping insurance, but emphasized that workers left without coverage would, thanks to the new tax deduction, have the means to "buy insurance in the individual market in a way that they can't now."

Some employer and industry groups fretted about the proposal. Neil Trautwein, vice president of the National Retail Federation, said, "The fear is that if it becomes more attractive for people to decline employer coverage and buy on the open market, then you could get great spirals in the employer plans. I'm not convinced we should take away one of the pillars that has been supporting the health-care system."

Democratic lawmakers said that expanding government programs, not changing the tax code, is a cheaper, simpler way to lower the ranks of uninsured than relying on the individual market, where policies often are expensive and people with health problems have trouble buying coverage at any price. "With the individual market, people pay more for [policies]; they also pay for insurance company overhead. And [private insurers] traditionally discriminate against people with prior medical problems," said Rep. Henry Waxman, a California Democrat and a senior member of a House committee that oversees health-care issues.

Nina Owcharenko, a senior policy analyst for health care at the Heritage Foundation, said the Bush plan would complement states' effort to expand coverage: "The states control the regulatory structure of the individual market," especially for small businesses and individuals, and "this proposal is saying, 'How do we work together?' "

Ms. Owcharenko added: "This is trying to find a way to make sure there's a market for an individual so they can buy health insurance. Both can co-exist.

Michael Leavitt (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2007

Key elements of the domestic program President Bush unveiled in Tuesday's State of the Union address are aimed at helping cure Americans' discontent with the nation's healthcare system.

But getting the proposals through the Democratically controlled Congress will be a tough sell.

"A rigorous and robust debate is about to ensue on how to accomplish" the goal of providing affordable health insurance for all, says Michael Leavitt, Secretary of Health and Human Services. As part of the selling of the president's healthcare proposals, Mr. Leavitt spoke to a roomful of reporters at a Monitor sponsored lunch Wednesday.

A Gallup Poll conducted January 15-18 found Americans deeply dissatisfied about the US healthcare system. Seven out of 10 of those polled were dissatisfied with the availability of affordable healthcare. Half of those polled were dissatisfied with the quality of medical care. And more than six out of 10 are dissatisfied with the Social Security and Medicare systems.

In his address to the nation Tuesday, President Bush outlined two key health related proposals. First, Mr. Bush proposed a standard tax deduction for health insurance -- $7,500 for individuals and $15,000 for families. The administration argues the plan will make health insurance more affordable and level the playing field for those who buy insurance on their own rather than through their employer.

"For millions of other Americans who have no health insurance at all, this deduction would help put a basic private health insurance plan within their reach," the president said Tuesday evening.

"In my mind, it is simply indefensible for our country to have a tax policy that provides a tax benefit to part of our citizens and simply ignores the rest," Leavitt said. Currently, Americans who get health insurance through their employer pay no tax on the value of the insurance while those who buy insurance on their own get no tax break and pay for insurance with after tax dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0121628

The president also rolled out what the administration called an "Affordable Choices Initiative." Under the plan, states that provide poor and hard-to-insure citizens with basic health insurance will get additional federal funding to help cover the cost of the insurance. To come up with funds for this new program, the federal government would give less aid to hospitals that serve large numbers of Medicare and Medicaid patients.

The current approach "is not a very efficient system," Leavitt said. "There is a better way to deal with this. And our desire is to have a discussion in each state on how best to deal with charity care. We need a charity care system. There will likely be people who are uninsured no matter what system...But if you were able to insure half of those people who currently turn up uninsured, they would get better healthcare and there would be no reason for us to be sending the same amount of money to hospitals to care for people who don't have insurance."

Key Democrats show little enthusiasm for the president's proposals, especially the plan to offer a standard deduction for health insurance. House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D) of New York told the Associated Press, "This is a dangerous policy that ultimately shifts cost and risk from employers to employees and could result in a higher number of uninsured. " The influential chairman added, "the new Democratic majority in Congress is interested in relieving, not increasing, working families' tax burden."

Secretary Leavitt denied the plan was dead on arrival. "Now it may be the debate will begin to center on different proposals, perhaps it will be an offshoot of this one. But we need to have this debate. This is a problem ripe for solving."

Leavitt also denied that the president ducked on offering solutions to Social Security's and Medicare's long term financial problems. "There is a great deal of conversation going on right now with leaders of the Congress," on those issues, he said. "We are going to see a lot of discussion about both Social Security and Medicare."

While most of the conversation at the lunch centered on healthcare, Leavitt was also asked about the 2008 presidential race. A reporter mentioned a recent poll by the political newsletter Hotline that showed some voters are concerned about former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney's Mormon faith. Leavitt, a Mormon who served 11 years as governor of Utah, responded, that Mr. Romney "is going to emerge as a viable, well thought of presidential candidate and I think in time the question of his religion will turn out to be a curiosity for people and not affect his candidacy in a significant way."

Credit Offer (WP)

ONE OF THE tweaks that would make President Bush's new health-care proposal much more attractive would be changing the proposed tax deduction for those who purchase insurance to a tax credit. Yesterday, the day after the president unveiled the proposal in his State of the Union address, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt signaled the administration's openness to doing just that.

At a luncheon sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor, Mr. Leavitt said there were "redeeming tax policy features to using a credit" but that the administration had decided to "propose as a starting place" to use the mechanism of a standard deduction instead. That sounds like a door opening to us -- and a door skeptical Democrats ought to be willing to poke their heads through. Transforming the deduction into a credit would create a proposal that is fairer and that would do more to reduce the ranks of the uninsured.

Why? The Bush proposal would create a separate standard tax deduction -- $7,500 for individuals, $15,000 for families -- for those who purchase health insurance. While this would make the system more progressive than it is now, the deduction would still be worth far more to those in higher tax brackets. Conversely, a tax credit would treat all taxpayers equally: the $22,000-a-year factory worker would get the same break as a $220,000-a-year lawyer.

An even better approach, suggested in a thoughtful analysis by the Tax Policy Center of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute, would make the credit progressive (lower-income taxpayers would get a larger credit), refundable (taxpayers who don't pay enough taxes to reach the amount of the credit would get money back) or both.

Not only would a credit be more equitable, it would be more effective. Because it would be worth more to lower-income recipients, it would give them a greater incentive to purchase insurance, either by participating in employer-sponsored plans or by buying it on their own. There is the separate, and important, problem of making certain that insurance is available on the private market at an affordable price, but that does not diminish the fact that a credit is the preferable approach.

And consider this: In every previous budget, Mr. Bush has proposed a refundable tax credit for health coverage. Given Mr. Leavitt's apparent openness to change, why don't Democrats suggest modifying the president's plan to do just that?

Congress Office Forecasts Drop In U.S. Deficit (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121629

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted on Wednesday that the federal budget deficit would shrink again this year and could actually swing into a surplus in 2012 — but only if President Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010.

The agency predicted that the deficit for 2007 would decline to about $200 billion. It would be the third big annual decline in a row, and it would come even though spending on the war in Iraq is expected to remain high this year.

The decline of the deficit comes on the heels of unexpectedly large increases in tax revenue over the last two years and slower-than-expected increases in spending on Medicare.

Much of that increased revenue came from taxes on sharply higher corporate profits and big gains in the stock market, even though Congress reduced the tax rate on capital gains and stock dividends in 2003.

The agency's "baseline" estimate, one that assumes current law does not change, is that the deficit will decline to $172 billion this year, from $248 billion in the past fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30, 2006. As a practical matter, officials said, the actual deficit will probably be about $200 billion because of outlays for the war.

It is a rare piece of good news for President Bush, coming as he is struggling to persuade Congress to accept his strategy of sending more troops to Iraq and as his public approval ratings are at an all-time low.

White House officials boasted that the projections validated Mr. Bush's strategy of cutting taxes to stimulate the economy and ultimately generate higher tax revenues.

"Two years ago, the president laid out an ambitious goal to cut the deficit in half by 2009, and we met that goal three years early," said Rob Portman, the White House budget director. "We are now on a solid path toward the president's new goal to achieve a balanced budget by 2012."

But Congressional budget officials cautioned that the projections were not as sunny as they looked, in part because they assume that Congress will let President Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010, along with many corporate tax breaks, and will not try to shield millions of families from a big increase in their tax bills because of the alternative minimum tax.

Mr. Bush and most of his Republican allies in Congress have pushed to make the tax cuts permanent, rather than letting them expire at the end of 2010 as they are scheduled to do. Even some Democrats favor extending the tax cuts that benefit middle-income families.

Extending the tax cuts would cost the Treasury $1.4 trillion in the next 10 years and increase the deficit in 2017 alone by more than $400 billion.

Lawmakers in both parties have wanted to restrain the alternative minimum tax, a parallel tax that was aimed at only the richest families but has not been adjusted for inflation. If left unchanged, the alternative minimum tax is expected to engulf tens of millions of families with annual incomes of $100,000 and less.

Preventing an increase in the alternative tax would cost $1.2 trillion over 10 years and add more than $200 billion to the deficit in 2017, the budget office estimated.

Democrats countered that the fiscal picture remained bleak. "While any improvement in the deficit is a welcome development, today's report from C.B.O. is no cause for a declaration of victory," said Representative John M. Spratt Jr., the South Carolina Democrat who is chairman of the Budget Committee.

After factoring in the cost of tax cuts, Mr. Spratt said, the new report offered a "bleak reminder of how much current policy will need to be changed to return the budget to a fiscally responsible course."

The budget office tried to include costs of the war in its projections. But the baseline projection included only the $70 billion in "bridge" financing that Congress approved last year, and President Bush is expected to submit a supplemental request next month that could be more than $100 billion.

The agency estimated that actual outlays during the 2007 fiscal year would total almost $100 billion and add about $25 billion to the deficit beyond what the baseline estimate indicated. That estimate is consistent with others that war costs are running about $8 billion a month.

Congressional analysts had a more difficult time with war costs in 2008 and beyond. If the United States reduced troops in Iraq to 30,000 in 2010, from more than 130,000 today, the agency estimated, the spending on Iraq would be about $300 billion less than it assumes right now.

Over the long term, the Congressional Budget Office said, the real budget problem will be the surge in spending on Social Security and Medicare as baby boomers retire.

It echoed Ben S. Bernanke, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, who told Congress last week that the recent improvement in the budget was merely the "calm before the storm" and that the nation would face "draconian" choices between severe cuts in benefits and steep tax increases if it failed to act quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0121630

Likewise, the budget office said there had been no “substantial change” to the problems that lie a few years ahead. “Either a substantial reduction in the growth of spending, a significant increase in tax revenues relative to the size of the economy, or some combination of spending and revenue changes will be necessary,” it said.

Surpluses Could Be Just Promises (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — A day after President Bush pledged to balance the federal budget by 2012 without raising taxes, Congress' budget agency said it probably can't be done.

In a report that will guide this year's debate on spending and taxes, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) on Wednesday projected budget surpluses beginning in 2012 only if current laws and policies remain the same.

The president and Congress, however, are seeking tax changes that would wipe out the projected surpluses and drive up the deficit by hundreds of billions of dollars. Those changes include extending Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and preventing millions of taxpayers from being hit by the alternative minimum tax, which increases taxes on people with large deductions.

In addition, the report warned the White House and Congress that the future growth of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security threatens to unravel deficit-reducing initiatives. By 2050, federal spending on the two health care programs alone would equal 20% of the nation's economy, up from 4.5% today.

"The central long-term problem facing the federal government is health care," said Peter Orszag, the agency's new director. "It is implausible that economic growth alone will eliminate the nation's long-term fiscal imbalance."

Arguments between the White House and Congress over how to erase large deficits dominated budget debates throughout the 1980s and most of the '90s. As a share of the economy since World War II, the deficit peaked in 1983 at 6%. Deficit-reduction agreements in 1990, 1993 and 1997 reduced the red ink, but it took the strong economy of the late 1990s, symbolized by a booming stock market, to create a surplus.

It didn't last long. After four years, recession, war and Bush's tax cuts combined to produce deficits, which peaked at $412 billion in 2004, or 3.6% of the economy. Since then, a surge in corporate tax receipts has helped shrink the deficit to $248 billion, according to the CBO's figures; the White House estimate is $296 billion.

Bush will deliver his proposed 2008 budget on Feb. 5. In Tuesday's State of the Union address, he vowed to balance the budget by 2012 "without raising taxes. What we need to do is impose spending discipline."

In the short term, the CBO report offered some good news. It projected that the deficit would drop to about $200 billion this year and about $100 billion in 2008, partly due to savings in federal health care programs such as Medicare's new prescription-drug coverage. Those numbers will change depending on the cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as other spending and tax decisions.

The White House seized on the short-term estimates Wednesday. "We are now on a solid path toward the president's new goal to achieve a balanced budget by 2012, while making the tax cuts permanent and better constraining spending," said Rob Portman, the White House budget director.

Democrats focused on the longer-term projections. "The estimates from CBO become a bleak reminder of how much current policy will need to be changed to return the budget to a fiscally responsible course," said House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt, D-S.C.

It's A Balanced Budget Or Tax Cuts, Report Says (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush can balance the budget within five years, or he can get Congress to extend his tax cuts beyond their scheduled expiration, the Congressional Budget Office reported Wednesday — but probably not both.

Bush has said otherwise, committing himself in Tuesday's State of the Union address, as he did earlier this month, to providing Congress on Feb. 5 with spending and tax proposals for fiscal 2008 that would put the budget on a path toward balance by 2012.

"We must balance the federal budget," Bush said Tuesday night. "We can do so without raising taxes."

The nonpartisan CBO, in its annual report on where current spending and tax policies would take the budget over the next 10 years, did not contradict Bush in so many words. But its tables painted an unmistakable picture of a budget that needed an extra infusion of cash or a sharp reduction in outlays if revenue were ever to exceed spending.

DOJ_NMG_0121631

And even if the budget could be balanced by 2012, said Peter R. Orszag, the CBO's director, the retirement of the baby-boom generation could quickly unbalance it: Not only would the wave of retirees force the government to spend more for Social Security, Medicare and other benefit programs, he said, but it would drain the population of taxpaying wage-earners.

Republicans in Congress saw the report as portraying a potentially bright budgetary future.

"Congress is within reach of balancing the budget without raising taxes if significant entitlement reforms are enacted within the next five years," said Rep. Paul D. Ryan of Wisconsin, the top Republican on the House Budget Committee

Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, who ranks second in the House GOP leadership, was more enthusiastic. "Tax relief has spurred unprecedented economic growth," he said, "and these results prove that we can balance our budget without raising taxes."

To Democrats, the fiscal outlook was much gloomier. Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad of North Dakota said the CBO must base its projections on current spending and tax law, without regard to likely changes. And currently, he said, the Iraq war is underfunded — the administration is expected soon to ask for an additional $100 billion for this year — and the tax cuts that Bush wants made permanent are due to expire at the end of 2010.

When the budget office's projections are adjusted for these and other factors, said Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.), chairman of the House Budget Committee, the result is "a bleak reminder of how much current policy will need to be changed to return the budget to a fiscally responsible course."

Liberal and conservative budget analysts took the Democrats' slant. Brian M. Riedl, lead budget specialist at the right-of-center Heritage Foundation, said the new numbers implied that balancing the budget by 2012 without increasing taxes meant that federal spending could be $294 billion greater in 2012 than 2007. But in that period, he noted, Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid costs would rise by $367 billion.

Under current law, if the tax cuts expire as scheduled at the end of 2010, the budget would swing nearly to balance in 2011 and show a $170-billion surplus in 2012, the CBO estimates.

But that would occur only if Congress allows the tax cuts to expire. Such a decision — far from a forgone conclusion — would generate $268 billion in revenue in 2012. Without it, there would be a $100-billion deficit.

The budget office said other likely tax actions — notably, continued relief from the alternative minimum tax, which increasingly hits middle-class taxpayers instead of just the very wealthy — would add $160 billion more to the 2012 deficit.

On the spending side of the budget, substantial troop reductions in Iraq could save $43 billion in 2012. But that could be more than offset if Congress let domestic appropriations, which Bush has targeted for no increase even for inflation, grow as fast as the combination of economic output and inflation. Altogether, the policy changes identified by the CBO could turn the 2012 surplus of $170 billion into a deficit of $245 billion.

For What It's Worth, CBO Sees Zero Deficit (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The federal budget deficit will fall to $172 billion this year and $98 billion next year, then disappear completely by 2012, according to a report released yesterday by the Congressional Budget Office. But virtually nobody -- not even top CBO officials -- believes it.

That is because the CBO, the nonpartisan office that supplies Congress with cost estimates, is required to make some whopping assumptions, including: that all of President Bush's tax cuts will expire on schedule in 2010; that the alternative minimum tax will be permitted to ensnare millions of additional taxpayers; and that the war in Iraq and other military operations will never cost much more than the $70 billion that has so far been approved for the fiscal year that ends in September.

Back in the real world, even Democrats want to extend at least some of the Bush tax cuts. Even the White House wants to halt the expansion of the alternative minimum tax. And, as for global war efforts, the president is calling for an additional 21,500 troops to be sent to Iraq and is expected to ask Congress to approve an additional $100 billion for this year alone.

Add it all together, and the deficit would be about $200 billion this year, according to the CBO -- down from the $248 billion deficit recorded in fiscal 2006 and a big drop from the $413 billion spending gap the government racked up in 2004, the largest ever in dollar terms.

But the deficit would climb back up to $275 billion in fiscal 2008, according to Democratic budget leaders, who are just starting work on the 2008 budget. And by 2012, the deficit would be back in the $300 billion range, Democrats said, with the national debt climbing higher and a projected explosion in Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid costs right around the corner.

"You have to acknowledge this is good news. It will make it easier for all of us to bring the budget into balance over a reasonable length of time," House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.) said of the positive changes in CBO's official estimates. "But this is no time to get euphoric."

DOJ_NMG_0121632

Both Spratt and Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) have vowed to bring the budget into balance by 2012, as has the president. Bush is scheduled to deliver his five-year budget plan to Congress on Feb. 5.

In a statement, Bush's budget director, Rob Portman, hailed the CBO projections as further evidence that the nation is "on a solid path toward the president's new goal to achieve a balanced budget by 2012."

But Portman told reporters that the White House, too, is projecting larger immediate deficits than the CBO foresees. He said the president's fiscal 2008 budget will include some expensive items left out by the CBO, including a permanent extension of the business tax credit for research and development and, perhaps, a plan to hold the number of households hit by the alternative minimum tax steady at about 4 million for another year.

"Our number will be a little higher than theirs because we make different assumptions. But we'll be consistent in our ability to reduce deficits and balance the budget by 2012," Portman said, adding that the president's plan predicts a surplus in 2012.

In a briefing at the CBO's offices, new director Peter R. Orszag acknowledged that the numbers "may not conform to what many people expect will actually happen in the future." But the CBO is required to make projections based on current law, not on conventional wisdom or even political reality, Orszag said.

For that reason, the CBO's 173-page budget outlook includes a chart titled "Budgetary Effects of Selected Policy Alternatives Not Included in CBO's Baseline" that makes it possible for people to assemble their own budget projections.

Tax Decisions Could Affect Deficit Outlook (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Congressional budget experts said the fiscal 2007 deficit could fall to $172 billion if current policies remain in place, down from $248 billion in 2006, but the gap could worsen depending on how Congress addresses several looming tax-policy decisions.

The Congressional Budget Office projections exclude the cost of an anticipated $100 billion war supplemental-spending bill. If that money is approved, CBO expects about $25 billion of it will be spent in 2007, bringing the year's deficit to about $200 billion, according to new CBO Director Peter Orszag. Fiscal year 2007 began Oct. 1, 2006.

Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman said the president's budget will likely result in a higher deficit for fiscal year 2007 than predicted by CBO. "Our number will be a little higher than theirs," Mr. Portman told reporters. "But, it will be consistent with the broad theme of reducing deficits and [reaching] balance by 2012," Mr. Portman said. President Bush will continue a U.S. military buildup while offering a package of entitlement cuts as part of a plan to balance the budget by 2012, a senior administration official said yesterday.

CBO sees the deficit dropping to $98 billion in 2008 and, after a brief increase in 2009 and 2010, leveling out in 2012 and turning into a surplus. Aiding the decline is that revenue is projected to grow an average of 5.2% over the next 10 years and as much as 7% in 2007.

However, CBO's deficit projections assume that the tax cuts enacted by Mr. Bush are allowed to expire in 2010 and that the alternative minimum tax, which is expected to ensnare 33 million Americans by 2010, isn't fixed. Making the tax cuts permanent, which Mr. Bush has requested, would inflate the deficit by about $1.9 trillion over 10 years, according to CBO. Fixing the AMT, which was intended to capture high-income earners but has begun to hit the middle class because it wasn't indexed for inflation, would increase the deficit by $569 billion over that same period.

Mr. Orszag also warned that the favorable outlook suggested by the 10-year projections "doesn't alter the long-term fiscal imbalance" caused by the ballooning costs of entitlement programs such as Medicare and Social Security. Medicare and Medicaid alone are expected to grow from 4.5% of gross domestic product to 20% by 2050, as health-care costs increase and an aging work force begins collecting benefits.

CBO said either a substantial reduction in the growth of spending, a significant increase in tax revenue or some combination of both would be "necessary to promote long-term fiscal stability."

CBO Projects Deficit Of $172 Billion In '07 (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

The Congressional Budget Office said yesterday that this year's federal deficit will be $172 billion, far smaller than last year's tally, and that the budget is on track to be balanced by 2012 without any action or interference from Congress or the president.

But the CBO cautioned that the short-term number doesn't include $30 billion in expected war costs, and that the long-term picture is unlikely to materialize because it assumes giant tax increases with the expiration of President Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and with the growth of the alternative minimum tax. Congress and the president have promised to cut at least some of those taxes.

"When these adjustments are made, the estimates from CBO become a bleak reminder of how much current policy will need to be changed to return the budget to a fiscally responsible course," said House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr., South Carolina Democrat.

The figures set the stage for Mr. Bush, who will present his fiscal 2008 budget early next month. That fiscal year begins Oct. 1.

Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said Mr. Bush will show a higher deficit in 2007 and different projections for later years because he makes different assumptions. Mr. Portman said a key difference is that the administration's budget will assume the tax cuts do not expire.

Still, he said Mr. Bush's budget also will show declining deficits and a balanced budget in 2012.

"Congress should be encouraged by this news, and I am optimistic that we can work together -- across party lines -- to keep the economy strong and spend taxpayer dollars wisely," he said.

The good fiscal news is thanks mostly to extraordinary revenue growth, rather than spending cuts.

Although Mr. Bush has touted a promised balanced budget by 2012, the CBO's projections show the balance would be achieved without any help from Mr. Bush -- as long as he didn't propose deeper tax cuts or more spending.

The CBO projects a $170 billion surplus in 2012, after a deficit of $12 billion the year before. The 2006 deficit was $248 billion.

In 2011, the CBO projects, the federal debt will peak at $5.4 trillion before declining as the budget comes into balance.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said that however good the news, it is still a long way from the huge surplus projected for 2007 when Mr. Bush took office six years ago.

"The reality is that this CBO projection represents a $750 billion deterioration in the budget outlook for fiscal 2007 from the one President Bush inherited when he took office," Mr. Hoyer said.

The CBO report included a warning about the long-term picture, with the aging population putting more stress on Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security.

"Either a substantial reduction in the growth of spending, a significant increase in tax revenues relative to the size of the economy, or some combination of spending and revenue changes will be necessary," the report concluded.

War Costs Extend Budget Deficit Gap (AP)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2007

Budget estimates released Wednesday showed some improvement in the deficit but gave little solace to Democrats struggling to match President Bush's promise to balance the budget.

The new forecast from the Congressional Budget Office put the deficit for the current budget year reaching about $200 billion after factoring in Iraq war costs. Last year's deficit was $248 billion.

Both the White House and the top Democratic budget writers welcomed the improved outlook, but difficult disagreements remain over how to close the gap.

The CBO, a nonpartisan agency that provides lawmakers with estimates of the budget and the costs of legislation, said the budget could run a $170 billion surplus in the 2012 fiscal year.

That figure, however, assumes Congress will let Bush's tax cuts expire at the end of 2010, effectively raising taxes on income, inheritances, married couples and parents.

The Bush administration releases its budget Feb. 5 and promises it will be balanced by 2012 without any such tax increases.

White House budget director Rob Portman met on Capitol Hill with a group of moderate House Democrats and claimed such lawmakers as allies in the president's effort.

"This notion that you have to raise taxes to achieve balance ... is no longer the environment or the scenario," Portman told reporters.

He said Bush's budget would achieve balance with improved but still "cautious" estimates of tax revenues. They probably will be more optimistic than the CBO's estimates.

Bush has one significant advantage in the upcoming debate. In designing his budget, Bush can assume his changes are put in place. He does not have to consider the political difficulties of getting the Democrat-controlled Congress to go along with cuts to hospitals and other Medicare providers and new fees on airline passengers and veterans seeking health care.

DOJ_NMG_0121634

The chairman of the House Budget Committee, Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., and his Senate counterpart, Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., have the difficult job of trying to advance a budget that unites politically fractious factions of their party.

Their task is made even tougher because the CBO's figures understate the true magnitude of the nation's fiscal woes.

Not included, for example, are the future costs of modifying the alternative minimum tax to head off a revolt by middle-class taxpayers.

Extending Bush's tax cuts and changing this tax would swamp the projected surplus for 2012 with $425 billion in lost revenues and interest costs, according to CBO figures.

Spratt and Conrad say factoring in such costs presents a truer picture of the 2012 deficit at $313 billion. That would guarantee wrenching choices for lawmakers promising to erase the deficit.

The CBO's new projections credit revenue increases and lower costs for federal health care programs for the bulk of the improvements to this year's deficit.

Just last July, the White House predicted a $339 deficit for 2007. The CBO's new director, Peter Orszag, based his $200 billion prediction by combining the agency's baseline deficit of $172 billion with about $25 billion in additional war spending.

Bush is expected to send Congress a Pentagon request for about $100 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan, but only $25 billion or so will actually be spent before the Sept. 30 end of the current budget year, Orszag said.

Like virtually all of his predecessors, Orszag sees troubling signs in the long term. Rising health care costs and the looming retirement of the baby boom generation promise to swamp the Medicare program unless Congress steps in with politically painful tax increases and or benefit cuts.

"Some combination of either spending reductions, revenue increases or a combination of the two will be necessary to bring the nation's long-term fiscal house in order," Orszag said.

Roll Call, January 25, 2007

In an apparent attempt to head off conservative Republicans intent on restraining Congressional spending, Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) is circulating a memo warning that without increased funding for some programs the federal government may have to lay off or furlough thousands of key homeland security, consumer safety and health care personnel.

With the current stopgap funding measure set to expire Feb. 15, Byrd and House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.) are gearing up for a fight with Republicans over how to make sure that 13 Cabinet agencies, Congress and countless independent government agencies continue to operate for the remainder of fiscal 2007, which ends Sept. 30. Congress already has approved fiscal 2007 funding for the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

The current continuing resolution freezes federal spending at fiscal 2006 levels, and conservative Senators such as Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) have pushed to keep the government funded at 2006 levels for the remainder of the fiscal year to trim as much as $7 billion from the discretionary spending budget.

But the Byrd memo predicts that if Congress maintains those levels for the remainder of fiscal 2007, “it would result in thousands of layoffs in the public and private sectors; it would cut off health care for members of America’s Armed Forces; and it would close the doors to medical care for thousands of our veterans.”

One skeptical Senate GOP aide said the memo is just hyperbole from appropriators who consistently resist efforts to rein in Congressional spending.

“This is like the appropriator who cried ‘wolf’ in the sense that they say this year after year whenever a CR is put in place,” the aide said. “The wild accusations they make never come to pass.”

DeMint said on the Senate floor Jan. 11 that appropriators could not be believed.

“You will notice, despite what has been said, we passed a continuing resolution at the end of last year and didn’t pass our appropriation bills. Of course, as you look around, you see the country is still operating just fine,” DeMint said. He added, “I would make the case we need a system that, if we are not able to have ample debate and discussion about appropriations, we don’t have all this fanfare about closing down the government every year and scaring our senior citizens and our veterans that something is not going to come that they need.”

Still, Byrd’s memo provides a useful window into the programs and government offices likely to see modest increases in a $463 billion 2007 joint spending resolution, which could be on the House floor as early as next Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0121635

For example, the memo warns that the Food Safety and Inspection Service would have to begin furloughing its entire staff beginning the first week of September, an action that could result in the shuttering of 6,000 meat and poultry processing plants across the country because FSIS staff would not be on site.

The document does not say how much money it would take to keep the FSIS up and running through the end of September.

Meanwhile, Byrd's office estimates that the FBI would be $80 million short, face a yearlong hiring freeze, and have to fire some special agents, intelligence analysts and other support staff if forced to operate under fiscal 2006 funding levels.

Similarly, the daily operations budget of the Army Corps of Engineers would face a $22 million shortfall — requiring the Corps to fire 250 of its 900-person staff, according to Byrd's office. And the federal judiciary would have to trim its staff by 2,500 — a scenario that could affect parole officers' capacity to track convicted felons, the memo noted.

The Social Security Administration would have to furlough 65,000 employees for more than a week if the $180 million projected shortfall under 2006 levels were allowed to continue, the memo asserts. Plus, the 1-800-Medicare call center likely would have to close down for the "final months of the fiscal year," the document says.

The biggest ticket item in the memo, however, is the $3.2 billion needed to shore up veterans' medical care — a figure that has been known for months.

Though the memo plays up the impact of funding shortfalls on national security, the elderly and veterans health care, a number of priorities championed by the new Democratic majority are highlighted as well.

Bush Proposes Broadening The No Child Left Behind Act (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24—The Bush administration called on Wednesday for an array of changes to the president's signature education law. The proposals would give local school officials new powers to override both teachers' contracts and state limits on charter schools in the case of persistently failing schools.

The proposals are part of the administration's blueprint for revising the No Child Left Behind Act, which Congress is scheduled to renew this year. Margaret Spellings, the education secretary, said the goal was to provide students in failing schools with other options and "to make sure we have our best personnel in the neediest places."

President Bush signed the No Child Left Behind Act into law in 2002. It requires schools to test students in reading and math annually in grades three to eight, and establishes progressively more severe penalties for schools that fail to make adequate progress, including shutting the schools altogether.

Administration officials said there were currently about 1,800 of these schools across the country, where students have failed to meet state targets for reading and math for more than five years. But they said that loopholes in the current law allowed them to avoid serious action indefinitely.

"We all have to answer the question what are we going to do about that," Ms. Spellings said in a telephone news conference. "This is the president's answer to, Is the promise of No Child Left Behind real?"

She said that allowing local officials to close failing schools and replace them with charter schools would give children new options. Charter schools are publicly financed but freed from many of the regulations that apply to traditional neighborhood schools.

In 26 states, including New York, there are limits on how many charter schools can be opened. Critics point to a lack of consistent research showing charter schools are any more effective than traditional public schools in raising achievement.

Ms. Spellings said local superintendents would also be helped if they could transfer teachers in their districts to help improve poorly performing schools, even if union contracts banned such moves.

Edward J. McElroy, president of the American Federation of Teachers, derided the proposal as "silly on its face," adding, "I have a feeling they're setting up a straw man just to knock it down."

While allowing for "areas of agreement" with the president's blueprint, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who is chairman of the education committee, said he was "disappointed that the administration has proposed circumventing state law" with its proposal on charter schools.

In the House, Representative George Miller, the California Democrat who is chairman of the education committee, rebuffed the administration's move to allow superintendents to override contracts, which he called a "proposal to gut collective-bargaining agreements."

DOJ_NMG_0121636

Separately, he rejected the administration's call for school vouchers. President Bush proposed, as he has every year since taking office, taxpayer-financed vouchers to allow children in struggling schools to transfer to private schools.

"Private school vouchers," Mr. Miller said, "have been rejected in the past, and nothing has changed to make them acceptable now. They are the same bad idea they have always been."

Other administration proposals seemed likely to be more acceptable, among them: a call for a federal fund that would give extra pay to teachers who are most effective in raising children's test scores, or who agree to teach in the neediest schools; and allowing districts with failing schools to first offer children tutoring before allowing them to transfer.

The administration also proposed requiring states to publicize how their students perform on a national exam, known as the nation's report card, side by side with student performance on state exams. The move is intended to pressure states to make their own standards more rigorous.

Congress will consider the president's blueprint as it takes up hearings to renew the law this spring. But with the presidential race taking shape, it is not at all certain that Congress will complete the job this year.

In moving to update the law, Congress and the administration are threading their way through discontent from across the political spectrum, from teachers unions upset that the law's testing requirements are dictating what teachers do in the classroom to conservatives who say education should remain a purely local matter.

Michael J. Petrilli, an Education Department official in Mr. Bush's first term who recently called the law "fundamentally flawed," said the administration's proposals represent "a pretty decent repair attempt."

"It's 50 percent stay the course, 30 percent tweak and tuck, and 20 percent bold new ideas," Mr. Petrilli said.

He added, "Not bad for a president with 33 percent approval ratings, though the package as a whole has about a zero percent chance of getting through Congress."

Bush Proposal Revives Private-school Vouchers (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, January 25, 2007

On the heels of the State of the Union address, the Bush administration unveiled its education wish list Wednesday. It proposes more leeway for administrators to move good teachers into poorly performing schools and would provide a $4,000 check for students who would rather leave the public system for private school.

Under the plan, school districts would be required for the first time to send parents a "report card" showing how students do both on state skills tests and on a more rigorous national test. In many states, the majority of students meet state standards but not national requirements.

The move could force schools to toughen coursework in math and reading.

Among other proposals, the plan would:

·Allow students with poor skills to get federally funded tutoring earlier, even if a school isn't required to offer it to all students.

·Give schools more flexibility with federal money. For instance, money intended for safety programs could be spent on reading or teacher training.

·Allow a more generous measure of student progress, giving credit for year-to-year gains even if children don't meet rising benchmarks.

A controversial proposal would allow supervisors to move talented teachers to struggling schools even if a union's collective bargaining agreement forbids it. The law now prohibits such moves if they conflict with union contracts. Spellings says the plan is a tool "to get these best people in the neediest campuses."

Edward McElroy, president of the American Federation of Teachers, says the union "would oppose any federal intervention" in local contracts. The move may not get better teachers into struggling schools but could drive good teachers out, he says. "This is a whole area where we need thoughtful study rather than people setting up straw men and knocking them down."

The proposal to allow students in persistently failing schools to use about $4,000 in federal money to attend a school of their choice faces steep odds. Congress has killed similar plans in Bush's budget each year since 2001.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., who chairs the Senate education committee, says he'll look closely at the administration's ideas: "I am sure there will be areas of agreement." But, he says, "I am disappointed that the administration has once again proposed siphoning crucial resources from our public schools — already reeling from increased requirements and budget cuts — for a private school voucher program."

Spellings says she'll "fight hard" for the vouchers and the rest of the plan.

"I see this as a very vigorous package of proposals that are sound and make sense when they are taken together," she told reporters Wednesday.

Spellings Stands Firm On 'Real School Choice' (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said yesterday the administration will fight tenaciously for a few key changes to its signature education law, including helping children in chronically failed public schools to attend private schools instead.

During his State of the Union speech Tuesday, President Bush called on Congress to renew one of his key domestic accomplishments -- the No Child Left Behind Act -- this year, and the administration yesterday laid out its suggestions, including new requirements for high schools, a new focus on science, and aggressive restructuring tools for schools that have failed to make progress during the past five or six years.

Mrs. Spellings told editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday that she thinks a bill to renew the law will be ready to move through the Senate education panel by March or April.

"We must be much more aggressive and much more vigorous about those restructuring notions, including offering real school choice to the kids on those campuses," Mrs. Spellings said. "We've given them a chance, we've given them resources, and it's time for us to say '[The law] is a real promise and other options have to be brought to bear.' "

Top Democrats, such as Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, chairman of the Senate education panel, immediately balked at the school-choice provisions, while indicating agreement in other areas. Democrats' top goal is to secure a steep funding boost for the law, and Mrs. Spellings indicated the administration will use that as a bargaining chip.

"What levels of funding are calibrated to what levels of reform I think is the discussion we'll have this year," Mrs. Spellings said. "But you bet I am going to fight for these policies."

She said funding details won't be released until Mr. Bush sends his budget to Capitol Hill in the coming weeks.

Mr. Bush's proposal for renewal wouldn't change the bulk of the five-year-old law, which mandates that students be able to read and do math at grade level by 2014, and requires that states set standards and administer annual tests.

But Mrs. Spellings said she has "never been involved in the passage of a perfect bill," so some changes are needed.

The administration's proposal adds science to the list of subjects tested, requiring students to reach grade-level proficiency by 2020. It also would set more tests and requirements for high schools, such as collecting better graduation-rate data and partnering with colleges to develop English and math curricula that better prepare students for the workplace.

Meanwhile, conservatives on Capitol Hill have worried the administration will try to dramatically expand the law, either with more funding, by mandating new requirements for high schools, or both.

Some Republicans in the Senate and House want to keep the law's high standards in place but let states enter a five-year performance agreement with the federal government in exchange for less regulation and more flexibility in how they would use federal dollars and would track their progress.

The administration's proposal doesn't go that far, though it does give states more flexibility in how they spend their federal education dollars.

Mrs. Spellings said she has spoken with some of these concerned conservatives and is open to more discussion, as long as the core requirements of the law aren't watered down. But she also said there will be some degree of increased education funding this year.

Among its more contentious suggestions, the administration proposal would allow more aggressive action to be taken when a school has consistently failed to make progress for several years. Currently, chronically failing schools must offer their students the option of another public school or after-school tutoring.

But if a school fails to meet improvement standards repeatedly, which Mrs. Spellings defined as five or six years, the new proposal would give each child about $4,000 to take to another public school or a private school. It also would allow superintendents in these areas to convert the schools into charter schools even if a state's charter-school limit has been reached. Superintendents also would be able to break union contracts in order to move teachers within these schools.

In communities with several failing schools, the administration proposal also would offer scholarships for pupils to attend private schools.

Democrats have argued that these struggling schools need more money in order to meet the law's tough requirements.

House education panel Chairman George Miller, California Democrat, slammed the school-choice idea yesterday, saying it "didn't pass muster when Republicans controlled the Congress, and it certainly won't pass muster now that Democrats do."

DOJ_NMG_0121638

Mr. Miller said he'd consider some of the administration's ideas but added "we won't know if the president is seriously committed to the law until we see his budget."

Feds Try To Build On No Child Left Behind Act (PPG)

By Eleanor Chute, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 25, 2007

Changes proposed to help students in struggling schools

Five years after the signing of the No Child Left Behind Act, which raised the stakes for standardized testing, the Bush administration has released its plans for the next chapter.

The administration's wish list includes keeping the hallmarks of the law -- school accountability based on standardized tests in reading and math -- and making changes to increase its reach, flexibility and ability to improve the lives of students in chronically low-performing schools.

In a conference call from Washington yesterday, U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced the administration's priorities, called "Building on Results: A Blueprint for Strengthening the No Child Left Behind Act." In his State of the Union address Tuesday night, Mr. Bush urged Congress to improve the law -- "without backsliding" -- and to reauthorize it.

Proposed changes include:

Holding schools accountable for achievement on science tests, beginning in 2008-09 at three grade levels, with all students to be proficient by 2019-20.

Expanding on the use of growth models, which look at how much a student grows in a school year, not just the final score, to judge schools.

Providing vouchers -- worth an average of $4,000 per student -- to enable students in chronically low-performing schools to transfer to private or other public schools. The money would include both federal Title I money and newly created Promise Scholarships of $2,500 per student.

Setting up "Opportunity Scholarships" within set geographical areas to help students attend private schools through a local scholarship program.

Fostering charter schools, with the department supporting "all viable charter applications that improve academic outcomes" even if the number exceeds any caps states have.

Permitting school administrators in the most troubled schools to transfer teachers as they see fit despite any collective bargaining agreement to the contrary.

Requiring states to develop by 2010-11 course-level academic standards for English and math that "prepare high school students to succeed in college and the global workplace."

Ms. Spellings emphasized the desire to keep the "core principles," which include having all students proficient in math and reading by 2014 and using annual tests and results broken down by race, income and other factors to hold schools accountable.

In a written statement, Pennsylvania Education Secretary Gerald Zahorchak said the department "supports the fundamental purpose of the act," but the proposal has "some vague areas where the details will be critical to the success of the implementation."

Amy Wilkins, vice president for government affairs and communication at The Education Trust, which works for equal education opportunities, said she's pleased the administration appears to be "holding the line on an accountability system which demands real progress on gap closing," but agreed there are too few details to tell what some of the proposals mean.

Ms. Spellings said some of the proposals focus on "What are we going to do for kids trapped in schools that underperform?"

One way, she said, would be for students to have a chance to attend better-performing schools, including private schools. Others include flexibility in spending tutoring money or other federal funds.

Mr. Bush also had included a voucher proposal the first time around, but that didn't survive a then-Republican controlled Congress. Some observers think it's even less likely to survive a Democrat-controlled one.

Ms. Spellings said the amount of money for NCLB will be announced next week in Mr. Bush's budget proposal. The blueprint states there will be a "substantial increase" in federal Title I money so that more will go to help high school students.

John Tarka, president of the Pittsburgh Federation of Teachers and a member of the NCLB task force of the American Federation of Teachers, said, "Unfortunately, I think that much of what we see in the recommendations [is] pretty much the same old song resung." He said the plan still relies too much on standardized tests.

As for vouchers, he said, "It's one guaranteed way to avoid addressing the true problems. ... What we have to do is work to make sure [public] schools are places where parents and children and the community are happy to have their children."

DOJ_NMG_0121639

Andy LeFevre, executive director of REACH Alliance in Harrisburg, a school choice advocacy group, said he thinks vouchers "make perfect sense" and would be enough money to help families.

Ms. Wilkins hopes Congress can reauthorize the act early this year before the presidential election cycle is in full swing.

"The important thing to say is 'stay tuned.' Everybody, including the president, is sort of staking out positions," Ms. Wilkins said.

"The positions people stake out early in the legislative process are rarely where we end up at the end of the process."

Bush Proposes Adding Private School Vouchers To 'No Child' Law (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The Bush administration yesterday unveiled an education plan that would allow poor students at chronically failing public schools to use federal vouchers to attend private and religious schools, angering Democrats who vowed to fight the measure.

The private school vouchers, which on average would be worth $4,000, were among a series of proposals presented yesterday that President Bush hopes will be included in the reauthorization of his signature education initiative, No Child Left Behind.

In a conference call with reporters, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said the initiatives were necessary to help students in the nation's 1,800 most persistently under-performing schools.

"How do we answer the question: What do we do for kids trapped in schools that continue to under-perform?" she said. "Is the promise of No Child Left Behind real?"

Democrats in Congress assailed the plan -- which also would allow low-performing schools to override union contracts or become charter schools despite state laws limiting their creation -- and expressed concern that the politically charged proposals could delay the reauthorization, which is scheduled for this year.

"Ideological proposals like private school vouchers and attacks on collective-bargaining agreements won't help this reauthorization move forward on shared, bipartisan goals," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee.

The plan also includes measures that enjoy bipartisan support. It addresses one of the most persistent criticisms of No Child Left Behind: that schools that meet state testing goals overall but fail in a small category must provide all students in the school with free tutoring or the option to transfer to another school. Under the president's proposal, only students in the categories that failed would receive those options.

The initiative also would hold schools accountable for test scores in science starting in 2008 (the current program holds schools accountable only in reading and math). It also would for the first time require states to publicize their performance on a national test that states are already required to administer.

Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, the nation's largest teachers union, attacked the administration's proposal to allow some school administrators to override labor contracts to push out bad teachers and attract better ones.

"The No Child Left Behind law was designed to close the achievement gap, not to strip collective-bargaining agreements," he said.

The president's plan also would allow mayors to take over chronically failing schools and for those schools to transform themselves into charter schools, even if that would violate a state law capping the number of charter schools.

It was the private school voucher proposal, modeled on a plan implemented in the District in 2004, that seemed to anger some Democrats. The program in the Distict provides $7,500 vouchers, known in the administration as scholarships, to about 1,800 students, from kindergartners to high school seniors, attending 58 private schools.

"We have seen that the sky doesn't fall when kids go to private schools with public money," said Jeanne Allen, president of the Center for Education Reform, who was briefed on the plan in advance by White House staff. "So school choice is not nearly as scary as some congressmen have led us to believe."

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, called the voucher proposal a "bad idea" that was unlikely to gain traction in Congress. "Private school vouchers, which would divert taxpayer dollars away from public schools that need them, have been rejected in the past and nothing has changed to make them acceptable now," he said in a statement.

Spellings insisted that the administration will try to push through even those proposals likely to face stiff resistance in Congress. "I plan to fight hard for the whole kit and caboodle," she said.

New Education Reforms Get Mixed Reviews (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0121640

By Nancy Zuckerbrod
AP, January 25, 2007

Democrats and teachers' unions are criticizing the Bush administration for proposing to let school officials override collective bargaining agreements and state laws in an effort to reshape the No Child Left Behind law.

The recommendations are part of a plan that Education Secretary Margaret Spellings released Wednesday. It details changes the administration wants in the five-year-old education law, which is up for renewal this year.

The law seeks to ensure that all children can read and do math at grade level by 2014, requirements that have placed unprecedented demands on schools. They have had to increase testing, raise teacher quality and pay more attention to the achievements of minority children.

Spellings told reporters in a conference call that some proposals would meet resistance. But she said it was important to address the problems facing chronically failing schools; her department estimates there are about 1,800 such schools.

"How do we answer the question, 'What are we going to do for kids who are trapped in schools that continue to underperform?'" Spellings asked.

The goal is to free school administrators from parts of local contracts that govern teacher assignments. This is promoted as a way to get good teachers into troubled schools and help push out bad teachers.

Edward McElroy, president of the American Federation of Teachers, said the proposal does not make sense.

"To have a superintendent who is a party to the contract ... then have the authority to override it is silly beyond words," McElroy said.

He said trying to force experienced teachers into troubled schools would lead them to seek jobs elsewhere. "Getting people to go to a school can't be as a result of a coercive act," McElroy said.

A second proposed change would allow local officials to close failing schools and turn them into charter schools, regardless of any state limits on the number of charter schools. These are public schools that sometimes are run by private entities and usually are free of many of the regulations that govern traditional public schools.

The administration says the federal government has the right to include the charter school and contract language in a renewed No Child Left Behind law as strings attached to the billions of dollars in aid it provides to these schools.

Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, chairman of the Senate committee overseeing education issues, said he was disappointed that the administration has proposed "circumventing state law."

Kennedy and union leaders also criticized a proposal that would give students in failing schools private school vouchers. Each scholarship would be worth an estimated $4,000.

"School vouchers divert scarce dollars from underfunded public schools and move us farther from achieving a great public school for every child," said Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, the largest teachers' union.

The top Republican on the House committee overseeing education indicated the measure would have GOP support.

"If we are truly serious about meeting the goals of No Child Left Behind, we must equip parents with every available option so their children can learn, succeed, and grow," said Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon, R-Calif.

Republicans and Democratic leaders back the administration's plan to stick with the law's 2014 reading and math goal, though some have said it is unrealistic.

A proposal to allow schools to consider how much students progress each year, not just whether they meet specific benchmarks, was applauded by all.

In addition, lawmakers appear willing to consider a proposal that would hold states accountable for students' science scores in addition to the math and reading assessments.

There also seems to be support for requiring states to create standards and tests linked to what students should know when they start college or go to work.

Bush School Rule Changes Affect Chicago (CHIT)

By Stephanie Banchero, Tribune Staff Reporter
Chicago Tribune, January 25, 2007

The Bush administration called Wednesday for Congress to strengthen the No Child Left Behind law by ratcheting up penalties on low-performing schools, giving districts more latitude to transfer teachers to failing schools, and providing poor children vouchers to attend private schools.

DOJ_NMG_0121641

The plan, released by the U.S. Department of Education a day after Bush's State of the Union address, also would give districts more power to convert failing schools to charters, even if that meant subverting state-imposed charter caps. Such a move would greatly benefit the Chicago Public Schools system, which has been thwarted from opening more than the state-allowed 30 charter schools.

"I see this as a very vigorous package of proposals that are sound and make sense if taken together," said U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. "This is the president's answer to the question, 'Is the promise of No Child Left Behind real?' If this proposal is not what Congress had in mind, then we all have to ask them what they have in mind."

Spellings will be in Chicago Thursday to tour a charter school and promote the president's proposals.

But the plan already is coming under fire from some Democrats, who object to vouchers, and from teachers union officials, who are opposed to a plan that would allow districts to subvert collective bargaining agreements and move teachers to underperforming schools.

"Once you put vouchers and teacher contracts out there, this is war," declared Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, the nation's largest teachers union. "It appears that, instead of putting forth areas that we have commonality on, they put forth the stuff where they knew there would be no agreement. If we have to go to war, we are certainly prepared to do so."

No Child Left Behind, Bush's signature domestic policy, comes up for renewal this year. The five-year-old act mandates that schools test students in math and reading and holds them accountable for the results. Schools that repeatedly fail are subject to increasing sanctions. Students in those schools can transfer out or receive free tutoring.

Spellings laid out a laundry list of proposals that touch virtually every aspect of public education, from high school reform to teacher quality to penalties for chronically underperforming schools. Many of the proposals, including those that would give schools move flexibility in determining student progress and relaxing requirements on testing special education students, are likely to receive bipartisan support and applause from educators nationwide.

Some proposals, however, are certain to draw fire.

The so-called "Promise Scholarships" will meet stiff resistance. Under the plan, a poor student who attends a chronically failing school would be given a $4,000 voucher, which could be used to transfer to a private school. Bush tried to insert a voucher component into the No Child Left Behind Act five years ago, but it was defeatedby Democrats.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), who chairs the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, already has attacked the voucher proposal. "Once again, he proposes siphoning crucial resources from our public schools—already reeling from increased requirements and budget cuts," Kennedy said in a statement.

Other major changes in the plan include:

Results from state science exams would be used to determine whether schools are meeting federal goals. Currently, only math and reading results are considered.

States would be required to publish a report card that compares student results on state exams with performance on more rigorous national exams.

Students who attend schools where test scores are low for two consecutive years would be eligible for free tutoring. Currently, the school must fail for three years before free tutoring is offered.

States would have to develop assessments that measure whether high school students are prepared for college and must report those results to the public.

A school that has failed for five consecutive years would be required to make substantial changes to its staff or reconstitute the school's governing structure. Currently, schools have a third option that allows them to make minor changes to improve student learning.

What Can Bush Achieve In Two Years? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann, Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2007

The final quarter of George W. Bush's presidency has begun, and a big question looms: Can he achieve anything significant in his remaining time in the White House?

The Democrats now control Congress, a fact of life that was almost palpable when President Bush delivered his State of the Union address Tuesday night in the Capitol. Despite calls for common ground and an end to partisanship, powerful forces in both parties don't see reason for compromise. And the unprecedentedly early and active start to the 2008 presidential campaign leaves little breathing room for key players to work together, away from partisan pressures.

But there is some hope. Both the Democrats in Congress and Mr. Bush, each for their own reasons, need to show accomplishments. The Democrats don't want to lose control of Congress in two years, after fighting so hard to regain it. And

Bush has his legacy and the Republican Party's image to consider. Polls show the public clamoring for an end to the intense partisanship that has dominated national policymaking since the 1990s.

The first half of Bush's State of the Union speech, that portion devoted to domestic policy, was crafted to identify areas of possible cooperation between the parties. In taking that approach, the president showed a clear recognition that the political environment has changed dramatically since his reelection.

"On healthcare and certainly immigration and on energy, there is a possibility that the two sides can meet again," says Stephen Wayne, a political scientist at Georgetown University in Washington. "A lot depends on the willingness of the president to compromise, and his willingness to share credit with the Democrats."

The 800-pound gorilla in the wider policy mix is Iraq. The war's unpopularity with the American people, and Bush's chronically low job-approval ratings, give him little political capital with which to work. The president's controversial decision to boost the US presence in Baghdad and Anbar Province by 21,500 troops may be absorbing whatever capital he has left.

Despite Bush's repeated pleas for Americans to give the plan a chance, including in the State of the Union, he faces increasingly bipartisan challenges to it in Congress. The biggest blow came on Monday, when Sen. John Warner of Virginia – the top Republican on the Armed Services Committee – introduced a resolution opposing the plan. Wednesday, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee began consideration of a resolution rejecting Bush's plan, with strong support from committee Democrats and at least one Republican, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Even supporters of the plan are challenging the president over Iraq in ways unheard of before. One supporter in the House, Republican leader John Boehner, is calling for a monthly report from the administration that would gauge progress on military, political, and social benchmarks set for Iraq.

The fact that Bush spent fully half of his State of the Union address on Iraq, Iran, and the war on terror – after much advance focus on the speech's domestic initiatives – demonstrates how central these foreign-policy matters will be to the remainder of Bush's presidency.

Still, if the potential for success in Iraq in the next two years remains an open question, the president clearly wants to show that he is not consumed by Iraq and can address matters closer to home. Among other things, he said he would soon submit a budget plan that would run in the black after five years. He called on Congress to cut the number of legislative earmarks – special-interest items slipped into bills at the last minute – by half in this session.

But his two biggest domestic items were his healthcare and energy initiatives.

On healthcare (see story), Bush called for legislation that would establish tax deductions for health-insurance payments worth $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. Employer-financed benefits greater than that would become taxable income under this plan.

About 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would get a tax reduction, according to the White House, while 20 percent would see their taxes go up. Those currently uninsured might find healthcare within their reach.

"Changing the tax code is a vital and necessary step to making healthcare affordable for more Americans," said Bush.

Critics, such as Rep. Pete Stark (D) of California, chairman of the House Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health, say that the poor pay little in taxes in any case, and thus a tax deduction is worth less to them than to wealthier Americans.

Representative Stark says he won't even consider holding hearings on the subject. Administration officials insist that critics' attitudes toward the proposal may change.

"This is a bold, new proposal. It's going to take some time for people to absorb it and to understand it," said Joel Kaplan, deputy chief of staff for policy, at a briefing for reporters.

On energy, Bush called for a 20 percent reduction in gasoline usage by 2017. "When we do that, we will have cut our total imports by the equivalent of three-quarters of all the oil we now import from the Middle East," said Bush.

This gas cut would be achieved mainly through a huge increase in the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels blended into the fuel supply, under government mandate. The administration also proposed raising the fuel-economy standards for passenger cars.

An energy change of this magnitude would be huge. Producing the necessary ethanol could require the conversion of at least 30 million acres – possibly the biggest change in American land use since the Civil War, according to Steven McCormick, president of the Nature Conservancy.

"That will have serious implications for both water and soil quality and wildlife habitat," said Mr. McCormick in a statement. "It could also significantly raise the cost of gasoline impacting local economies."

In addition to substance, the atmospherics of Bush's address provided plenty of fodder for commentary among members. From inside the hall, the high point seemed to come when Bush and Nancy Pelosi (D) of California – the first woman speaker – stepped up to the podium amid tumultuous applause. After that, political reality seemed to set in.

DOJ_NMG_0121643

"He was down. His heart wasn't in it. He overreacted to the number of Democrats. He's facing the last two years without a whole lot of pleasure," said Sen. John Rockefeller (D) of West Virginia.

Republicans looked for the silver lining in an evening that featured as much nonapplause as applause, as members sought to show displeasure at times by sitting on their hands. But it could have been worse for Bush, some suggested.

"He made it tough for his critics to be too hard on him by repeatedly emphasizing opportunities to work together and find common ground," especially on issues such as energy independence and health care, said Rep. John Shadegg (R) of Arizona.

Senate Firefighters (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Despite the raging controversy over Iraq military policy, President Bush's plea for bipartisan cooperation on the domestic agenda has a chance of success in the Senate. The reason has less to do with sympathy for the politically weakened chief executive than a dynamic that has gone largely unnoticed among the senators themselves.

Since the midterm election created a near-even balance in the Senate -- 51 Democrats and 49 Republicans -- serious efforts at cross-party communication have developed momentum.

Forty senators showed up on Jan. 9 for the first of a planned series of weekly 8 a.m. breakfasts designed to provide neutral ground where lawmakers of both parties can meet, rather than caucusing separately.

Yesterday, some 60 top Senate staffers of both parties held a similar breakfast session aimed at obliterating party lines and fostering personal relationships.

The core of the "Gang of 14" -- the self-selected bipartisan caucus that negotiated the compromise on judicial filibusters and averted an explosion in the Senate in 2005 -- has reconstituted itself as a "fire department" ready to douse other blazes.

And at the top, Majority Leader Harry Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell have forged a personal relationship of unusual trust, and already they have used it to rescue landmark ethics legislation from threatened defeat and steer it to overwhelming passage.

All this has happened in the first weeks of a session in which the Senate had to adjust to a sudden shift of party control from Republicans to Democrats. No comparable spirit has developed in the House of Representatives, where the new Republican minority is complaining bitterly that dissenting views have been stifled.

There is no guarantee that the budding spirit of fellowship among senators will survive the Iraq debates and persist into the spring and summer, when other big issues reach the point of decision. But as Bush suggested in his State of the Union address, at least some issues -- education, immigration, health care, energy and the environment -- are open to bipartisan approaches.

The powerful current toward consensus-building flowing through the Senate has two sources. Politicians who were at home last autumn had their ears burned by constituents frustrated by the partisanship of the past Congress and its failure to act on issues of national concern. "The last election was a resounding repudiation of the status quo," said Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine, one of the few Republican survivors in New England.

And senators themselves are weary of excessive partisanship. "All our time is spent in team meetings, playing petty kindergarten games about what we're going to do to each other," said Republican Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, referring to the party caucuses.

Snowe and Alexander became ringleaders in two of the efforts to break down party barriers. Alexander teamed with Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, reelected as an independent Democrat, as co-hosts of the new Tuesday morning breakfasts for senators of both parties.

With senators seated at round tables of eight, and the seats alternating between Republicans and Democrats, the breakfasts feature five-minute briefings by a pair of senators from opposite parties on an issue about to reach the floor, followed by 20 minutes of discussion of that issue and a half-hour of general conversation. No votes are taken; no policy set. But senators, without staff, get to listen to each other and build personal bonds.

After skipping a week for the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday, the second such breakfast was held Tuesday, and 24 senators showed up, even though they were not expected to return to Congress until that night's State of the Union address. Lieberman and Alexander are hopeful the weekly breakfasts will become a staple on senators' calendars.

At the head of the reinvigorated core group of the Gang of 14 are Snowe and Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu of Louisiana. They have no fixed meeting schedule but a readiness to intervene if the opposing parties seem headed for gridlock.

Landrieu explained her motivation: "The success of the Gang of 14 was not just a success for the Senate. It was also a very personally rewarding experience. We met for rather long periods, with no staff allowed, and literally talked and listened very quietly. That experience changed me; it made me think we need to do this more often -- find a quiet time and use it to search for common ground."

DOJ_NMG_0121644

The two efforts are complementary -- not in competition. The Snowe-Landrieu common ground group will work on policy; the Lieberman-Alexander breakfasts are primarily social. But Lieberman expressed the hope of all the organizers when he said, "We're trying to change the atmosphere here and make agreement a little easier to come by."

Democrats Hedge On Bipartisan Pledge (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

House Democrats say they intend to honor their pledge to allow Republicans to participate in writing legislation, but they won't say when.

"I said we were going to be fair, not stupid," said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, adding he is wary of Republicans using amendment votes as ammunition for future campaign attack ads.

"But we do intend to engage, involve and allow Republicans to have substantive opportunities as we consider legislation," the Maryland Democrat told reporters. "We want Republicans to have the opportunity to offer amendments in committee [and] amendments on the floor."

He still hasn't said when the majority will open up the amendment process, known as using "regular rules."

What's more, Republicans say, the majority is flouting the rules that are in place.

That prompted Minority Leader John A. Boehner yesterday to introduce a resolution rebuking House Democrats.

"We've extended the hand of friendship to each other in hopes of working together for the common good," the Ohio Republican said. "Unfortunately, the hand of friendship is being slapped away by the actions of the majority. You simply can't talk about cooperation at the same time you're circumventing the rules of the House to shut the other side out."

The resolution died in a party-line vote.

Through a spokesman, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi dismissed Republican concerns.

"The Republicans have a problem," spokesman Drew Hammill said. "They are having a hard time finding issues to talk about and today's comments by Mr. Boehner are further evidence of that."

The new Democratic majority suspended regular rules to hurry passage of its "100-hours" agenda, including legislation to raise the minimum wage, authorize more stem-cell research funding, subsidize lower student-loan interest rates and end oil-industry subsidies.

The bills passed and the 100-hour rush ended a week ago, but regular rules "remain suspended."

"Just treat us the way you [had] asked to be treated," Mr. Boehner told Mr. Hoyer earlier this week during debate of a bill to which Republicans were not allowed to offer amendments.

The bill, which would ban federal pensions for members of Congress convicted of certain crimes while in office, passed in a unanimous vote Tuesday.

Without regular rules, Republicans couldn't offer amendments that would have expanded the list of pension-losing crimes, including some unrelated to abuse of office -- ranging from white-collar embezzlement crimes to political crimes such as securing campaign contributions by intimidation.

"My colleagues on this side of the aisle want to participate," Mr. Boehner said. "We want to work with the majority in the best interest of the American people, and we can do that together. But the only way to do that is to go through regular order."

The debate of the bill -- and the rules -- grew heated as Republicans repeatedly raised objections.

"The process has been shut down to us, and that is why we are upset," said Rep. Lee Terry, Nebraska Republican, who supported the bill, but wanted to offer an amendment to strengthen it.

Mr. Hoyer said he sympathized.

"It's difficult to be in the minority," he said. "I feel your pain. I want you to know that."

The Democrats' Rude Rebuff (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

When President Bush called for a bipartisan "special advisory council" of congressional leaders on the war against terrorism in his State of the Union address, he had in his pocket a rude rejection from Democratic leaders. Thank you very much, said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, but no thank you.

Three days earlier, Reid and Pelosi wrote a letter to the president turning down his offer (which was contained in his Jan. 10 speech on Iraq) to establish a council consisting of Democratic chairmen and ranking Republican members of the relevant committees. "We believe that Congress already has bipartisan structures in place," they said, adding: "We look forward to working with you within existing structures."

DOJ_NMG_0121645

That could be the most overt snub of a presidential overture since Abraham Lincoln was told that Gen. George B. McClellan had retired for the night and could not see him. Courtesy aside, it shows that the self-confident Democratic leadership is uninterested in being cut into potentially disastrous outcomes in Iraq. It wants to function as a coordinate branch of government, not as friendly colleagues in the spirit of bipartisanship. Pelosi and several Democratic committee chairmen are leaving for Iraq on Friday.

In his Jan. 10 speech, Bush called for a "new, bipartisan working group that will help us come together across party lines to win the war on terror." That prompted the Pelosi-Reid letter of Jan. 19 rejecting the offer.

Bush made a mistake in attributing the idea to Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, who as the Senate's only self-identified Independent Democrat is estranged from his colleagues who are unmodified Democrats. These former comrades are not charmed by the prospect of Lieberman pontificating as a member of the "working group" by virtue of his chairmanship of the Senate Homeland Security Committee.

But Lieberman was not the reason for the speaker and majority leader's rebuff. The Democratic leadership is beyond consultation on Iraq, as demonstrated by the selection of Sen. Jim Webb to deliver the party's response to the president Tuesday night. Webb, whose unexpected election in Virginia last year gave Democrats a Senate majority, is a hard-edged critic of the war not interested in bipartisanship. Discarding staff-written talking points, professional writer Webb declared: "The president took us into this war recklessly."

Webb's astringent comments contrasted sharply with Bush's tone, which indicated he still has not shed illusions that he carried from Austin to Washington in 2001. Congressional Democrats are nothing like the tame Democrats in the Texas Legislature whom Bush dealt with as governor. On Tuesday night, Bush ignored issues dear to the conservative base such as embryonic stem cell research, abortion and same-sex marriage. Delivering his State of the Union on the day after the annual March for Life on the anniversary of Roe v. Wade, Bush did not see fit to mention the abortion issue, which is important to so many of his supporters.

Instead, the president talked about goals, though not methods, dear to Democratic hearts: expanded health insurance, energy independence and federal aid for local education. Bush was reminiscent of President Bill Clinton in sprinkling his speech with small proposals that might be popular. Yet Democrats immediately indicated that all such Bush plans have no chance of passage.

Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), chairman of the relevant Ways and Means subcommittee, immediately declared that Bush's serious effort to improve health insurance coverage was dead on arrival, without the benefit of hearings. Stark has been notoriously cantankerous, whether in the majority or minority, during 17 terms in the House. But his attitude dominates today's Democratic side of the aisle.

On both sides, the prevailing attitude is that Bush looks like a president at bay. Statements made to me this week by two prominent political figures, one from each party, were so candid that these sources did not want to be quoted by name.

The Republican, a ranking House committee member, said: "The president and his aides are irrelevant and out of touch, removed from realizing what happened in the election." A Democratic state party leader said that "Bush is in such bad shape that the result of the 2008 election is already decided." In that atmosphere, pleas for consultation go nowhere.

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Fallout from the war in Iraq, which already has weakened President Bush among the general public and in Congress, now is causing problems with the group that has been his mainstay: social and economic conservatives.

These longtime loyalists, appreciative of Mr. Bush's record on issues ranging from tax cuts to his veto of federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, also have supported his war policies. But Mr. Bush's annual State of the Union message Tuesday night aggravated their underlying fear: that the president might become so consumed by the worsening conflict in Iraq -- and chastened by Democrats' takeover of Congress -- that he will give up on the issues they care about.

"I think the president left a lot of conservatives shaking their heads" by avoiding the issues atop their agenda, said Bill Lauderback, executive vice president at the American Conservative Union.

Yesterday morning, the weekly meeting of conservatives that is convened by antitax activist Grover Norquist, a White House ally, was marked by "tense exchanges" with administration press secretary Tony Snow over border enforcement and Mr. Bush's immigration proposals, according to conservative activists.

Conservatives are becoming more openly critical, adding to the president's woes and emboldening Democrats for battles ahead. Increasingly, they are looking beyond Mr. Bush for a new standard-bearer, though no one in Republicans' emerging 2008 presidential field has yet captured conservatives.

Meanwhile, their most recent nemesis -- the Democrats' 2004 nominee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry -- announced yesterday that he will not run ion 2008.

In a video circulated on the Internet soon after Mr. Bush's speech, entitled "A Lifeless State of the Union," President Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council, one of the nation's most active conservative groups opposing abortion and same-sex marriage, took note of the president's unbowed determination on the war, a subject which accounted for nearly half of his address to the new Democratic-led Congress.

"However," Mr. Perkins said in the video, "that same clear and concise determination to defend the culture of America was missing. I believe the president failed in challenging the new majority to join him in addressing core family and cultural issues....The president failed to draw a line in the sand on behalf of life."

It was perhaps Mr. Perkins' harshest public criticism of the president. Even so, he said in an interview yesterday, "My staff felt that it was way too kind."

Aside from the lengthy closing section on Iraq and the war on terror, Mr. Bush devoted the first part of his nationally televised address to a range of domestic issues, including education, energy, health care and immigration control. Gone were his past calls for big tax cuts, or even making permanent the ones in law, for overhauling Social Security to create individual retirement accounts or for a constitutional ban on same-sex marriage.

The president devoted one paragraph to his call for reining in the unsustainable growth in spending for big social programs -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- a cause that had been a major feature of his past two State of the Union speeches. But absent was the demand for Social Security private accounts, or even last year's proposal for a bipartisan entitlements commission to tackle the problem. Mr. Bush never did create that commission, as numerous figures contacted by the White House demurred, including former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, believing that neither the president nor Democrats were willing to compromise.

The Institute for Policy Innovation, a conservative organization espousing free-market ideas, gave Mr. Bush credit for continuing to raise the entitlements issue. "But he lacked leadership in that he failed to propose any solutions," the group said in a statement. It recalled that he previously had proposed carving out personal accounts for Social Security funds, "but he has never proposed a specific plan."

In fairness to the president, said the American Conservative Union's longtime chairman, David Keene, "most of the things he cared about getting done have either been done, or rejected." Moreover, he said, Mr. Bush "decided to be conciliatory and I understand that," given Democrats' control of Congress. "But there should have been one or two things...with appeal to his base," he said. Mr. Keene suggested the president should have ruled out any tax increases.

Meanwhile, he said, "People are looking past Bush. It's all about the future."

But the early frontrunners among Republicans -- Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York City Mayor Rudy Guiliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- all have problems among conservatives. The two Republican aspirants with the most appeal are Kansas's Republican Sen. Sam Brownback and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

President's Sin Of Omission? (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The president in his State of the Union address Tuesday night left out a tiny little suffix that means a whole lot to some people. He did it so subtly you could have missed it. Just a little "-ic." What's in an "-ic"?

Bush started the speech on a bipartisan note, honoring the first Madam Speaker, Democrat Nancy Pelosi, and calling on the country to come together.

Then: "I congratulate the Democrat majority," he said, dropping the last two letters from "Democratic."

Bush does this a lot, and while it's hard to say if the omission was intentional in this instance, it is a semantic tactic that's been part of Republican warfare for decades. It's a little thing, a means of needling the opposition by purposefully mispronouncing its name, and of suggesting that the party on the left is not truly small-"d" democratic. The president's pronunciation was all the more striking because it was apparently not what Bush was supposed to say. The prepared speech that the White House distributed beforehand retained that precious "-ic."

The case of the missing suffix provoked an oh-no-he-di'int reaction from some Democrats. The bloggers caught it, of course. (Bloggers catch that sort of thing.) "Code word," wrote one. "Calculated insult," wrote another.

"We all noticed," says Markos Moulitsas ZÃºniga, founder of the liberal blogging site DailyKos.com, who replayed the president's opening words on his TiVo to make sure he'd heard what he thought he heard. "He just clearly couldn't help himself."

DOJ_NMG_0121647

Tuesday on CNN, Democratic strategist Paul Begala noted the omission right after it happened, adding that the president was being "insulting" and "self-defeating." Republican strategist Mike Murphy chided Begala, saying that if this was his "biggest complaint, I think the president had a pretty good night."

But for those who see a big symbol in two little letters, the question becomes: Is a man who can't say "-ic" capable of being bipartisan?

"He offers this olive branch," Begala says. "Boom, 10 seconds later, he drops the hammer, insults the party and he winks at his base. . . . It tells you what's in his heart. It tells you that he has no damn desire to compromise."

The missing "-ic" has a long legacy. Dick Armey was fond of saying "Democrat Party." Commie-hunting Sen. Joseph McCarthy even used the phrase half a century ago. Bush used it Tuesday night even as he was calling for politicians to "cross that aisle," even in the context of a formal address and even as he addressed a Congress dominated by those he was insulting.

Or not. Could the word have been unintentional?

"It's hard to disentangle whether that's an intentional slight at the opposition, or traditional problems with the president's vocabulary," says Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University.

"I doubt if it was a conscious slight," says nonpartisan political analyst Charlie Cook. "I think it was just a force of habit." When it comes to omitting the "-ic," Republicans "have been doing it so long that they probably don't even realize they're doing it."

"Even More Of A Hodgepodge Than Usual" (WSJ)

By David Frum

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- On State of the Union night, Americans witnessed two President Bushes. The first President Bush delivered a firm foreign policy message in tones of passion and commitment. The second President Bush dragged his way wearily through a domestic agenda that seemed to interest him as little as it excited Congress.

The first President Bush pledged himself to bold free-market reforms in health care -- including the removal of a treasured but destructive tax loophole from the wealthy and powerful. The second President Bush proposed to regulate America's way to energy security with a plan that might have been dusted off from the Carter administration.

The first President Bush insisted that the budget can be balanced without raising taxes. The second shrugged off Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security as problems for later.

The first President Bush spoke with realism about the generational struggle against Islamic extremism. The second President Bush offered false hopes about the good intentions of the government of Saudi Arabia and other sometime allies.

There is a famous story of President Franklin Roosevelt listening to a passionate debate between protectionists and free-traders. As the argument ended, he turned to his speechwriters and said: "Weave them both together." All States of the Union mix the high and the low, big ideas and petty compromises, soaring rhetoric and Baby Einstein bathos. But SOTU 2007 seemed even more of a hodgepodge than usual -- and much will turn on whether it is the first or second George Bush who sets the nation's course in the 24 months ahead.

Compare and contrast the president's health and energy ideas. On health care, he focused intensely on the fundamental problem in the American system: Tax subsidies have encouraged Americans to demand that their employers buy health insurance for them rather than shopping for themselves. That core error is responsible for almost everything wrong with the health market in the U.S. It dulls consumers' sensitivity to the cost of insurance. It discourages insurers from competing against each other. It tempts state legislators to pile appealing but expensive mandates onto insurance companies. I might want to buy a cheaper policy without acupuncture coverage, but I'm not paying attention and the acupuncture lobby is.

The president's plan identifies the problem and responds to it in a targeted way, by taking the first step toward negating the distorting subsidy. The ghost of George Stigler is smiling somewhere.

But now look to the president's misdirected, wasteful energy proposals. The president wants the country to use 20% less gasoline in 10 years. To that end, he proposes that government regulators tell Americans which fuels to use, which cars to buy and which industries should grow. This time, Stigler was not smiling -- but Iowa's Sen. Chuck Grassley practically danced a jig.

Does 20% over 10 years sound like a lot? After the Iranian oil shock of 1979, Americans cut their gasoline use by 15% in just two years -- and they did not catch up again to their 1978 levels of gasoline competition until 1993.

The "energy policy" that accomplished this amazing conservation achievement can be summed up in two words: higher prices. When energy prices rise, consumers conserve and substitute. When energy prices drop, consumers don't bother. And guess what? These market processes still work. Americans used less petroleum in 2006 than they did in 2005. Reduced demand led to lower prices.

DOJ_NMG_0121648

If policy makers fear that today's lower prices will induce consumers to stop conserving, they do not need to reinvent Jimmy Carter's Moral Equivalent of War. Just slap a tax on gasoline at the pump, or on petroleum by the barrel, or on Venezuelan, Russian and Persian Gulf imports, or even on all forms of energy, period -- and consumers and producers will respond the way they always do. No regulations, no bureaucracy required.

The President Bush who delivered the health-care portions of the State of the Union clearly understood the power of pricing. Why not the president who delivered the energy portions?

The answer may be revealed by the contrast between president's listlessness as he discussed domestic policy and the vigor with which he addressed national security. With Congress in opposition hands, with his own agenda completed or discarded, and with a huge and difficult war to fight, the president's attention has focused abroad. That often happens to second-term presidents -- but rarely as completely as with George W. Bush. As he tersely noted, the fight America entered in Iraq is not the fight America is now in. The U.S. has stumbled into a much bigger and more dangerous war than the administration expected or planned for. Its political opponents believe the war already lost. The first President Bush is still fighting to win. It was powerfully symbolic of the difference between the president and his critics that Democrats declined to rise and applaud his call, "Let us find our resolve, and turn events toward victory."

Yet with his presidency and place in history dependent on Iraq, the president still finds it difficult to shake the restraints and illusions that have done so much damage to America's efforts since 9/11. He acknowledges that the deadliest insurgents in Iraq are supported by Iran. Yet he did not use this fact to rally public support for a more assertive approach to the threat.

He accepts that the U.S. is waging a global struggle not just against terrorism but against "extremism" -- and though he will not call it "Islamic extremism" he did refer to "Shia and Sunni extremists," which represents at least a fair approximation.

But then, why does Saudi Arabia rate a mention as a partner in that generational struggle? Especially when, as by now the whole world knows, Saudi Arabia is the leading bankroller of the global system of propaganda and incitement behind Sunni extremism? The president calls the war a "global struggle against extremism" -- and immediately names Saudi Arabia a partner in the struggle. And while he declines to name Pakistan as a partner, neither will he publicly acknowledge how much the re-emergent Taliban owe to the support and protection of a country that he praised as a coalition partner in his State of the Union of 2005.

Perhaps the answer to all these questions can be found in this: The sixth and seventh years of a presidency are the years when presidents discover their office's limits -- and their own. All presidents end up trying to stretch too little sheet over too much bed. We want them to be bold but not adventurous, flexible but not vacillating, resolute without stubbornness, confident without cocksureness. Above all, we want them to pursue great and uncertain goals -- and yet to achieve consistent success. The men and women who seek the office believe themselves capable of all those things. They have to, or they would not dare. And then they, and we, know great disappointment.

But that is not usually the end of the story. The story ends much later on, when partisan rancor cools, when the results come in, and the record can be read in full. When that day at last arrives for this president, perhaps all Americans will be able to agree that this most divisive of figures united in himself both the first President Bush and the second, both the president who sometimes erred and stumbled -- and also the man who nonetheless kept fighting. George W. Bush has always been at his best in adversity. Americans face no shortage of adversity now.

Mr. Frum, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, served as a speechwriter to President Bush in 2001-2002.

Long On Rhetoric, Short On Sorrow (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

President Bush showed what he does well at the beginning of the State of the Union ceremony when he graciously acknowledged and introduced Nancy Pelosi as speaker of the House of Representatives. He seemed both generous and sincere, and it was the right touch for a genuinely historic moment.

At the end of his speech he introduced four Americans of whom the nation can be proud, including Wesley Autrey, a New Yorker who made like a Hollywood stunt man to save the life of a stricken passenger who had fallen onto the tracks in front of an oncoming subway train.

The rest of the evening was a study in governmental dysfunction. The audience kept mindlessly applauding — up and down, like marionettes — when in fact there was nothing to applaud. The state of the union is wretched, which is why the president's approval ratings are the worst since Nixon and Carter.

If Mr. Bush is bothered by his fall from political grace, it wasn't showing on Tuesday night. He seemed as relaxed as ever, smiling, signing autographs, glad-handing.

I wanted to hear him talk about the suffering of the soldiers he has put in harm's way, and the plight of the residents of New Orleans. I wanted to hear him express a little in the way of sorrow for the many thousands who have died unnecessarily on his watch. I wanted to see him slip the surly bonds of narcissism and at least acknowledge the human wreckage that is the sum and substance of his sustained folly.

But this is a president who runs when empathy calls. While others are monitoring the casualty lists, he's off to the gym. At least Lyndon Johnson had the decency to agonize over the losses he unleashed in Vietnam.

The State of the Union speech was boilerplate at a time when much of the country, with good reason, is boiling mad. The United States, the most powerful nation in the history of the world, seems paralyzed. It can't extricate itself from the war in Iraq, can't rebuild the lost city of New Orleans, can't provide health care for all of its citizens, can't come up with a sane energy policy in the era of global warming, can't even develop a thriving public school system.

If it's true, as President Bush told his audience, that "much is asked of us," it's equally true that very little has been delivered.

The Democrats, delighted by the wounded Bush presidency, believe this is their time. Like an ostentation of peacocks, an extraordinary crowd of excited candidates is gathering in hopes of succeeding Mr. Bush.

But such a timid crowd!

Ask a potential Democratic president what he or she would do about the war, and you'll get a doctoral dissertation about the importance of diplomacy, the possibility of a phased withdrawal (but not too quick), the need for Iraqis to help themselves and figure out a way to divvy up the oil, and so on and so forth.

A straight answer? Surely you jest. The Democrats remind me of the boxer in the Bonnie Raitt lyric who was "afraid to throw a punch that might land."

There's a hole in the American system where the leadership used to be. The country that led the miraculous rebuilding effort in the aftermath of World War II can't even build an adequate system of levees on its own Gulf Coast.

The most effective answer to this leadership vacuum would be a new era of political activism by ordinary citizens. The biggest, most far-reaching changes of the past century — the labor movement, the civil rights movement, the women's movement — were not primarily the result of elective politics, but rather the hard work of committed citizen-activists fed up with the status quo.

It's time for thoughtful citizens to turn off their TVs and step into the public arena. Protest. Attend meetings. Circulate petitions. Run for office. I suspect the public right now is way ahead of the politicians when it comes to ideas about creating a more peaceful, more equitable, more intelligent society.

The candidates for the most part are listening to their handlers and gurus and fat-cat contributors, which is the antithesis of democracy. It's not easy for ordinary men and women to be heard above that self-serving din, but it can be done.

Voters should listen to Dwight Eisenhower, who said in 1954:

"Politics ought to be the part-time profession of every citizen who would protect the rights and privileges of free people and who would preserve what is good and fruitful in our national heritage."

Bush, Democrats Play "Old Politics." Voters Want "New" (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, January 25, 2007

A new, non-polarized, problem-solving politics is trying to be born in this country, but — lip service aside — most current politicians are stuck in the old model of nonstop partisan warfare.

Bush enunciated — once again — the clear message of the 2006 elections: "Our citizens don't care which side of the aisle we sit on —as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done."

The agenda he offered created some opportunities for bipartisan agreement — notably, comprehensive immigration reform and reauthorization of the No Child Left Behind program — but most Democratic commentary emphasized the negative.

In the main, Democrats gave a nod to the public's desire for bipartisan cooperation, then quickly dismissed Bush's proposals as inadequate or wrong-headed.

Typical was the reaction of Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.). "I welcome the president's change in tone," he said. "But though [Bush's] tone sounds more accepting of other views, his basic policies so far have not changed."

The same kind of message came from Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and the Democrats' official SOTU responder, Sen. Jim Webb (Va.).

Webb, in particular, exuded the old politics, accusing Bush of starting the Iraq War "recklessly" and likening current economic disparities to the early 1900s, when "the dispossessed workers at the bottom were threatening revolt."

Bush should get U.S. troops out of Iraq and "take action" — unspecified — about "inequality," Webb said. "If he does, we will join him. If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

The leading exponent of a new politics is Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), whose fantastic appeal lies, I think, both in his personal charisma and his promise to answer the public's hunger for nonpartisan politics — or "post-partisan" politics, as California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) calls it.

Obama had it exactly right in announcing his presidential exploratory committee last week. "America has faced big problems before," he said. "But today, our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, common-sense way.

"Politics has become bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solution," he said. "We have to change our politics and come together around our common interests and concerns as Americans."

As various commentators have said, Obama represents a new generational sensibility — a pragmatic post-boomer attitude trying to bypass the ideological hang-ups of boomer veterans of the Vietnam and cultural struggles of the 1960s.

In fact, there are multiple bipartisan efforts under way to promote consensus solutions to various problems, even some of them in Congress, such as the Senate's "bipartisan caucus" started by Sens. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) and Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.).

In recent weeks, several "strange bedfellows" coalitions have announced agreements to work together on health care and education reform. One collection, including formerly hostile groups such as the liberal Families USA, the conservative U.S. Chamber of Commerce and America's Health Insurance Plans, announced a cooperative effort to cover all of America's 9 million uninsured children by expanding the State Children's Health Insurance Program.

Another coalition was formed by AARP, the Service Employees International Union and the Business Roundtable to jointly address both health care and the nation's long-term fiscal crisis.

Two House Members, conservative Tom Price (R-Ga.) and liberal Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.), and moderate Sens. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) and Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) are co-sponsoring measures to encourage states to experiment to cover the uninsured, as Massachusetts, California, Pennsylvania and other states are doing.

Bush, virtually ignoring such approaches, came up with a novel alternative to make health care more affordable by offering families a $15,000 tax deduction to buy insurance — paying for it by limiting deductions for more expensive plans.

Without even a hearing, the plan was declared "DOA" by old-politics Democrats, including influential Reps. Pete Stark (Calif.) and John Dingell (Mich.).

Obama, encouragingly, granted that Bush's proposal was "serious" and should be addressed "in a constructive way." But he also declared that "incremental plans that do nothing to bring down costs or guarantee coverage are simply no longer sufficient" and added that "it's not going to be adequate."

Indeed, a Treasury Department analysis shows that Bush's plan will cover only 5 million of the nation's 47 million uninsured, although White House officials said it would actually cover more.

It's not health care, but the Iraq War, that mainly prevents the new politics from being born. Beyond that, presidential candidates will be pressured by ideological activists to keep the old wars alive. But, the new politics is coming because the public wants it. It will just take courage and vision to give it life.

As Jimmy Carter's dismal presidency drew to a close, his field of vision was narrowed to an embassy in Tehran. On Richard Nixon's last day, all he could see was a tape recorder. When Lyndon Johnson left office, all was forgotten but Vietnam. After his speech to the nation last week urging a larger troop commitment in Iraq, it seemed President Bush was destined to go down the same narrowing road to oblivion.

But his State of the Union speech Tuesday night boldly broadened his presidential agenda and vision. He once again became the president of the United States, not the mayor of Baghdad. By articulating viable, and potentially bi-partisan, proposals on energy independence, global climate change, healthcare, immigration reform, education standards and a host of other issues, he renewed the 360-degree mandate that should be the span of vision of any president.

And even as he hewed to a strict line on Iraq, he broadened his foreign policy vision to encompass the danger posed by Iran's potential for acquiring nuclear weapons and his domestic agenda to highlight his administration's breathtaking success in thwarting terrorist attacks at home. Missing only was a focus on North Korea, which cannot be allowed to keep its nuclear arsenal without provoking a nuclear arms race among China, Japan and North Korea that will leave Washington, Seoul, Tokyo and Beijing scared to death.

President Bush even found time to discuss his singular achievements: the economy, oil prices and the falling deficit. In recent months he has seemed to ignore his own track record as he pleaded for a longer tenure in Iraq. But the economy is growing nicely and its surging tax revenues — particularly from capital gains — lead some experts to predict the same kind of rapid deficit eradication as buoyed Clinton's last years as president. And oil prices are dropping; we see their reflection as gas prices hover around $2 per gallon.

George W. Bush finally seems to have grasped a crucial but ironic fact: The only way he can keep sufficient credibility and power to continue his commitment to victory in Iraq is to raise his approval ratings. The presidency's inherent powers are largely titular unless animated by national support and popularity. While an unpopular president still gets the corner office, his practical ability to act is severely constrained. There is an ongoing need for a daily majority in his national approval ratings for him to govern.

But the only way he can get those ratings — in order to continue to fight in Iraq — is to talk about issues other than Iraq! Even if the war begins to go well, the blood and violence will continue and he will always come out on the short end of the national debate about the war. But if he expands his constituency by addressing issues like global warming, energy independence, and the Iranian and North Korean nuclear threats, he can achieve the approval ratings he needs to govern — and to fight on in Iraq.

Americans will always make time to listen up when the subject is the possibility of a nuclear war. Bush can command a national consensus as he moves against Iran and North Korea. We will pay close attention to anything he does to reduce our dependence on foreign oil and will hail any initiatives that lead to greater consumption of alternatives to gasoline. And Americans are sufficiently cognizant of the dangers posed by climate change to welcome the president to the fold if he indicates a real desire to turn the corner and stop the progression of deadly worldwide warming.

In our hearts and our heads, we realize that the stakes involved in these issues are more important than those in Iraq. If Bush leads the way on these subjects, Americans will follow and even cheer. If he insists on slogging on in Iraq, a majority will continue to be pessimistic and discouraged, but Bush will still be able to summon their support by a focus on the broader agenda on display in Tuesday's address.

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

RICHMOND, Jan. 24 -- U.S. Sen. James Webb (D-Va.) earned a full day of praise -- and some tough rhetorical jabs -- for his sharply worded response Tuesday night to President Bush's State of the Union address.

Liberal bloggers, national pundits and local Virginia politicians said the freshman senator's critique of the economy and the Iraq war was among the best retorts to Bush's administration they could remember.

"In office only three weeks, [Webb] managed to convey a muscular liberalism -- with personal touches -- that left President Bush's ordinary address in the dust," Jonathan Alter said on Newsweek's Web site.

In his speech, Webb ignored the laundry list of issues that many of his predecessors have felt compelled to mention in such responses. Instead, he focused on only two issues: the economic divide between rich and poor and the difficulties in Iraq. He campaigned on the same themes last year.

Jeff Cohen, writing on the Huffington Post, a liberal blog, cited the nine-minute speech's "stirring appeal, both progressive and patriotic," and said it would have broad appeal for "swing voters, NASCAR dads, soccer moms, even Republican leaners."

Not all of the reaction was positive. Conservatives scoffed at Webb's less-than-animated demeanor. One blog headline commented on Webb's constant seriousness with the headline: "Dem Response: Countdown to Webb's Aneurysm."

And some assailed his adherence to the Democratic orthodoxy, especially on the Iraq war.

"Senator Webb's logic was as incoherent as his language (the two are often related)," wrote Michael J. Gerson, a former Bush speechwriter, also on the Newsweek site. "No 'precipitous withdrawal' -- but retreat 'in short order.' Fight the war on terror vigorously -- except where the terrorists have chosen to fight it. It is, perhaps, a good thing that James Webb earned a job as senator. As a speechwriter he would starve."

DOJ_NMG_0121652

Webb, who has written several books, said in a radio interview Wednesday morning that he threw away the first draft of the speech suggested by Democratic leaders in Congress. He wrote a new draft that became the speech he delivered Tuesday night.

The speech did not specifically offer a solution to the war or attack the president's plan to send an additional 21,000 troops to Iraq. But Wednesday, Webb issued a statement saying that he supports a bipartisan resolution opposing the plan for such an increase.

"It is inverted political logic for people to say that we need to continue in this direction for the good of our troops," Webb said in the statement.

But Webb did receive praise from some conservatives. Columnist David Brooks called Webb's speech "intense," "eloquent" and "forceful." Liberal counterpart Mark Shields said "it was a strong, tough statement, and surprising in its intensity."

Reaction among Virginians was similar. Lawmakers in Richmond from both parties said they generally liked the speech, as did Northern Virginia Democrats, who were key to Webb's victory over incumbent Sen. George Allen last year.

Jessica Smith, Webb's communications director, said the senator "is encouraged to see that his response -- with its themes of economic fairness and affirmative leadership in Iraq -- is being well received across party lines."

"He doesn't show a whole lot of emotion and ability to communicate to the audience," said U.S. Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.). "I don't think that matters. I think that's a mark of the fact that he's genuine. I find his personality refreshing. I find the content of what he has to say very persuasive."

And Webb's performance fired up the young liberals who campaigned for him last year. A group of them -- who called themselves the Webb Brigade during the election -- gathered at Bailey's Pub and Grille in Arlington on Tuesday night to watch the speech.

"To the people who have become such loyal followers of Jim, we're motivated by the fact that he's willing to fight for what he believes in," said Jim McBride, 32, who organized the party. "We are waiting for the Democratic Party to fight the way Jim is fighting."

Reagan Democrat (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Like him or not, Ronald ("Tear Down This Wall") Reagan spoke in a clean, clear prose that almost always left listeners with a sense that he stood for something.

It may thus be no accident that Jim Webb, Virginia's new Democratic senator, was once a Reaganite.

In his reply to President Bush's State of the Union speech on Tuesday night, Webb defined the two central moral issues that animate most of the Democratic Party's rank and file: the mess in Iraq and the fact that the fruits of a growing economy are not being shared by all Americans.

Then Webb did something rather astonishing: He didn't fudge on his language or try to take the hard edge off his impatience with the status quo.

Giving the speech in response to a president's State of the Union address may be the hardest assignment in politics. Even the best of the genre reek of focus-grouped and poll-tested sentences. You have the feeling the words are dictated by some party pooh-bah who believes the speech will fail if it does not touch all the issues on every strategist's list.

Gee, say the consultants to the poor politician who has to carry the party's torch, you just have to mention health care and child care and the environment and union rights and stem cell research -- and every other issue that energizes some base voter in some corner of the party.

And, oh yes, Mr. Politician, don't forget that your real targets are those critical moderate independent swing voters in the Midwestern and Rocky Mountain states, and here's a list of key phrases we've polled to death that they respond to. You have to throw them in somewhere.

Ever wonder why politicians are so often accused of offering mush?

There was no mush from Webb. On the contrary, he tried only to make his two points, on Iraq and inequality, and he showed what he was upset about.

Many Democrats tremble that they will be accused by some right-wing Web site or presidential spokesman of waging class warfare. Webb made clear that there is a class war going on and that the wrong side is winning it.

"When I graduated from college, the average corporate CEO made 20 times what the average worker did," Webb said. "Today, it's nearly 400 times."

Yes, that's a standard sort of line from your standard progressive speech. But then came this arresting sentence: "In other words, it takes the average worker more than a year to make the money that his or her boss makes in one day."

DOJ_NMG_0121653

Examine that closely. How many politicians out there raising campaign contributions from rich people are willing to use "boss" instead of a more respectful locution?

And by talking about the time it takes someone to earn a buck, Webb makes it impossible for anyone to forget how vast the inequalities in our society have become.

Webb knows whom he is fighting for. "We're working," he said, "to get the right things done, for the right people and for the right reasons."

On Iraq, Webb did not mince his words about Bush's responsibility. "The president took us into this war recklessly," he declared.

Instead of qualifying this strong statement, Webb backed it up: "He disregarded warnings from the national security adviser during the first Gulf War, the chief of staff of the Army, two former commanding generals of the Central Command. . . . " The list more than supported Webb's next thought, that "we are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable -- and predicted -- disarray that has followed."

Okay, even Webb held back on a couple of politically sensitive points. He offered workers an all-purpose promise on the trade issue that so divides his party. "Government," he said, "has a duty to insist that their concerns be dealt with fairly in the international marketplace."

And, yes, he simultaneously came out against "a precipitous withdrawal" from Iraq and in favor of "a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq." Philosophers and lexicographers might debate the difference between the words "precipitous" and "short order."

But Webb's performance was a salutary sign that Democrats just might be getting over the battered party syndrome that has left so many of them terrified of saying exactly what's on their minds. Then again, maybe Webb was just speaking for himself. Having lived on the Republican side of politics during the Democrats' most traumatic years, he may have escaped the traumas associated with defeat.

University Holds Meeting On Bush Library (WP)

By Matthew C. Wright

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

DALLAS, Jan. 24 -- Members of the Southern Methodist University faculty again raised concerns that the building of the George W. Bush presidential library on campus might damage the school's reputation, said a participant at a closed-door meeting on Wednesday.

At the tightly guarded meeting, several members of the faculty questioned school president R. Gerald Turner about the political institute that will accompany the library. The institute will conduct research on issues that will be determined by Bush. Many of the questioners wondered whether such a powerful institution on campus will influence the type of research that can be conducted by SMU faculty and whether it will have an impact on the university's reputation.

"We're worried about a group of people on campus with a lot of money and a lot of power who aren't concerned for our values as an academy," Dennis Foster, a professor of English and a faculty senate member said, according to a participant in the meeting who asked not to be identified.

Turner responded by saying that because the institute will be governed by a separate board, any controversy would not reflect poorly on the university.

"The tail will not wag the dog," he said, according to the participant.

No official action was taken during the meeting. Faculty members will relay any further concerns to the faculty senate, which will then summarize them and present a list to Turner. Turner said after the meeting that he will take the concerns into advisement as he goes into negotiations with the president's site-selection committee in the coming weeks.

"I think the faculty is working its way toward a consensus on this," said James F. Hollifield, the director of the Tower Center for Political Studies on campus. He said that the main thing for many faculty members was just "getting their questions answered."

In reality, the faculty can do little to stop the library because several university leaders, including Turner, are committed to bringing it to SMU.

SMU, the alma mater of Laura Bush, was named the sole finalist for the library in December. The site selection committee -- which includes Bush's former chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., and former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans -- requested that any proposals for the library include plans for a public policy institute. In the meeting Wednesday, many faculty members expressed concerns that the Bush institute would become nothing more than a conservative think tank working to advance the ideologies and policies of the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0121654

The controversy began in November when two faculty members wrote in the school newspaper criticizing the absence of university-wide discussion about the library. The editorial also questioned the ethics of pursuing a presidential library "regardless of an administration's record and its consequences," a reference to the war in Iraq.

President To Request Fast Track Next Week (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, January 25, 2007

President Bush will ask Congress to extend fast-track negotiating authority in one of two speeches on the economy next week, according to administration sources, after choosing not to make the request in his State of the Union address.

Without fast track, which expires at the end of June, the administration would lose the ability to send free-trade agreements to Congress for up-or-down votes. This would make it virtually impossible for the administration to negotiate bilateral deals or a World Trade Organization agreement it is trying to conclude.

The White House intends to announce more details of next week's economic speeches today, according to White House Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto. He said President Bush intends to get his trade agenda completed, and this would include a continuation of fast track.

The president asked Congress to renew fast track in his State of the Union addresses in 2001 and 2002, but wanted the 2007 address to focus on other issues, including subjects such as healthcare and energy that might provide more common ground with Democrats, Fratto said. He added that Bush wants to speak more expansively about trade and other economic issues, and said the State of the Union address would not have allowed this.

Business lobbyists said they were not disappointed, even though the president mentioned trade only once in the 6,000-word address. They said the administration appeared to be taking a pragmatic approach to dealing with a Congress that could be hostile to the administration's trade agenda.

Asking for a fast-track extension in the State of the Union address would have been an "in-your-face" gesture that would not have improved the atmosphere for actually winning an extension, according to Nicole Venable of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which she said would likely lead business efforts to extend fast track with the Business Roundtable.

Venable said the administration's approach will allow discussions between U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and other key Democrats to evolve, which could create a better climate for the approval of a new fast-track law that will have to differ from the current law to be approved.

Opposition to the administration's trade agenda was highlighted in the Democratic response to the State of the Union delivered by freshman Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.), who is one of several new Democrats seen as critical of free-trade policies.

"Our manufacturing base is being dismantled and sent overseas," said Webb, who added that workers "expect, rightly, that in this age of globalization, their government has a duty to insist that their concerns be dealt with fairly in the international marketplace."

Venable said conversations between the administration and congressional Democrats have yet to kick into gear. Schwab met Rangel, ranking member Jim McCrery (R-La.) and Rep. Sandy Levin (D-Mich.) last week to discuss the trade agenda, which a committee spokesman described as a listening session. Levin, in a release, expressed disappointment that the president had not mentioned the challenges of globalization.

Rangel still plans to organize a retreat for committee members and Schwab, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and other administration officials on economic issues, but no date for that meeting has been set. Ways and Means has also scheduled a hearing on trade and globalization on Jan. 30.

A new fast-track law will have to be shaped to fit the positions of Rangel and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who has said Congress should renew fast track with some changes. A spokeswoman for Baucus said he has no concrete plans to introduce legislation extending fast track at this time.

Fratto said the administration believes it can find common ground with Democrats worried about rising economic populism in their party.

Delaying the request also gives U.S. negotiators more time to craft a possible deal in the current round of World Trade Organization talks launched in 2001, Venable and other business- and farm-group lobbyists said. This could be used as an incentive to get Congress to extend fast track, since other WTO members would be unlikely to negotiate seriously with the U.S. if a deal could be amended by Congress.

National Foreign Trade Council President William Reinsch said Congress is unlikely to grant the Bush administration a fast-track extension unless there is some tangible trade deal that will not be completed without it. Getting an extension "requires an engine, and the engine is getting the round going," Reinsch said. "If you don't, people are going to say they're busy. Why waste time on negotiating [fast track] if there's not going to be a deal to negotiate?"

The Doha round has been sputtering for years, but efforts have stepped up in recent weeks, partly because the U.S. sees progress in the round as giving it leverage in the upcoming fight over a new farm bill. Administration officials have been consulting with agriculture-group representatives to weigh their views on a possible agreement with the European Union in which the U.S. would agree to reduce its farm subsidies in exchange for the EU reducing tariffs on farm goods.

One agriculture lobbyist said the U.S. and EU appear to be within "spitting distance" of an agreement, but cautioned that a preliminary deal between the U.S. and EU would still have to be sold to other WTO members.

If the administration reaches a tentative deal on basic figures for reducing agriculture tariffs and subsidies, it could present an argument to Congress that a fast-track extension is necessary to conclude a multilateral round, which would be the first completed since the Uruguay Round in 1994. Schwab has acknowledged it would be impossible to conclude WTO talks under current fast-track authority.

Some observers believe the administration could also cast blame on congressional Democrats for blocking a multilateral deal if they oppose extending fast track. However, Venable and Reinsch, who both worked in the Clinton administration, said they do not think the Bush administration is driven on fast track by political calculations, but by the desire to move forward on trade. Venable said she does not think anyone is "so sinister" as to be figuring out an endgame of blame for the fast-track fight.

Tax Break Talks Slow Minimum Wage Hike (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, January 25, 2007

The minimum wage increase that was supposed to zip through Congress veered onto a collision course Wednesday as lawmakers argued over business tax breaks that would be attached to ensure Republican support.

Democratic leaders in the House began laying groundwork to blame the Republicans for any impasse. Senate Democrats, however, cautioned their House colleagues not to jeopardize legislation they'd promised to approve if they gained control of Congress.

House Democrats demanded a clean bill from the Senate — no tax attachment — setting up a confrontation that could delay final congressional passage of the $2.10 an hour increase.

The Senate did vote 54-43 to advance a House-passed measure that would lift the pay floor without any accompanying tax cut. However, that was well short of the 60 votes needed to keep that version moving.

The vote was a signal to the House that without the tax breaks a minimum wage bill appeared doomed in the Senate. And the Senate promptly moved to a broader bill, backed by its Democratic leaders, that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour over 26 months and provide $8.3 billion in tax benefits to businesses over 10 years.

In the House, Democrats threatened to stifle that effort by enforcing constitutional precedents that require all tax bills to originate in the House. They blamed Republicans for the brewing impasse.

"Democrats are committed to helping small businesses, but we should not delay a minimum wage increase another day in order to negotiate a tax package," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Senate Democrats seemed more willing to accept the tax portion if it meant fulfilling their campaign promise.

House Democrats could try to alter or even remove the tax package from the Senate version when the two houses try to reconcile their differing versions in a conference committee.

In the meantime, the confrontation exposed difficulties the Democratic majority may well encounter when sending other House legislation to the Senate, where the minority Republicans enjoy more power to shape legislation than in the House.

Still, in a separate vote Wednesday, the Senate effectively killed a modified line-item veto bill. The Republican-inspired measure would have permitted a president to pluck individual items out of spending bills and submit them to Congress for a vote.

Senators also defeated a Republican amendment that would have given only the states the right to increase the minimum wage.

The federal minimum wage has been unchanged for 10 years. In the meantime, a number of states have moved on their own to increase their minimums.

According to the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal leaning think tank, inflation has eroded the value of the minimum wage to its lowest level in more than 50 years.

"Minimum wage workers are men and women of dignity," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., a longtime advocate of raising the wage floor, said. "They do some of the most difficult, backbreaking jobs in our society. They deserve a fair wage that respects the dignity of their work and they shouldn't have to live in poverty."

DOJ_NMG_0121656

Since the House passed its version two weeks ago, Speaker Pelosi, D-Calif., and Rep. Charles Rangel, the chairman of the taxwriting Ways and Means Committee, have prodded the Senate to keep tax proposals out of the bill.

In scheduling the vote Wednesday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sought to demonstrate the lack of Republican support for a straight minimum wage bill without tax cuts. Every Democrat present voted to cut off debate and five moderate Republicans joined them.

"There seems to be agreement to raise the minimum wage," said Republican Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming. "The difficulty has been how do we take care of some of the impact to small businesses that will result from this."

Reid is backing an $8.3 billion tax package that would extend for five years a tax credit for employers who hire low-income or disadvantaged workers. It also extends until 2010 tax rules that permit businesses to combine as much as $112,000 in expenses into one annual tax deduction.

The cost of the proposal would be paid with revenue realized from a proposed cap of $1 million on executive compensation that can be tax deferred. The tax package also would end deductions for court settlements or punitive damages paid by companies that have been sued.

Those proposed revenue increases have drawn opposition from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which has urged senators to vote against them.

"These are permanent tax law changes that hat have significant impact on the broad business community," Bruce Josten, the chamber's top lobbyist, said in an interview.

Effort To Move On Minimum Wage Bill Falters In Senate (NYT)

By Bloomberg

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 (Bloomberg) — Senate Republicans rejected an effort by Democrats to pass minimum-wage legislation without breaks for small businesses on Wednesday, setting the stage for a potential impasse with the House, where lawmakers are demanding a “clean” bill.

The Senate vote of 54 to 43 was six votes short of the 60 needed to move ahead with a wage measure that does not include tax benefits for employers. Earlier this month, the Senate Finance Committee voted to add $8.3 billion in tax breaks to the bill.

Leaders of the new Democratic-led Congress have said raising the federal minimum wage for the first time in 10 years, to $7.25 an hour from the current $5.15, is a priority. The measure may now be headed for deadlock. Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, has suggested he will block any minimum-wage measure that includes tax provisions.

A spokesman for Mr. Rangel, Matthew Beck, said Wednesday: “The Senate needs to pass a clean bill. They shouldn’t hold the minimum wage hostage.”

The House passed its minimum-wage measure on Jan. 10.

Mr. Rangel notes that the Constitution requires tax-related legislation to originate in the House.

Under Congressional rules, Mr. Rangel can block House consideration of the Senate’s minimum-wage measure. Any legislation would have to be reconciled between the two chambers before being sent to President Bush for his signature.

Mr. Bush has said he supports raising the national minimum wage as long as the legislation includes tax relief for small businesses that might face increased labor costs.

Roundtable Setup Left Some Republicans Feeling Like Squares (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

In case you were wondering how the Republicans were adjusting to their new minority status, consider this painful story.

Democratic Rep. Jim Oberstar of Minnesota, the new chairman of the House Transportation Committee, wanted to show members of his panel how bipartisanship and policymaking can work in tandem. So the chairman, along with ranking Republican John Mica (Fla.), organized a roundtable discussion for members last week. And to drive home the point, Oberstar invited back Bud Shuster (R-Pa.), the retired Republican chairman of the committee.

It seemed like a great idea until Mica arrived for the roundtable and discovered that he did not have one of the nice, cushy chairs at the head of the table that were occupied by Oberstar, Shuster and other speakers, including New York financier Felix Rohatyn.

According to sources, none of whom wanted to be anywhere near this story, Mica threw a fit and demanded to know from staff why he didn't have a special chair of his own next to Oberstar and the others.

DOJ_NMG_0121657

But before staff could rectify the situation, and as startled members looked on, a furious Mica stormed out of the room and ordered the other Republican members to leave. Among the uncomfortable departees was Shuster's own son and successor, Rep. Bill Shuster.

A source close to Mica acknowledged last night that the congressman was "very upset" because he "wants to be sure members of the minority are treated with the respect."

But after hearing from Oberstar later, the source said, Mica knows the slight was unintentional, and there are no hard feelings.

Note to other Republicans: Bring your slights to us. We'll help you air them.

Meanwhile, on the Other Side of the Aisle . . .

After years of tension between House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) , the two appear to be getting along much better these days, or so report the staff and allies of the Democratic leadership.

They say the tension and mistrust that long existed between the two native Marylanders is no longer evident.

She no longer seems to be keeping him in the dark on insider maneuvering, and he no longer feels as if he's being kept out of the loop.

"They both realized that they have to get along to succeed," said a former leadership aide who knows them well.

Take Hoyer's meeting on Tuesday with committee chairmen, a weekly event chaired by Hoyer that at one time no one could have imagined Pelosi relinquishing. According to one source at the meeting, Hoyer unequivocally defended Pelosi's decision to create a select committee on global warming, beating back complaints from unhappy chairmen concerned about turf.

But Pelosi is the one who has made the more significant turnaround, Hill sources say.

For reasons that are still unclear to many Democrats, Pelosi kept Hoyer at a distance as her No. 2 when they were in the minority. But members thought the partnership nonetheless worked well and were shocked when she aggressively supported Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) for majority leader.

After Hoyer trounced her guy, and after she was elected speaker, observers say her attitude toward Hoyer changed. Most unexpectedly, Pelosi was comfortable sharing power with him, giving him voice in committee assignments and full rein on the floor schedule.

"What you're seeing," said someone close to her, "is Nancy coming into her own. She more confident, more relaxed. She doesn't think he's submarining her anymore." Stay tuned.Some Days It's Just Not Worth Going to Work

His problems started when the allergist-turned- legislator jokingly told some local antiwar activists last month that he aggressively confronted Karl Rove in a White House men's room. "You're in the White House and think you're safe, huh?" Kagen told the activists, according to a report in a monthly alternative publication.

"You recognize me? My name's Dr. Multimillionaire, and I kicked your [expletive]."

Kagen also said that he blocked Rove's exit in the bathroom of the White House and then deliberately called Laura Bush "Barbara" to insult her.

By the time the odd remarks were picked up by the mainstream media, they were reported as fact -- along with a White House response calling Kagen's account "ridiculous."

Confronted at a news conference about the remarks, Kagen awkwardly backed away from them, saying he was "thrilled" to meet the president and first lady and never insulted anybody. But he declined to clarify what did happen, and the brouhaha wouldn't die as the media continued to chronicle Kagen's various versions of his White House excursion.

The furor was finally quelled when the congressman wrote an op-ed piece published Sunday in several home-state papers. "I apologize for handling this situation as I did. I allowed this distraction to get out of hand and divert our attention from the critically important work we are doing," he said. "My mishandled attempt at humor wasn't delivered or received well. It won't happen again."

Asked whether the lawmaker understands now the danger of exaggerating in politics -- even in jest -- an adviser to Kagen said: "One would hope."Thank You, Mr. President

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) watched Tuesday's State of the Union address from his room at George Washington University Hospital and was touched that President Bush acknowledged him, a spokeswoman for the senator said. Johnson has been in the hospital since Dec. 14, when he underwent brain surgery, and his recovery has been slow.

The senator was transferred from intensive care to a rehabilitation unit at the hospital two weeks ago, and he is starting to talk.

"It is not a conversation yet, but it's progress," said Julieanne Fisher, the spokeswoman. "He is saying words, and he understands."

DOJ_NMG_0121658

A statement on his Web site says "he has been working with parallel bars and participating in speech therapy, including naming objects." He also ate a hamburger.

In his speech, Bush also singled out Republican Rep. Charles Norwood of Georgia, who is being treated for a recurrence of cancer that has developed near his kidney.

"Two members of the House and Senate are not with us tonight," the president said, "and we pray for [their] recovery and speedy return."

Norwood's staff said he was "thrilled" by the president's wishes. The congressman is receiving chemotherapy as an inpatient at Inova Mount Vernon Hospital, spokesman John Stone said.

Desire To Be In Driver's Seat Takes Back Seat At Auto Show (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

Washington Post, January 25, 2007

A highly choreographed peace accord was reached in the middle of the Washington Convention Center yesterday, when Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) escorted House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) through the auto show, hoping to smooth over the public rift that erupted between them last week.

Pelosi irritated Dingell by announcing her desire to create a special committee on global warming. As chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Dingell had planned hearings on global warming and saw Pelosi's proposed committee as an affront to his authority. Dingell, the longest-serving House member, sent a memo to colleagues that called special committees as relevant as "feathers on a fish." He and others threatened to fight Pelosi's plan.

Pelosi, meanwhile, believes Democrats must show a sense of urgency about carbon emissions and has called for an aggressive schedule that would develop legislation to address the problem by July. She thinks a select committee on energy independence and climate change would demonstrate the party is serious about action.

To soften the edges of the turf battle, Dingell's wife, Debbie, an executive with General Motors Corp., suggested that he invite Pelosi to the Washington Auto Show to see the hybrid vehicles manufactured in his home state.

Which is how Dingell and Pelosi wound up riding in an electric golf cart through the cavernous convention hall, past the banana-yellow Hummers and blue Saab convertibles until they reached the small display of hybrids in the back.

They were trailed by a group of photographers and reporters, who pinned them up against a baby-blue Ford Escape hybrid that runs on ethanol. Two Ford salesmen appeared and opened the doors so Pelosi could see the car's pale gray interior. Pelosi nodded appreciatively as the salesmen talked about capacity and mileage. The group strode to the rear and gazed into the open hatchback.

Cameras clicked.

Dingell and Pelosi refused to answer questions about whether they had resolved their dispute over the special committee or saw eye-to-eye on global warming.

"I won't talk to you about that now," Dingell said.

"That's not the subject we're here to discuss today," Pelosi said.

"She's here to learn about our business and be supportive," Dingell said, putting an arm against her back.

"I was honored by the invitation," Pelosi said.

Cameras clicked.

Pelosi allowed that she bought a Jeep Cherokee in 1976 and has owned several in the years since but does not drive herself around anymore. She said she'd like to ride in a hybrid SUV, but her security team forbids it.

"They said it was something about the size," she said.

Cameras clicked.

Then, 20 minutes of peacemaking over, Pelosi, Dingell and their entourage walked to a rear exit and climbed into two gas-guzzling Chevy Suburbans.

Capitol Hill Power Shift Could Aid Philip Morris (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'connell And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

In many ways, the new Democratic Congress looks like big trouble for big tobacco.

Representative Henry A. Waxman (D., Calif.) -- long the industry's chief Capitol Hill scourge -- just became an important committee chairman. Loyal Republican allies of big tobacco are now in the minority, including John Boehner (R., Ohio), a smoker who in 1995 famously handed out checks from tobacco lobbyists on the House floor (he later apologized), and Roy Blunt (R., Mo.), whose wife is a lobbyist for Altria Group Inc., the parent of Philip Morris USA. (Mr. Blunt's office notes that his wife doesn't lobby the House.) Because of the changes on Capitol Hill, the public could be seeing all sorts of ideas floated that had sunk quickly before -- from a federal excise tax increase to photos of diseased lungs on cigarette packs.

From the point of view of the nation's largest cigarette maker, Philip Morris, the shift in power could be a blessing in disguise. That's because it could help ease the way for legislation to give the Food and Drug Administration new powers to control how cigarettes are made and marketed. That, ironically, could help Philip Morris maintain its current market domination.

The FDA doesn't regulate cigarettes. Under former commissioner David Kessler it tried years ago to claim jurisdiction over cigarettes as drug delivery devices -- the drug being nicotine -- but that effort was challenged by tobacco companies and rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Most tobacco companies are opposed to FDA regulation of cigarettes, which, among other things, would likely ban the use of descriptors such as "light" and "mild" and require big new warnings to cover at least 30% of cigarette packs.

Philip Morris, however, has embraced the idea that the FDA should have broad powers over tobacco. "Legislation that reduces the serious harm caused by smoking would be a very good development, and it is not about giving a competitive advantage to any one company," says Steven C. Parrish, senior vice president of corporate affairs for Altria.

The company's rivals contend that new restrictions would hurt them more because their brands are much less known than the famous Philip Morris Marlboro brand. With marketing potentially dramatically curtailed by FDA regulation, they would have fewer ways to promote themselves. The result, they say, would be that Marlboro would keep its market share. Philip Morris USA's share of the retail cigarette market was 50.4% as of the third quarter of 2006. Competitors such as Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., which markets Camel and Kool cigarettes, gripe that FDA regulation is the "Marlboro Monopoly Act."

Oversight by the FDA also would help Philip Morris develop a legal way to market its cigarette products that are meant to be less hazardous, such as Marlboro Ultra Smooth, which already have been selling in limited test markets but without any explicit health-related marketing claims. A bill in the works includes sections that define reduced-risk products, laying out how they can be marketed.

In coming weeks, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass), chairman of the Senate Health Committee, and Rep. Waxman, chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, are expected to formally introduce FDA tobacco legislation. Sen. Kennedy's plan is for hearings in February and a vote in his committee on the bill in March. Phillip Morris USA Chief Executive Officer Michael Szymanczyk, and other cigarette company chiefs, are expected to be asked to testify before Congress.

They could face tough questions about some new findings from researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health alleging that tobacco companies increased the level of addictive nicotine in their cigarettes. Philip Morris disputes the findings.

Another hot topic might be whether legislation should give the FDA power to demand that all cigarette makers reduce nicotine levels all the way to zero. In the past, Philip Morris has argued against that on the grounds that doing so would make cigarettes unacceptable to consumers.

Traditional antiregulatory sentiment on the part of the Republicans has proved an obstacle to passage of FDA regulation. The Democrats' win in November means that legislation to regulate tobacco has more votes than in the last session of Congress. But with a presidential race gearing up, and the congressional clock always racing, many bills may fall by the wayside as priorities shift.

Rep. Waxman has been particularly tough on cigarette makers. In 1994, he called cigarettes "the single most dangerous consumer product ever sold," and he was chairman of the hearings that exposed major tobacco executives over the health risks of smoking. Seven executives declared, under oath, that nicotine isn't addictive. The companies have reversed course. Reynolds suggests smokers rely on the conclusions of the U.S. Surgeon General, and other public-health and medical officials, while Philip Morris USA agrees cigarettes are harmful.

Now Rep. Waxman will be in the position of arguably aiding Philip Morris by introducing the FDA bill on the House side. His spokeswoman said yesterday that the bill could come soon and would likely give the FDA the power to regulate nicotine but not eliminate it.

"I don't think there's been any love between Philip Morris and Henry Waxman," said Rep. Waxman in an interview yesterday, noting that he is aware that some employees of the cigarette maker used to mock him as "Hollywood Henry" -- a likely reference to the fact that he invited movie stars and celebrities to his hearings. "I don't care about Philip Morris's interests," he added. "Cigarettes -- as dangerous as they are -- are the only consumer products that are completely unregulated by the federal government."

Among the antitobacco measures Democrats might take would be increasing the federal cigarette excise tax, now 39 cents. The last increase was legislated in 1997.

Antitobacco advocates also hope there might be political opportunities for the U.S. to finally ratify the terms of a World Health Organization treaty known as the Framework Convention on Tobacco Control. The U.S. signed it in 2004, and about 143 other countries have ratified it, including the United Kingdom, Japan, and Canada. The treaty calls for a ban of terms such as "light" and "low tar" and would require text or pictorial warnings covering at least 30% of each tobacco pack.

In Canada and some other countries using pictures, the images include a diseased lung and a drooping cigarette to show tobacco's ill effects on male sexuality. The odds of passage this year are uncertain because the State Department has yet to introduce the legislation that would make the treaty's terms legally binding.

"We agree with most of the treaty's core principles, and we want to engage with the rest of the world to help bring them up to our standards," White House deputy press secretary Tony Fratto said Wednesday. "The treaty requires statutory changes that we would have to make before ratifying it, and also raises some constitutional concerns -- particularly with respect to the First Amendment. I can't say at this time how quickly those issues would be resolved."

Another likely move would be to pass legislation that would limit Internet sales of tobacco products. In the last Congress, there was debate about providing the states additional authority to ensure that state taxes were paid. The proposal is likely to surface again this year, says Wendy K.D. Selig, lobbyist for the American Cancer Society in Washington.

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — The Democratic majority in the House restored limited floor voting rights to the Congressional delegates from the District of Columbia and four territories on Wednesday after a rancorous debate with echoes of the days before the Republicans won the majority in 1994.

The change approved on a party-line vote of 226 to 191 was mostly symbolic because the five delegates will be allowed to vote just on floor amendments, not on final approval of bills.

If their votes influence the outcome on amendments, a new vote will be taken without their participation.

The return of the privileges, first allowed by Democrats in 1993 and rescinded by Republicans in 1995, resulted in Republicans' pouring out their frustration about their treatment by Democrats in the first weeks of Congress. The sour mood threatened efforts at forging a more cooperative relationship between the parties.

"We've extended the hand of friendship to each other in hopes of working together for the common good," Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, said as he accused Democrats of trampling House rules. "Unfortunately, the hand of friendship is being slapped away by the actions of the majority."

Democrats responded by suggesting that Republicans were demeaning the role of the delegates who represent the Virgin Islands, Guam, Puerto Rico and American Samoa and refusing to recognize that the five million residents of those territories and the District of Columbia deserve representation on the House floor.

Democrats noted that residents of the territories were among the people being killed and wounded in Iraq.

"The House is ordained to be a marketplace of ideas," Speaker Nancy Pelosi said. "We should work to expand democracy, not limit it."

Delegate Eni F. H. Faleomavaega, Democrat of American Samoa, bristled at Republican gibes that he would be able to vote on the floor when he represents 60,000 residents compared with the approximately 600,000 in a typical Congressional district.

"I am saddened this has gotten to the point where we are caught in this crossfire," Mr. Faleomavaega said about the broader dispute over Democratic management of the House.

Republicans said the proposal on delegate voting was one more Democratic initiative rushed to the floor without committee hearings. They called it an unconstitutional power grab and derided it as "representation without taxation," because residents of the territories do not pay federal income taxes though residents of the District of Columbia do.

"Under this rule, the majority party could seat anybody in the House," said Representative Tom Price, Republican of Georgia.

Referring to the chairman of the national Democratic Party, Mr. Price asked: "Who is next? Howard Dean? He has a significant constituency."

Republicans used similar tirades at Democrats, accusing them of arrogance in their operation of the House when they instituted delegate voting rights in 1993. A court challenge failed when a judge ruled that the voting was essentially meaningless and thus was not unconstitutional. On taking control of the House, Republicans reversed the rule.

Delegates Gain Limited Voting Rights (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The House gave D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton the right yesterday to vote on amendments to bills on the House floor, a privilege that legislators acknowledged is largely symbolic.

The action, pushed through by the new Democratic-led House, restores a right that Norton (D) and four other non-state representatives received in 1993. It was taken away two years later, after Republicans won control of the House.

Norton has been pushing for passage of a much broader bill that would give her a full vote. She supported the limited measure yesterday but expressed concern that it could slow the momentum toward giving the District a full vote by confusing activists and increasing tension with Republicans.

"This debate is extremely heartbreaking for me," Norton said in an impassioned floor speech, after Republicans assailed the rule change. She questioned why lawmakers were arguing about the constitutionality of the limited measure, when the courts had upheld it in the 1990s. She said Congress should instead be considering the broader bill, which supporters call their best hope in years of getting the District a full vote in the House.

Norton and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) recently reintroduced that bill, which would add two seats to the House -- one for the overwhelmingly Democratic District and another for Utah, a Republican bastion. Until now, Norton has been able to vote only in House committees.

The rule change that was approved "offers so little for Americans who have given so much," Norton lamented.

The measure allows Norton and representatives from Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa and the Virgin Islands to vote in the Committee of the Whole, where amendments to legislation are considered.

But it comes with an important caveat: If the delegates' votes provide the margin of victory, their votes are thrown out and representatives revote without them.

The measure passed 226 to 191 on a party-line vote. Democratic supporters acknowledged that it provided mainly symbolic privileges but said it would give delegates greater participation in Congress.

"It is not enough what we do today," said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who has expressed strong support for the District having a full vote in the House. "But it would be tragic if we do not do this basic step."

Republicans attacked the measure, saying it was unconstitutional and a power grab by Democrats.

Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.) noted that four of the five non-state representatives who benefit from the rule change are Democrats.

"They want to cushion their numbers" in votes on amendments, he said during the debate.

Other Republicans expressed concern that the rule change was the first step toward offering full voting rights to the territories. And some suggested it would be used in legislative maneuvers to benefit Democrats.

Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.) noted that the last time the measure was in effect, the Democratic-controlled House had numerous revotes on amendments, though it was rare that the delegates affected the margin of victory. During the revotes, he said, representatives often changed sides.

"We're going to embark on another legal struggle, just as we did 14 years ago," to defeat the measure, he declared.

House Republicans filed suit in U.S. District Court in 1993, citing a violation of the Constitution. But Judge Harold H. Greene ruled in favor of Norton and the other delegates, saying their votes posed no constitutional problems because they were "symbolic" and therefore "meaningless." That decision was upheld on appeal.

GOP May Sue Over Delegates' Vote (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, January 25, 2007

After a contentious floor debate Wednesday, the House voted to give the chamber's five Delegates the right to vote in the Committee of the Whole — but Republicans are considering challenging the rules change in court.

The House passed the measure, 226 -191, after a series of protests from Republicans, who claimed the vote was an unconstitutional power grab by the new majority.

Rep. Tom Price (R-Ga.), who spent much of his week rallying against the proposal, called it "flawed policy" and said Republicans will continue to fight it.

"At this point, because there are internal rules, the only option we have is through the courts," Price said. "We'll be in discussions with that."

DOJ_NMG_0121662

According to the rules change, Democratic Dels. Madeleine Bordallo (Guam), Donna Christian-Christensen (V.I.), Eni Faleomavaega (America Samoa) and Eleanor Holmes Norton (D.C.), along with Resident Commissioner Luis Fortuño (R-P.R.), can vote on amendments to bills but not the final passage. Plus, if a Delegate casts the deciding vote on a bill, the Delegate votes are thrown out and a revote takes place.

Democrats argued that the vote is a symbolic gesture to the nearly 5 million Americans who live in Washington, D.C., and the territories.

"What are we really giving them? A chance to participate in democracy," said Rep. José Serrano (D-N.Y.), who was born in Puerto Rico. "How can we be willing to spread democracy around the world when we can't spread it here?"

Christian-Christensen said she is pleased to get the vote and called Republican arguments against the measure unfounded.

"None of their arguments were really good arguments," she said. "The only thing I can go back to is the politics. I think they should have been honest and said, 'We don't want to have four Democratic Delegates.'"

If Republicans decide to go to court, it won't be the first time the Committee of the Whole vote has been challenged.

The U.S. Court of Appeals upheld the rules change after it was enacted during the 103rd Congress, with judges writing it does not go against the Constitution because it does not affect the overall outcome of a vote.

With that history behind him, Faleomavaega said he welcomes sending the measure back to the courts.

"I must say that I have never seen such a more divisive issue before the House for consideration," he said. "And I feel really bad... all we wanted was the symbolic vote."

Republicans threw out the vote when they took power after the 1994 elections. But GOP leaders said Wednesday that if the rules change were to reach the Supreme Court, they are confident it would be struck down.

Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.) led much of the floor protest, criticizing Democrats — specifically the Rules Committee, of which he is ranking member — for not bringing in Congressional experts and other observers to discuss the merits of the measure.

The Californian added that he does not believe the bill passes constitutional muster.

"If they want to vote in this body, Mr. Speaker, they should pursue statehood, plain and simple," Dreier said of the Delegates.

Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) called the measure an "outrageous grab of power" that creates a "breach of trust of the Members here."

"It saddens me there was no discussion about this with the minority," Boehner said, adding that Republicans got word of the proposal on Friday only when Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) released the weekly calendar.

Dreier also said he was disappointed Democrats did not withdraw an amendment presented in the Rules Committee by Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), even after Kirk submitted a letter requesting the committee do so. The amendment would have required the House Clerk certify in writing that the constituents of the delegates are covered by the federal tax code.

But one Democratic leadership aide said that things were handled correctly and the Republican outcry was unjustified.

"I think they're just trying to adjust to being in the minority, to be honest," the aide said.

That outcry seemed ironic to Christian-Christensen, especially because the Delegate with the most constituents — Fortuño, who represents about 4 million people — is a Republican, she said.

For Norton, the symbolic measure is far from her ultimate goal of obtaining a full House vote with the D.C. Fair and Equal House Voting Rights Act.

In an emotional six-minute speech on the House floor Wednesday morning, Norton criticized the way House leaders handled the rules change, which she said needlessly divided "the people's House about a right to vote settled 14 years ago."

"I say to my friends on the other side, 'There is nothing left to debate about,'" Norton said.

The Delegate grew angrier as she discussed the need for a swift vote on the D.C. voting-rights act.

"Why isn't H.R. 328 the first bill out of the Democratic Congress?" she asked.

Hoyer, who introduced the Delegate measure, said he is dedicated to giving D.C. a full vote "and we will address that shortly."

"To the cynic in me, this resolution smacks of obfuscation," Davis said. "What the majority is doing today threatens to delay action on the real injustice that has plagued the District for more than two centuries."

For Bordallo, the new power is worthwhile.

"This is a step forward," she said.

Political Confrontation In Church For Lawmaker (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON A Democratic congressman walked out of his Catholic church in Buffalo after a clergyman berated the lawmaker for his recent vote on stem cell research.The public tongue-lashing of Congressman Brian Higgins came during last Sunday morning's Mass at Saint Thomas Aquinas Catholic Church in South Buffalo.During Deacon Tom McDonnell's sermon, McDonnell criticized Higgins for voting earlier this month for a bill that would allow federal funding for research involving stem cell lines derived from surplus embryos created in fertility clinics.The Catholic church opposes embryonic stem cell research.As the clergyman spoke, Higgins -- who was baptized and married at Saint Aquinas -- walked out with his wife and son.Higgins says leaving was the appropriate thing to do.The Buffalo News reports that the pastor of the church offered an apology from the pulpit after the congressman had left.

Senate Shows Its Age; Health Problems Pose Challenge For Governing (POL)

By Jonathan Martin And John Bresnahan

The Politico, January 25, 2007

The average age of members of the U.S. Senate is older than it has ever been, according to Senate Historian Richard Baker. For many senators, advanced age is starting to show, raising questions about their ability to govern.

Until his retirement last month, former majority leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., a noted heart surgeon, was being consulted for informal medical advice by two dozen of his colleagues -- more than 20 percent of the Senate, according to a former leadership aide. They went to Frist complaining about a host of illnesses and chronic maladies, most related to aging.

Among them were Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., who flew on Frist's jet for private consultation and treatment at the Frist Clinic in Nashville, according to Senate sources.

The average age of the 100 senators is 62, up from 60 in the last Congress. Among the new Democratic committee chairmen, it is 69. And, of the five longest-serving senators, three are there today. Including the grand-daddy of seniority, Sen. Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., 89.

As far as illnesses, at least 10 senators have fought various cancers or suffered severe injuries. Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., remains hospitalized here for a brain hemorrhage suffered last month. And others deal with chronic and debilitating infirmities.

In the past, the clubby atmosphere of the Senate provided cover for its frailest members. No longer. Today, a senator's smallest stumble, nap or memory lapse gets instant and widespread public exposure online through blogs and videos posted on YouTube and other social-networking Web sites. (See related story.)

Few senators will talk publicly about their own health problems or those of their colleagues. But many sought counsel from one of their own, Frist. He offered informal and discreet medical advice to his colleagues and some spouses during his 12-year tenure, a former Senate leadership aide said.

"You would be surprised by the people who sought his advice" on health-related issues, said the former aide. "There was a steady flow of people in and out of the office." Frist declined to comment.

If the president appears in public wearing so much as a dime-sized bandage, the press demands, and usually gets, a detailed medical explanation from the White House. No one questions the public's right to know precisely and in full about the physical health and mental well-being of the commander in chief.

Closer to home, Americans routinely face the wrenching tasks of taking car keys away from elderly parents who can no longer drive safely, or delivering the necessary (but unwelcome) news that it's time for an infirm parent to move into assisted care.

Yet suggestions that an enfeebled senator consider retirement haven't been broached, even considering the distressing example of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who spent the final year of his term, at age 100, in and out of Walter Reed Army Medical Center here.

The issue is increasingly relevant today, considering the current Senate's advanced age, particularly among its leaders. Byrd, Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii -- Numbers 1, 3 and 4, respectively, among the longest-serving senators -- have been in the Senate more than 40 years each. And each chairs an important committee at an age when most people are retired: Byrd holds the gavel at Appropriations, Kennedy, 74, at Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, and Inouye, 82, at Commerce, Science and Transportation.

"People don't like to talk about age," said Boston University history professor Julian E. Zelizer. "It's not a political taboo, but a cultural one. We're respectful of the elderly." To raise the issue in a political context, Zelizer continued, is even more fraught with difficulty because any discussion of the office-holding elderly portends a conversation about that which is even more awkward -- mortality. The subject of death is especially acute in the Senate, "where individuals matter," as Zelizer diplomatically put it.

The impact of a single senator's health was underscored when Johnson, 60, suffered a brain hemorrhage in mid-December. He is recovering in a Washington hospital, and physicians have said it may take months.

This was big news, in part because of how suddenly a relatively young senator was stricken, but more importantly because of the potential political fallout. Should Johnson be unable to complete his six-year term, which ends in January 2009, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, would likely fill Johnson's seat with a GOP appointee, thus taking control of the Senate out of Democratic hands.

Johnson is receiving several hours of speech and physical therapy a day, and his office has issued repeated statements that he is on the way to a full recovery. Johnson has hired a strategist to help oversee his re-election effort next year, answering, at least for now, the question of whether he plans to run again. (Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., appointed Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., to take over Johnson's gavel at the ethics committee in Johnson's absence.)

Johnson's illness also reinforced the delicate topic of whether a senator is mentally fit to serve. Such was the question when Thurmond finished his tenure.

After moving into Walter Reed following several hospitalizations, Thurmond stopped presiding over the Senate, and at committee hearings typically would only read verbatim remarks prepared by his staff. On the floor, his fellow senators would "come pay homage" to their nonagenarian colleague as he sat waiting to vote, said Rutgers professor Ross K. Baker.

"They were very nice, but they treated him like an ornament, like a figure in [the Capitol's] Statuary Hall."

Meanwhile, loyal aides, led by Chief of Staff Duke Short, fiercely protected Thurmond's privacy. Short, whose moniker was the "101st Senator," was mostly able to keep Thurmond's decline out of the news. He barred sit-down interviews and deployed staffers to help fend off reporters on Capitol Hill.

Even today, senators dance around the topic of personal health when quizzed, and staffers and lobbyists -- who have so much riding on the well-being of their political patrons -- clam up as well.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., who turned 83 this week, said it was difficult to discuss, even with colleagues, because such talk can lead to speculation about a senator's retirement and replacement.

"What is public is public, and what is private ought to remain private," Lautenberg said.

His attitude is typical. "They all understand what it took to get there, and they kind of look out for each other in that way," said associate Senate historian Don Ritchie. He added that some senators also "walk around aware that, 'But for the grace of God, there go I' " when seeing a colleague having difficulty.

For Byrd, hard times are painfully obvious. The senator who oversees hundreds of billions of dollars in government spending as chairman of Appropriations is still good for a rant on Congress's rights and privileges, as evidenced last week by his emotional attack on a proposal to give the president a line-item veto. But his health problems are legion.

Byrd suffers from tremors, causing his hands to shake noticeably. He has complained about growing weakness in his legs, and when he leaves the Senate chamber, he switches from using two canes to a wheeled walker.

Although more than a decade younger than Byrd, Domenici, 74, also suffers from a variety of ailments -- and not quietly, according to fellow senators. Domenici was one of those who leaned heavily on Frist for medical advice, insiders say.

He has undergone two surgeries for a nerve problem, has bursitis in his hips, and suffers from spinal stenosis, a narrowing of the spinal cord that can be painful. He has hearing aids in both ears, forcing him to lean in very close to someone when having a conversation, and he moves slowly and deliberately when taking the floor for votes, stopping often to lean against a wall or desk for rest or to steady himself.

He can appear disheveled at times. Domenici wore a suit with a with large tear in the coat one day recently, and in early December, after being seen ambling through the halls of the Hart Senate Office Building in a pair of hunting pants that resembled pajamas, Domenici aides scrambled to quash a rumor that the lawmaker was not as mentally acute as he had been.

Despite his health, Domenici, who is senior Republican on the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, is running for a seventh term next year. And with last week's announcement that Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., will retire, GOP leaders need Domenici to stay more than ever. Domenici's advisers and Republican strategists portray him as hale and hearty, and suggest any buzz that Domenici's problems will force him to step down is nothing more than a Democratic plot to drive him from office.

"The senator, in my view, is in better health than he was three years ago," said Matt Letourneau, a Domenici spokesman, pointing out that his boss no longer uses the motorized cart that he had several years ago.

To be sure, illness does not disqualify lawmakers from effective service. The Senate roster includes a number of members -- old and relatively young -- who are dealing with or have recovered from serious health problems.

Sen. Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., was diagnosed with acute myeloid leukemia last November and has undergone chemotherapy treatments since then. Thomas, 73, has returned to the Senate minus most of his hair, and he predicts a full recovery. Recently re-elected to six-year term, he will have another chemotherapy session later this month. "I'm feeling great and glad to be back at work," he said in an interview.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., 76, was diagnosed with Hodgkin's disease in February 2005, and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., 70, has been treated for skin cancer (see related story). Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., 63, was treated for prostate cancer in 2003, and Sen. Mike Crapo, R-Idaho, 55, has twice been hospitalized for the same condition.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., 58, who is also a physician, is a colon-cancer survivor. Sens. Max Baucus, D-Mont., 65, and Lautenberg both suffered severe head injuries while in office. Even Majority Leader Reid, 67, and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., 64, had health scares in recent years, although both appear to be fine now. (Reid had a small stroke in August 2005, and McConnell underwent triple heart bypass surgery in early 2003.)

But when a senator begins experiencing age-related decline, they, their staffs and families face the most difficult decision of all: how to retire with dignity.

The challenge, said Professor Baker, is that it can be difficult to tell when someone who has become accustomed to the routine of casting votes and reading prepared remarks is not up to the rest of the job.

"When do you stop issuing drivers licenses?" Baker asked. As with elderly motorists, "you're going to have people whose reflexes aren't too good behind the wheel, you're going to have people [in the Senate] who aren't too sharp anymore making very important decisions."

What's more, almost all of those who would make, or influence, the decision about whether it's time to retire are disposed against it.

The senator usually wants to stay because he or she enjoys and derives purpose out of public service; aides want to keep their jobs and the influence that comes with working for a senior legislator (especially one who is increasingly dependent on aides); the party wants to keep a safe seat that will cost less money to retain; and constituents want the senator to run again because that means continued influence and dollars for a state.

Often, then, the only way the hazards of age and infirmity may be decisive are the same as with anything else in politics, Baker said.

"If it becomes scandal, if the public takes notice of it. That's the way change comes about."

This story allows me to bring up an important point in the political spectrum, political polarization. I respect politicians who are able to have a successful career in politics, but if there is not limit, we can't bring new ideas to Washington. Voters think that long serving members have done a good job, but really they have been going to the extremes for years and have said and done the same things. Term limits seem to be one of the good solutions to this problem.

McCain's Health And Age Present Campaign Challenge (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, January 25, 2007

"I am older than dirt and have more scars than Frankenstein," John McCain likes to say.

It always gets a laugh, though I don't suppose his mother, who is 94, and her twin sister, appreciate it very much. If he is older than dirt, what does that make them? Older than lava?

If McCain, 70, runs and wins, he would be the oldest person ever inaugurated as president. As is evident from the scar on the left side of his face, he has had malignant melanoma, the most invasive and dangerous form of skin cancer. (One in every 60 Americans is at risk for developing invasive melanoma in their lifetimes.)

I talked to McCain recently and asked him about his health. He said it was good. "I hiked the Grand Canyon rim-to-rim last August with my son, Jack," he said.

I tried to imagine that. The last time I saw it, the Grand Canyon was seriously deep.

How on earth do you hike a thing like that rim-to-rim? I asked.

"Down and up!" he said. "It takes three days."

John Kennedy, who at 43 became the youngest person ever elected president, and who was always associated with "vig-ah," in fact had serious diseases that were kept from the public.

As was revealed in 2002, Kennedy was sick from age 13 through the rest of his life, was on chronic-pain medication throughout his presidency and had Addison's disease, an endocrine disorder that until 1940 was a terminal illness. Kennedy survived it through cortisone injections, which at the time only rich people could afford.

Dr. Jeffrey Kelman, who examined Kennedy's medical records in 2002, said, "He was never healthy. I mean, the image you get of vigor and progressive health wasn't true."

DOJ_NMG_0121666

The point being: Electing a young person to the presidency is no guarantee that he or she will be healthy or stay healthy.

The media often demands the release of medical records these days, and the candidates sometimes comply. There were so many false rumors circulating about McCain's health when he ran for president in 2000, that he released 1,500 pages of medical and psychiatric records. They showed him to be in good health and not nuts. (And how many presidential candidates can say that?)

"We'll probably have to do that again," McCain told me of the record release.

Do you think all candidates should release their medical and psychiatric records? I asked.

I thought he would jump on that and say yes, just to put pressure on the other presidential campaigns, but he did not.

"I don't know," he said. "I think probably in my case it was a little more unique because of my POW status and the war injuries and the fact that people were spreading rumors that I was crazy and disabled both. So we'll probably have to do that again."

You think the rumors will start again? I asked.

"They already have!" he said.

But I don't think that is going to be McCain's problem. It isn't his health but rather his demeanor that worries some people.

The Iraq war, which he strongly supports, has disturbed and dismayed him. He told The Washington Post it was a "train wreck." He told me it was a "witch's brew." He visits wounded soldiers and Marines when they come back home for treatment and if any civilian feels the pain of the military, it is McCain.

And it is showing.

Last April, I wrote of a campaign swing McCain made through New Hampshire and Iowa, "Though McCain said he enjoyed himself, he was not the rollicking campaigner of six years ago. At a number of stops, he was largely subdued and sometimes almost somber."

Last Sunday, on "Meet the Press with Tim Russert," McCain seemed to have moved from almost somber to almost gloomy.

In my recent interview, I suggested to him that the laughing, joking John McCain of his last presidential campaign seemed to be AWOL.

"It's hard to make jokes; we are a nation at war," he said. "There are great national security challenges that we face. But I also believe, as Ronald Reagan did, that America's greatest days are ahead of us. It's going to be an upbeat campaign and an optimistic one."

And will you still come to the back of the bus and goof off with the press like before? I asked.

"If I changed that," McCain said with a smile of old, "I would probably get death threats."

I wouldn't care about his age, if his brain was working properly, but it is NOT. So, he would NEVER get my vote. We have had ENOUGH clouded judgement for the past 6 years. We need someone with a "clear head" the next time!

This is one terrific political blog. I really look forward each day to checking out what you all have to say. Regarding the age of McCain, I think he is probably too old & maybe too cranky to be president. Also, one picture I saw of him at the "State of the Union" last night--he appeared to be sound asleep. However, he is a patriot no matter what his age and has certainly served the nation honorably.

by Jennifer on 01.24.2007 at 10:14 PM

Excellent piece. Part of his constant campaigning and talk show appearance routine is no doubt aimed to project a picture of vitality. But I agree it is the crankiness problem that will be significant. Reminds me of Mr. Wilson from the Dennis the Menace cartoon --always screaming at the kids. Wait until the staffer stories start popping up. It'll make Hillary seem demure.

by M J Petersen on 01.24.2007 at 09:18 PM

I normally wouldn't say age matters much, but after losing my father when he was only 70, it is hard for me to imagine electing the most powerful man in the word for a possible 8 years at that age.

FEDERAL DIARY: Union Suit Against Intern Program May Revive Debate On Fairness In Hiring (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The Federal Career Intern Program has become one of the most popular ways for federal agencies to recruit on college campuses and hire young professionals.

Agencies may hire interns at any time, do not have to advertise the job openings in advance, and can take advantage of the two-year job tryouts to evaluate the interns before deciding whether to offer them permanent civil service jobs.

Under regulations issued in 2000 and 2005, some agencies have used the intern program to build a recruitment pipeline to replace baby boomers who retire as well as to beef up law enforcement and other specialized workforces. The interns are paid the same as other entry-level government workers.

But the popular hiring program was challenged in federal court yesterday by the National Treasury Employees Union, which asserted that the intern program "has become the hiring method of choice" and has undermined century-old laws that require federal jobs to be filled through fair and open competition with applicants afforded equal opportunity.

The union asked the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to throw out the program's regulations and to stop agencies from using the hiring program.

The lawsuit seems likely to reopen debate over where to draw the line on ensuring fair and open competition for federal jobs while allowing the government to become more competitive in the "war for talent" with Fortune 500 companies and large nonprofit organizations.

In its lawsuit, the union said the intern program has become the primary method for hiring revenue officers and revenue agents at the Internal Revenue Service, customs and border protection officers at the Department of Homeland Security and financial institution specialists at the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. NTEU represents thousands of employees at the three agencies.

The union said the intern program had deprived current employees of chances for promotions and other career opportunities.

NTEU also objected to the program's rule that places interns on probation for two years, instead of the one year that generally applies to civil service jobs, and to an IRS decision to extend the probation to three years for revenue agents. Lengthy probation periods mean the employees have to wait too long to gain job rights that allow them to contest major disciplinary actions, the union said.

The Office of Personnel Management, the defendant in the suit, and the IRS said the suit was under review and declined to comment. A spokesman for Customs and Border Protection said the agency's hiring practices follow federal law and "encourage the selection of qualified candidates." The FDIC described its hiring process as highly competitive.

By most accounts, federal managers see the internships as a way to hire faster and place new employees into training programs that monitor their job performance and conduct. Speedy hiring has become especially important at Homeland Security, which has been given extra money by the White House and Congress to improve border security and reduce the threat of terrorist attacks.

The FDIC has used the intern program to recruit bank examiners at about 600 colleges. In the past six months, the FDIC received more than 1,100 applications for 75 such jobs, the agency said.

Overall, the government hired more than 11,000 people through the intern program in fiscal 2005, the union said yesterday.Union Movement at the GAO

The International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers announced yesterday that it has launched a union-organizing campaign to represent employees at the Government Accountability Office, the congressional auditing and investigations agency.

The union, an affiliate of the AFL-CIO, represents federal scientists, engineers, immigration and administrative law judges and others, including the staff at the Congressional Research Service. A group of GAO analysts approached the CRS local union several months ago about forming an organizing committee, the union said.

Last year, David M. Walker, head of the GAO, completed a restructuring of the agency's pay system after an outside report showed that some GAO analysts were underpaid and some overpaid. The changes have created morale problems at the GAO, with some analysts feeling they had been demoted and others concerned about losing out on pay raises they had counted on receiving.

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Party Planner Winds Down at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave.

White House Social Secretary Lea Berman is stepping down next month after two years on the job.

"I've had four great jobs in this administration in six years -- and that's a long time to work at the White House," she told us yesterday. "I admit that I am tired." The decision to leave was entirely Berman's, said Susan Whitson, spokeswoman for Laura Bush."Mrs. Bush adores Lea and thinks her work is outstanding. Lea will be greatly missed."

The prominent Republican hostess became the nation's most prestigious party planner in December 2004 -- after stints as social secretary for Dick Cheney, chief of staff to Lynne Cheney and a staffer in the president's 2004 reelection campaign. It was, she said yesterday, like "winning the lottery, to go from being a housewife to the White House social secretary." Berman is married to millionaire businessman and GOP donor Wayne Berman.

She oversaw a dramatic overhaul of the White House's entertaining style: The hiring of Cristeta Comerford as the mansion's first female executive chef, the hunt for a new White House pastry chef (Thaddeus DuBois left for piles of dough at a new Las Vegas casino), and the first lady's push to entertain more than in the first term.

Berman will leave at the end of February, after two more big dinners: one for the nation's governors and another honoring Ford's Theatre. She informed the first lady shortly before the midterm election that she planned to resign. Whitson would not say whether anyone had been interviewed for the position, but said no successor has been named.Your Questions About the State of the Union Address Answered

How'd the Baby Einstein lady end up saluted as a hero? Is she a big campaign contributor? Also, is she available?

We've checked but can find no evidence that Julie Aigner-Clark, founder of the series of instructional videos intended to produce genius tots, is a donor, big or small. Just another business entrepreneur turned "social entrepreneur," whatever that entails, who caught the eye of the White House. Sorry, fellas: The millionaire is married with two kids.

Were Martin O'Malley and other guests really snoozing, as it appeared in that photo in the paper?

Photos are funny things, aren't they? We know this shot was taken during the speech itself, and not during the interminable wait beforehand. Perhaps the shutter just happened to catch a moment when more than one guest in Nancy Pelosi's box was mid-blink or neck-stretch. O'Malley's spokesman, Rick Abbruzzese, says the new Maryland guv "was very interested to hear what the president of the United States had to say." We're also told that many VIPs captured on film with downcast eyes may simply have been following a text of the speech handed out at the start.

One Cabinet member always has to sit out the SOTU, to provide for a succession in case the Capitol gets blown up. Who was it this time?

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

What was Dick Cheney chewing on ever so subtly? Cough drop? Breath mint?

The vice president's office did not return a call for comment.Spielberg, Sharing the Wealth

Vacations in the Hamptons, overnights at the White House, lots of big fat checks over the years -- from all appearances, Steven Spielberg has long been one of Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton's bestest buddies in all of Hollywood, which is saying a lot. So why is the Oscar winner, along with fellow moguls Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen, hosting a $2,300-a-person fundraiser for . . . Barack Obama? Invitations to the Feb. 20 event at the Beverly Hilton went out this week.

Spielberg's rep, Andy Spahn, said the director is simply spreading the love in these early months of the '08 race. "He expects to be helpful to several candidates in the primary race," he said, mentioning Clinton and John Edwards by name. "In particular, he has been very impressed by Sen. Obama. . . . It is an indication of the seriousness and strength of his candidacy."

The fundraiser does not equal an endorsement for Obama, Spahn said. "He will ultimately settle on one candidate" -- just not yet. Is he hosting a similar party for Clinton? Nothing's planned yet, said Spahn.Simeon Booker Looks Back at a Storied Career

Simeon Booker, the longtime Washington bureau chief for Ebony/Jet magazine, is finally retiring at age 88, so the tributes were long and heartfelt Tuesday night. "We have reaped the benefits for his nearly 60 years in journalism," said his boss Linda Johnson Rice, prez and CEO of Johnson Publishing.

Old colleagues and admirers cited his stories on the White House beat, the civil rights movement and the rise of the black middle class. Booker himself cited a different career highlight: The time he brought Martin Luther King Jr . to the then lily-white National Press Club. "He was their first black speaker," Booker told the crowd.

Among those turning out to pay tribute: Bernard Shaw, Gwen Ifill, Rep. Charles Rangel, Eleanor Clift, radio host Joe Madison, and perhaps the most delightfully random guest -- Kellie Williams, the D.C. native who played Urkel's dream girl on "Family Matters" and now works here in children's theater.A Heady Day at the White House

During the anxious days of late spring 2003 inside the White House, as the rationale for the Iraq war was eroding, Scooter Libby was especially worked up one morning about a visit from a couple of VIPs. CIA official Craig Schma ll testified in Libby's perjury trial yesterday that notes he took from a June 14 intelligence briefing with Dick Cheney's then chief of staff included this sentence: " Tom Cruise and Penelope Cruz at his office."

"Apparently Tom Cruise was there to talk with Mr. Libby about how Germany treats Scientologists," Schmall told the jury, reports our colleague Amy Goldstein. Libby "was a little excited about it," he said. "I was a little excited about it."THIS JUST IN . . .

On the morning of Dec. 30, the singer was driving in Los Angeles when her Land Rover rear-ended a Toyota, which was then struck by another vehicle. Brandy was not injured, but the driver of the Toyota died the following day, reports TMZ.com. The singer was not arrested; there's no evidence that drugs or alcohol were involved.

Â· Former New York Post gossip writer Jared Paul Stern won't be indicted for trying to squeeze big bucks from a billionaire in exchange for good press in the paper's Page Six column. "It is definitely a relief," he told the Associated Press. "But I'm still basically in the same situation vis-a-vis my life being ruined." Stern was dumped from the paper when Ron Burkle alleged that Stern demanded $100,000 and a $10,000 monthly payment to prevent negative items about the playboy billionaire in the column; Stern denied it, and his lawyer said he plans to sue Burkle.LOVE, ETC.

Dow Hits Record, Its 26th Since October (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

Wall Street soared yesterday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average to a new high. The Nasdaq composite index jumped 1.4 percent after profit reports from Yahoo and Sun Microsystems restored the confidence of investors in the technology sector.

There was little wide-ranging movement in the energy and health sectors in response to President Bush's State of the Union address, during which he called for expanded health insurance coverage and a 20 percent reduction in the country's consumption of gasoline over the next 10 years. Some alternative-energy companies pulled back after rising sharply before the speech.

In an essentially all-earnings day, investors were left without new economic data to help provide clues about the direction of interest rates.

"I think investors were waiting with the techs for the earnings to come out," said Neil Massa, an equity trader at John Hancock Funds. "Investors were in the show-me mode."

The technology-laden Nasdaq composite index jumped 34.87 points, to 2,466.28, for its biggest one-day increase since early December.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 87.97 points, or 0.7 percent, to 12,621.77, passing a record close of 12,582.59 set Jan. 16. It was the Dow's 26th record close since the surge began at the start of October.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index reached a six-year high, rising 12.14 points, or 0.85 percent, to 1,440.13. The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies was up 8.65 points, or 1.10 percent, at 794.03.

Light crude settled up 33 cents at $55.37 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange as investors grew more confident that OPEC would make good on production cuts and as cooler weather took hold in the Northeast. Prices rose even as United States government figures showed a buildup of crude, gasoline and distillate inventories last week.

Exxon Mobil rose 41 cents, to $74.90. The energy sector appeared to take in stride the president's call for austerity in gasoline consumption, though some companies that make a business of alternative energy products were lower.

Xethanol, an ethanol maker, fell 25 cents, or 8.14 percent, to $2.82, while its larger rival, Archer Daniels Midland, declined 54 cents, to $32.09.

Health care stocks also appeared little moved by the speech. The insurer Aetna fell 44 cents, to $41.74, while the drug maker Pfizer rose 45 cents, to $26.82.

In other corporate news, Yahoo jumped $1.98, to $28.94, after the company's fourth-quarter profit topped Wall Street's estimates.

Sun Microsystems, a maker of server and storage products, rose 49 cents, to $6.15, after the company reported its first quarterly profit in years as revenue increased.

McDonald's fell 69 cents, to $44.16, after some analysts said operating profits at the fast-food chain came in lower than expected. Over all, fourth-quarter earnings were in line with Wall Street's estimates. The company's profit more than doubled after it spun off Chipotle Mexican Grill and recorded strong sales in Europe.

The chip maker Advanced Micro Devices fell $1.48, to $16.03, after it swung to a loss in its fourth quarter from a profit in the period a year ago.

Corning, which makes glass, fiber optics and specialty materials, rose $2.06, to $20.90, after posting a stronger-than-expected fourth-quarter profit on strong sales of liquid-crystal-display glass for flat-screen televisions.

The benchmark 10-year Treasury note was flat at 9818/32, and the yield remained at 4.81 percent.

Following are the results of yesterday's Treasury auction of two-year notes:

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

NEW YORK, Jan. 24 -- Wall Street bounded higher Wednesday, lifting the Nasdaq composite index well over 1 percent after profit reports from Yahoo and Sun Microsystems restored investors' confidence in the tech sector. The Dow Jones industrial average logged trading and closing highs.

The Dow rose 87.97, or 0.70 percent, to 12,621.77, surpassing its record close of 12,582.59 set Jan. 16. It was the Dow's 26th record close since the blue-chip average began its surge in October. The Dow also reached a record trading high of 12,623.45.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index reached a six-year high, rising 12.14, or 0.85 percent, to 1440.13. The tech-laden Nasdaq composite index jumped 34.87, or 1.43 percent, to 2466.28 -- its biggest one-day increase since early December.

Tech stocks have borne most of Wall Street's concern about the health of corporate earnings in recent weeks. Restive investors, taking their cues from a flurry of profit reports, have been at turns pleased and concerned about the prospects that profit growth will help drive stocks higher following a sharp run-up in 2006.

There was little movement in the energy and health sectors in response to President Bush's State of the Union address, during which he called for expanded health insurance coverage and a 20 percent reduction the country's gas consumption over the next 10 years. Stocks Surge On Optimism And New Cash (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

A fresh spurt of optimism about the economy, and a wave of new money flowing into the market, propelled the Dow Jones Industrial Average above 12600 for the first time, marking its 26th record finish in less than four months.

The blue-chip average turned in its largest one-day point or percentage gain of the new year, jumping 87.97 points, or 0.7%, to 12621.77. It is up 1.3% since the year began.

A few investors remain nervous about the risk of higher interest rates this year, with Federal Reserve officials due to discuss their rate plans at a meeting on Tuesday and Wednesday of next week. Others worry that oil prices have suddenly begun rising again as East Coast weather has turned cold.

Still others are uncomfortable that the pace of corporate-profit gains slowed at the end of last year and is likely to slow more this year.

But for now, those concerns have been swept aside. Late Tuesday, Internet portal Yahoo forecast better days to come and computer-maker Sun Microsystems announced upbeat profit news. After regular trading hours yesterday, eBay announced its quarterly results, and investors were betting in advance on good news.

Their bets paid off, as eBay delivered much-stronger-than-expected fourth-quarter results. Its stock already had risen almost 5% in the regular session, and in after-hours trading, it rose another 13%. The eBay results could affect trading today.

More generally, hopes are spreading that, while economic growth may slow from last year, it will remain strong enough to keep profits rising steadily. And despite uncertainty about the Federal Reserve's plans, many investors still appear persuaded that rates will fall at some point this year.

The result is that, after an uncertain start to the month, investors are using any market pullbacks, such as Monday's 88-point Dow decline, as an opportunity to jump in and buy at reduced prices.

"It is still gangbusters. There is still money flowing in," said Tim Smalls, head of U.S. stock trading at brokerage firm Execution in Greenwich, Conn.

Not only was the Dow up strongly yesterday, he said, but the rally was broad-based, including such diverse groups as technology stocks, financials, drug stocks and miners. "You are hard-pressed to find a negative sector," Mr. Smalls said.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, a broad gauge of large stocks, jumped to its highest level since September 2000, up 0.9%, or 12.14 points, at 1440.13. It still isn't closing in on its record high of 1527.46, which it hit in March 2000, but it has gained 1.5% this year, more than the Dow.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index was up, too, jumping 1.1% to 794.03. It is ahead 0.8% for the year after spending a good part of the new year in the red.

Some investors welcomed the fact that President Bush made few major policy proposals in his State of the Union message Tuesday night. It is an old Wall Street maxim that stocks do better when the government faces gridlock.

Yahoo rose more than 7% and Sun more than 8%. The biggest percentage gainer among the 30 components of the Dow industrials was AT&T, which rose more than 4% after its wireless unit Cingular reported better-than-expected profits.

Oil remained volatile. Oil futures initially fell following a weekly government report showing stockpiles strong. But the futures then rebounded amid concerns about rising heating demand, finishing ahead 33 cents at $55.37 a barrel.

Technology stocks were among the day's big winners. They drove the Nasdaq Composite Index ahead 1.4%, or 34.87 points, to 2466.28, its biggest point or percentage gain since early December. It is up 2.1% in 2007 but would still have to double to return to its record of 5048.62, which dates from March 2000.

Some investors worried that tech stocks sometimes rise amid January optimism, only to fade later. But so far, those concerns aren't preventing the gains.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.51%, or 1.26 points, to 246.15.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.82 billion shares as 2,313 stocks rose and 1,014 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 2/32, or 63 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.810%. The 30-year bond was down 6/32 to yield 4.910%.

The dollar was mixed3. Late in New York, it traded at 121.11 yen, down from 121.64, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2960 from $1.3027.

Incomes And Inequality: What The Numbers Don't Tell Us (NYT)

By Tyler Cowen

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

The growing inequality in wealth and income has led many people to question whether the contemporary American economy is rigged in favor of the rich. While there is little doubt that the gap between the wealthy and everybody else has widened in recent years, the situation is not as unfair as some of the numbers seem to imply.

Much of the measured growth in income inequality has resulted from natural demographic trends. In general, there is more income inequality among older populations than among younger populations, if only because older people have had more time to experience rising or falling fortunes.

Furthermore, more-educated groups show greater income inequality than less-educated groups. Uneducated people are more likely to be clustered in a tight range of relatively low incomes. But the educated will include a greater range of highly motivated breadwinners and relaxed bohemians, and a greater range of winning and losing investors. A result is a greater variety of incomes. Since the United States is growing older and also more educated, income inequality will naturally rise.

Thomas Lemieux, professor of economics at the University of British Columbia, estimates that these demographic effects account for about three-quarters of the observed rise in income inequality for men and 69 to 95 percent of the observed rise in income inequality for women ("<></>" The American Economic Review, June 2006). In other words, rising income inequality is not just a result of unfairness or bad public policy.

Alan Reynolds, senior fellow at the <></>, goes further in his recent book "Income and Wealth." Mr. Reynolds argues that many measures of income inequality do not adequately account for government aid to lower-income groups. Furthermore, he says, the rich appear to be getting so much richer because of the tax-induced shifting of income from the corporate sector to the personal sector in the wake of the 1980s tax changes.

He describes the observed rise in income inequality as a statistical illusion. The consensus of professional economists is that Mr. Reynolds goes too far. The long-term trend of rising income inequality is evident in many different studies, including those of executive compensation, even if some estimates are exaggerated.

In any case, as Mr. Reynolds and others point out, income is not the only — or even the most — important measure of inequality. For instance, inequality of consumption — the difference between what the poor consume and what the rich consume — does not show a significant upward trend (Dirk Krueger and Fabrizio Perri, "Does Income Inequality Lead to Consumption Inequality?" <></>, January 2006). Consumption, of course, is not an ideal indicator of well-being; a high or steady level of purchases may reflect growing debt, and the ease of buying a big-screen TV does not reflect a comparable ease in buying good health care.

Happiness, possibly the most relevant variable for a study of inequality, is also the hardest to measure. Nonetheless, inequality of happiness is usually less marked than inequality of income, at least in wealthy societies. A man earning $500,000 a year is not usually 10 times as happy as a man earning $50,000 a year. The $50,000 earner still enjoys most of the conveniences of the modern world. Even if more money makes people happier, it appears to do so at a declining rate, which places a natural check on the inequality of happiness.

Studies of personal happiness, based on questionnaires and self-reporting, indicate that the inequality of happiness is not growing over time in the United States. Furthermore, the United States has an inequality of happiness roughly comparable to that of Sweden or Denmark, two nations with strongly egalitarian reputations. (See the symposium in Journal of Happiness Studies, December 2005.) American society offers good opportunities for people to be happy, even if not everyone becomes rich.

If we look at leisure, from 1965 to 2003, less-educated groups experienced a bigger boost in free time than more-educated groups (Mark Aguiar and Erik Hurst, "<></>," Federal Reserve Bank of Boston Working Paper). In other words, the high earners are working hard for their money and perhaps they are having less fun.

So matters are not as bad as the critics have suggested. The dollars in our bank accounts are one measure of societal value, and it hardly seems fair that the very wealthy should receive more and more. But for the rest of us, life on the ground is not so terrible. Income and wealth inequality measures, taken alone, provide a misleadingly pessimistic picture.

The broader philosophical question is why we should worry about inequality — of any kind — much at all. Life is not a race against fellow human beings, and we should discourage people from treating it as such. Many of the rich have made the mistake of viewing their lives as a game of relative status. So why should economists promote this same zero-sum worldview? Yes, there are corporate scandals, but it remains the case that most American wealth today is produced rather than taken from other people.

What matters most is how well people are doing in absolute terms. We should continue to improve opportunities for lower-income people, but inequality as a major and chronic American problem has been overstated.

Kerry Won't Run For President In '08 (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON --An emotional Senator John F. Kerry today said he will not run in the 2008 presidential race and vowed to use his Senate perch to hasten an end to the war in Iraq, saying he would work with lawmakers from both parties to reverse President Bush's troop "surge" and force him to withdraw virtually all troops from Iraq by early next year.

Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat, used the unusual forum of the Senate floor to announce his political ambitions. Choking up as he harkened back to his service in Vietnam, Kerry said he would work to make sure the next president doesn't have to cope with the consequences of a "wider war" sparked by the failed policy in Iraq.

"Two years ago I sought the presidency to lead us on a different course. I'm proud of the campaign that we ran," Kerry said.

"We came close, Mr. President, certainly close enough to be tempted to try again," he continued. "There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I've concluded that this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign. It is the time to put my energy to work as part of the majority in the Senate, to do all I can to end this war and strengthen our security.

"The people of Massachusetts have given me an incredible privilege to serve, and I intend to work here to change a policy in Iraq that threatens all that I have cared about and fought for since I came home from Vietnam," he said.

Kerry's decision to stay out of the presidential race reflects a realization that he would have had an uphill climb in capturing the Democratic nomination, given the other party heavyweights who are already in the race, according to Kerry associates.

Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, has been acting like a 2008 candidate virtually since he lost to President Bush -- traveling the country, spreading money to other Democratic candidates, and keeping in place a campaign infrastructure that was ready for another presidential bid.

But according to Kerry associates, the senator's plans changed dramatically in the fallout of his election-eve "botched joke" about the education levels of US troops. The harsh reaction to that incident -- from many Democrats as well as Republicans -- displayed to Kerry the extreme skepticism within his own party about whether he should mount another run.

And, with polls giving front-runner status to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, Kerry realized that he would face formidable adversaries in the quest for the Democratic nomination. Clinton, Obama, and a host of other candidates have been busily hiring campaign operatives and signing up key fund-raisers in recent weeks.

On Iraq, Kerry has emerged as a fierce war critic after initially supporting the invasion of Iraq. He has spoken of his war opposition in a similar vein to his efforts to bring the Vietnam War to a conclusion in the early 1970s.

Kerry's announcement freezes in place the various Democratic aspirants to his Senate seat. Massachusetts hasn't had a vacant Senate seat since 1984 -- when Kerry himself won his first six-year-term -- and several members of the state's all-Democratic congressional delegation have expressed interest in running for the Senate if Kerry retired.

The Money Just Wasn't There For Kerry (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico.com, January 25, 2007

That amount, which the senator from Massachusetts still had on hand after running for the presidency four years ago as the Democratic nominee, is only a fraction of what a presidential candidate will need by the fall of this year.

Serious candidates and candidates who want to be serious in 2008 will have to raise more than a million and a half dollars a week in $2,000 increments starting right about now.

And Kerry, who was criticized by many in his party for not running a more vigorous campaign last time, found it tough going.

A source close to Kerry said, "He was calling around Wednesday and Thursday to close advisers and they had talked to donors several times and the money wasn't going to be there. That coupled with (Barack) Obama-mania, which gave people looking for a Hillary alternative a viable option, is what ended his plans."

Kerry announced his decision not to try again for his party's nomination on the Senate floor yesterday, tearfully saying, "Two years ago, I sought the presidency to lead us on a different course. We came close ... certainly close enough to be tempted to try again. There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I have concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign.

"I don't want the next president to find that they have inherited a nation still divided and a (Iraq) policy destined to end as Vietnam did -- in a bitter and sad legacy. We have to find a way to end this misguided war and bring our troops home."

Kerry lost Ohio, which would have given him the presidency in 2004 by 118,601 votes. The Democratic Party has not re-nominated a losing candidate since Adlai Stevenson in 1956, who then lost again to Dwight D. Eisenhower.

While it never reached the proportions that Howard Dean's scream did, Kerry received a thorough lashing in the media when last year he botched a joke about the draft saying, "Education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

Shortly after, Jay Leno said: "John Kerry has apologized for saying those who do not study hard and do their homework will get stuck in Iraq. Now, those that do not campaign well and are boring will end up stuck in the Senate."

Leno's words were more true than he knew. Kerry, who might have had a difficult time running simultaneously for the presidency and the Senate in 2008, will now run just for re-election.

DOJ_NMG_0121674

"Today revealed his true character," said Jenny Backus, who worked for Kerry in 2004. "He is a man defined by his commitment to fight and stop unjust wars and this is what he is doing . He is doing this even though it is against his own (presidential) interests."

Late Wednesday, a Kerry advisor said that Kerry would have been capable of raising sufficient funds to run for president through the Internet and "Kerry was prepared to add money of his own."

"We would have been in a far, far stronger fundraising position than (John) Edwards," he contended. He said, however, that "by Thursday (Kerry) basically decided he wasn't running."

"He is a man defined by his commitment to fight and stop unjust wars and this is what he is doing." The best way to do that is to not give one man the power to pretty much declare "war" on any country he wishes - maintaining the power of Congress is the first step to not only stop unjust wars but to prevent them.

I more than fully supported Kerry in the 2004 election and I thought he did a great job considering I knew next to nothing about him in 2002. I am glad, however, that he will not run this time around as I believe there are far more exciting democratic candidates already on the move.

Senator Kerry's video to supporters and his floor speech in the Senate were eloquent and pointed. He brings passion to the subject of Iraq and his voice will be vital in holding the Bush administration accountable for the wind-down of the war.

by Bette Jeanne on 01.24.2007 at 06:29 PM

John Kerry finally realized his presidential prospects are dead. Too bad he didn't realize that after making the decision not to respond immediately to the Swift Boat attacks!

by GORD2000 on 01.24.2007 at 06:00 PM

Senator Kerry was the only one who thought he was running for President. He was, unfortunately, the last person to find out the truth.

Nevertheless, he is a good man and except for letting himself get Swift-boated and Drudged, he ran a great campaign and won all three debates. He will continue to make a contribution through his work as a Senator through 2008 and beyond.

'Not The Time' For Kerry In '08 (BOSH)

By Emma Ratliff And Casey Ross

Boston Herald, January 25, 2007

"This isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," said Kerry from the Senate floor.

In a speech to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Kerry put pressure on the current administration to set a date to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq but dedicated the last few minutes of his time on the floor to announce to his colleagues that though he was "tempted to try again," he would not make a push for the presidency.

The Senator showed his gratitude to the people of Massachusetts stating, "They have given me the incredible opportunity to serve."

Gov. Deval Patrick, who has previously said he would support Kerry in a 2008 White House bid, is now undecided on who he will back on the Democratic side for the office.

"Had he decided to run, I would have been with him," said Patrick. "I was with him the last time early and I think very highly of Senator Kerry as a man and as a public servant."

Patrick added, "He and I spoke about it on more than one occasion and I respect his decision."

As for the landscape of the democratic race for a 2008 presidential bid, it's still too early to tell.

"The Senator dropping out will have little effect on the race ... The biggest effect will be in fundraising. There will be those loyal to Kerry that will now be up for grabs as fund-raisers and I am sure the candidates are already on the phone," said Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics.

Kerry, 64, who lost the White House when Ohio voted for President Bush by 118,601 votes on election night in November 2004, said today he was "proud" of his failed campaign.

"We came close," he said.

Kerry said he feels a "deep moral obligation" to help end the war in Iraq and bring the troops home. That daunting task, and not another run for the Oval Office, will be his focus, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0121675

"I don't think there was one single thing," said Morgan Felchner of Campaign and Elections Magazine of Kerry's decision."It's such a crowded field already and he probably felt they had no room for him."

His decision leaves a field of nine Democrats running or signaling their intention to do so, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

The Republican field has a similar number with Bush constitutionally barred from seeking a third term.

Kerry's 2004 campaign drew widespread criticism from fellow Democrats after his defeat. His critics said he had failed to make a forceful enough response to Republican criticism as well as charges by conservative groups that he did not deserve the medals he won for combat in the Vietnam War.

Kerry's announcement comes just after the release of "What A Party! My Life Among Democrats," Terry McAuliffe's scathing memoir that includes an insider's look into John Kerry's failed 2004 presidential campaign. McAuliffe was the former head of the Democratic National Committee. [continue]

By David Espo

AP, January 25, 2007

Democratic Sen. John Kerry, who fell 118,601 Ohio votes short of the White House in 2004, said Wednesday he will not run for president in 2008.

"We came close ... certainly close enough to be tempted to try again," the Massachusetts senator said, recalling his defeat.

"There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I have concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign."

His decision leaves a field of nine Democrats running or signaling their intention to do so, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, and John Edwards, Kerry's 2004 vice presidential running mate.

The Republican field is similarly crowded, with Bush constitutionally barred from seeking a third term in office.

Officials said Kerry would seek a new six-year term in the Senate in 2008. The fourth-term lawmaker and decorated Vietnam War veteran said he would devote his time and energy to ending the conflict in Iraq.

He said he wanted President Bush's successor to enter office with the United States having "a reasonable prospect of success" in Iraq.

"I don't want the next president to find that they have inherited a nation still divided and a policy destined to end as Vietnam did — in a bitter and sad legacy," he said.

Kerry, 64, made the announcement on the Senate floor at the end of a lengthy speech on Iraq. He briefly choked up.

Edwards said he knew the decision was a difficult one for Kerry "because we know his first instinct is always to respond to any call to serve his country." In a statement, he added that Kerry will work to find the appropriate exit from the Iraq war and said, "In Vietnam, in public office and in private life, John Kerry has always fought the good fight for the right cause."

Obama said that from Vietnam to the 2004 campaign, "John Kerry has fought for his country and his ideals. ... and will continue to serve his country with honor and distinction in the years to come."

Kerry's 2004 campaign drew widespread criticism from fellow Democrats after his defeat. His critics said he had failed to make a forceful enough response to Republican criticism as well as charges by conservative groups that he did not deserve the medals he won for combat in the Vietnam War.

The senator stirred unhappy memories for Democrats last fall, when he botched a joke and led Republicans to accuse him of attacking U.S. troops in Iraq.

He apologized, then hastily scrapped several days of campaigning for fellow Democrats as party leaders urged him to avoid becoming an unwanted issue in a campaign they were on the way to winning.

At the same time, he worked to keep his presidential hopes alive.

Aides said he had donated more than $14 million to more than 260 Democratic candidates in 2006, and campaigned in 35 states. They said he has an active online community of more than 3 million people, and has $12.5 million in his campaign bank account, advantages for any presidential contender.

At the same time, polls showed Kerry trailing his Democratic rivals. Last October, an Associated Press-AOL News poll had Kerry at just 1 percent and recent surveys indicated he had gained little among Democrats.

In a CNN/ORC poll released Wednesday, 51 percent of Democrats said they would not like to see Kerry run in 2008. When asked who they would support, only 5 percent said Kerry, placing him fifth and far behind leader Clinton at 33 percent.

The Massachusetts lawmaker decided to clarify his political plans on a day in which he participated in a debate over the war in Iraq by invoking memories of Vietnam. At the committee hearing, he said a memorable question he first posed in 1971 had relevance today: "How do you ask a man to be the last person to die for a mistake?"

Despite his difficulties on a national level, Kerry customarily rolls up large victory margins at home in Massachusetts. He won his first term in 1984.

While Kerry was saying privately as recently as December that he would likely wage a second campaign, the tone among his aides changed in recent weeks as Clinton and Obama announced their White House bids.

Instead, aides began talking about Kerry's concern about the personal toll a campaign would take. Kerry had millions left from his 2004 run — a sore point with some Democrats. Despite the advantage, he would have faced intense competition with Obama, Clinton and Edwards for campaign dollars.

US Senator Kerry Says He Won't Relaunch Bid For White House (AFP)

AFP, January 25, 2007

US Senator John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate who narrowly lost to Republican President George W. Bush, announced he will not launch a new bid for the White House.

Kerry alluded to his failed presidential bid, which hinged largely on his strong opposition to the US war in Iraq, in making his announcement.

"We came close -- certainly close enough to be tempted to try again," the Massachusetts senator said on the floor of the US Senate.

"There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I have concluded that this is not the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," Kerry said.

His decision to pull out is the latest major development in the accelerated 2008 presidential race, in which several candidates have felt compelled to declare their intentions earlier than ever to lock up vital funds and campaign staff, or to bow out.

Kerry made his announcement in a 20-minute speech which he used as a platform for slamming what he called President Bush's "reckless" plan to put more troops into Iraq.

"Our own intelligence agencies tell us that the war in Iraq is fanning the flames of jihad ... and creating a recruitment tool for Al-Qaeda," said Kerry, a decorated Vietnam war veteran who made his opposition to the war in Iraq the centerpiece of his failed White House bid.

He assailed the administration's recently announced plan to send 21,000 additional troops to Iraq.

"We've gone backwards, and we've gone backward because of this policy," Kerry told his fellow lawmakers.

His 2004 campaign faltered in part over allegations swirling around his past as an anti-war activist and questions raised about the authenticity of his war hero claims.

Senator Harry Reid, the Senate's top Democrat, said those charges were unfair and unfounded smears.

"John Kerry came within a few votes of being president of the United States in one of the dirtiest, most negative, unfair campaigns I have ever witnessed," Reid told the Senate.

"To try to take away from this man his gallantry as a war fighter was beyond the pale," said Reid, "but they did it."

Kerry Says He'll Sit Out 2008 Race (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), whose 2 percentage-point loss in Ohio cost him the White House in 2004, announced on the floor of the Senate on Wednesday that he would not seek the presidency in 2008.

"This isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," Kerry said. "It is the time to put my energy to work as part of the majority in the Senate to do all I can to end this war."

Referring to his 2004 campaign, he noted: "We came close, certainly close enough to be tempted to try again." But Kerry said he felt a special obligation to end a war that he had voted to authorize, and attacked the "arrogance" of a White House that not only ignored the advice of military leaders, but changed generals to pursue its goals.

Analysts said Kerry may also have surveyed the field of Democratic candidates — with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois among the front-runners — and determined that there was little interest in a candidate given to long speeches, a less charismatic style and a similar position on the war.

"The writing was on the wall," said Jennifer Duffy of the independent Cook Political Report. "He was getting squeezed. Where once you saw the possibility of his running an 'I-told-you-so' campaign, his position on Iraq is not unique anymore."

About a year before the first primary or caucus vote is cast, the Democratic field is taking shape. In addition to Clinton and Obama, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina — Kerry's 2004 running mate — is preparing a challenge, as are New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, among others.

Eight days before the 2006 midterm election, Kerry did not help his presidential chances when he told students in California that if they did not study hard, they would "get stuck in Iraq." Aides said he misread his text, intending to say "You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush." Kerry apologized, calling his remarks "a botched joke."

But the media, fueled by a Republican drumbeat, kept up a barrage of stories that seemingly confirmed the GOP's characterization of Kerry as elitist.

Kerry's announcement came at the end of a long speech on Iraq in which he argued that the United States finds itself "doing precisely what [former Defense] Secretary [Donald H.] Rumsfeld said we wouldn't do — putting our troops in the middle of a civil war" between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

Calling Bush's proposal to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq a "folly," Kerry asked, "Is there one colleague here who believes that 100,000 more troops will pacify Iraq?"

Saying he was proud of his own record of opposing the Vietnam War after he returned from Navy service there — during which he was awarded a Silver Star and Bronze Star — Kerry said he would press the Senate not just to oppose the president's strategy in Iraq but to cut off funding for the war. "We have to find a way to end this misguided war and bring our troops home," he said.

Kerry's survey of why the war was unwinnable won plaudits from his colleagues, who praised his intelligence and his heroism. "He came within a few votes of becoming president of the United States in one of the dirtiest … campaigns I've ever witnessed," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.). "To try to take away from this man his gallantry as a war fighter was beyond the pale, but they did it."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, the senior senator from Massachusetts, praised Kerry as "a true hero in every sense," and said he knew how difficult it was for his friend to opt out of the presidential race. Those close to Kerry said he would run for a fifth Senate term in 2008.

Kerry Will Not Enter Presidential Race (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who narrowly lost the presidency to President Bush in 2004, announced Wednesday that he would not proceed with a second bid for the White House, saying he preferred to use his position in the new Senate majority to press for an end to American involvement in Iraq.

“We came close, certainly close enough to be tempted to try again,” Mr. Kerry said, invoking his 2004 race, at the conclusion of a 30-minute speech attacking Mr. Bush’s Iraq policy on the Senate floor. “There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I’ve concluded that this isn’t the time for me to mount a presidential campaign. It is the time to put my energy to work as part of the majority of the Senate and do all I can to end the war.”

Mr. Kerry’s announcement, though it came in an unorthodox place, was not a surprise.

He was bowing to a Democratic Party that was clearly unreceptive and had turned its attention to new candidates, in particular Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who both got into the race this month. Many Democrats had said they expected that Mr. Kerry would decide not to run after assessing how much support he had in his party. Already, most of his aides from the 2004 campaign have moved on.

More than that, it appeared to bring to completion a candidacy that for Mr. Kerry never truly ended after that Election Day in 2004 which began with exit polls showing him heading for a solid victory — aides were addressing him as Mr. President — and ended with his making a concession call to Mr. Bush. That experience, friends said, left Mr. Kerry bitter and frustrated and eager for a rematch.

He used his time on the Senate floor to recount his history as a Vietnam veteran who returned from war nearly 40 years ago to become an opponent of the conflict. His voice cracking with emotion, he drew frequent comparisons between the two wars as he made a case against Mr. Bush’s foreign policy in the Middle East.

“The fact is, what happens here in the next two years may irrevocably shape or terribly distort the administration of whichever candidate is next elected president,” he said, adding, “I don’t want the next president to find that they have inherited a nation still divided and a policy destined to end as Vietnam did.”

Mr. Kerry’s speech drew tributes from fellow Democrats, including the senior Democrat from Massachusetts, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, who had been pushing Mr. Kerry to make a decision.

DOJ_NMG_0121678

Another Democratic senator running for president, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, said: "My initial reaction to Senator Kerry's decision is one of extreme sadness. John Kerry is a major voice in American politics, and the country would be much better off today if he were president."

Mr. Kerry made his announcement at 3 p.m. in a Senate chamber that, other than two senators — Mr. Kennedy and Harry Reid, the majority leader — was almost empty.

Mr. Kerry, 63, intends to run for a fifth term in the Senate in 2008, an aide said.

The senator, in his travels around the country since the election, has argued that he came close to winning in 2004 and would be a better candidate, with extra experience, in 2008.

After being taunted in the 2004 race as being equivocal on the war in Iraq, he had emerged as one of his party's leading opponents to the war, and had renounced his original support for the war resolution that caused him so many problems in the 2004 election.

But Mr. Kerry faced severe obstacles in trying to capture his party's nomination for a second time. For one thing, many of his supporters had made clear that they would not join him again, with many saying he had made mistakes in 2004 that cleared the way for Mr. Bush to win.

Mr. Kerry also faced an unusually strong and deep field of Democratic contenders, including Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and Mr. Kerry's running mate from 2004, John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina.

But Mr. Kerry's hopes were probably most damaged by what he said was a botched joke he told while campaigning on behalf of Congressional candidates in the final week of the 2006 election campaigns.

Mr. Kerry's prepared remarks called for him to say, "Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush." In his delivery, he dropped the word "us."

Republicans argued that he had delivered a joke at the expense of American troops fighting in Iraq.

Mr. Kerry responded by getting off the campaign trail and out of public view.

For many Democrats, the remark was a reminder of instances of ineptness by Mr. Kerry as a campaigner, including his often troubled efforts to explain his changing views on the war in Iraq. Most famously, he said that he had voted for an $87 billion war appropriation "before I voted against it," a piece of videotape that Republicans quickly turned into a defining caricature of him.

In '08, Kerry To Run For Senate Not White House (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, January 25, 2007

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) announced yesterday that he will not run for president next year and will instead run for reelection to the Senate.

Speaking with emotion on the House floor and taping a video that was sent to supporters, Kerry said he would forego a bid for a second straight Democratic presidential nomination and pledged instead to devote the next two years to bringing the Iraq war to an end. He would rather leave the next president with a chance at success than run again himself, he said.

"We came close," he said on the floor, "certainly close enough to be tempted to try again. There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now, but I've concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign.

"It is the time to put my energy to work as part of the majority of the Senate, to do all I can to end this war and to strengthen our security and our ability to fight the real war on terror."

Kerry, who has eyed the White House since coming up just short in 2004 and has raised money accordingly, had become a long shot for a repeat bid. He languished in early polls despite high name recognition. While Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) have emerged as frontrunners after announcing their intentions recently, a possible Kerry bid has met with skepticism among pundits.

Kerry damaged his cause with comments shortly before the 2006 midterm elections in which he told students at a rally in California that they had better take their education seriously. Otherwise, he said, "you get stuck in Iraq."

Republicans seized on the comments, which Kerry called a "botched joke." He said it was meant to be a jab at President Bush rather than at men and women who served in the military in Iraq.

Shortly after the comments, his presidential primary poll numbers dipped below 10 percent and have not recovered. He apologized but was scarcely seen on the campaign trail for the rest of the election.

During his floor speech, Kerry spoke for half an hour about the war in Iraq before closing with his decision not to run.

He pledged to lead a battle to set a deadline in Iraq. He will introduce legislation and has set up a website (www.setadeadline.com) where supporters can sign a petition and "co-sponsor" his legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0121679

"I intend to work here to change a policy in Iraq that threatens all that I've cared about and fought for since I came home from Vietnam," he said on the floor, choking up. "The fact is that what happens here in the next two years may irrevocably shape or terribly distort the administration of whichever candidate is next elected president."

Bush defeated Kerry by 286 electoral votes to 251 in 2004, a victory secured once Ohio, the decisive battleground state, tipped in favor of the incumbent. Kerry garnered about 48 percent of the popular vote.

Kerry won the Iowa Democratic caucus in 2004 with 38 percent of the vote, defeating former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean in a widely unexpected upset. This set the stage for victories in New Hampshire and other early states. Yet in a Strategic Vision poll of Iowa caucus-goers released Tuesday, Kerry was in sixth place with 3 percent.

Kerry was hurt mainly because voters did not want to risk voting twice in a row for the same losing candidate, said Jeff Link, an Iowa Democratic consultant aligned with the presidential campaign of former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

"Our party has traditionally not been interested in seeing people make a couple runs at the White House," Link said, adding that former Vice President Al Gore, the 2000 Democratic nominee, would probably have faced a similar situation in 2004.

Kerry's decision will allow members of the Massachusetts delegation and his 2004 supporters in Iowa, New Hampshire and other early states to align with other candidates.

The Massachusetts delegation, including senior Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), has been putting Kerry under pressure to make his decision. Kennedy said he would support Kerry if he ran.

Kennedy's office did not return a call about his presidential endorsement by press time. Kerry's decision came less than 24 hours after Obama sat between Kennedy and Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin (D) at President Bush's State of the Union address.

"I have the utmost respect for [Kerry] and the difficult decision he has made," Kennedy said in a statement. "I believe this country would be far better off if he were in the White House today. I know that our country and our state are far better off thanks to his exceptional service in the United States Senate."

Most of the potential 2008 Democratic candidates have already entered the race or formed exploratory committees: Clinton, Edwards, Obama, Vilsack, Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico and Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio).

Gore, Gen. Wesley Clark, the Rev. Al Sharpton and former Sen. Mike Gravel (D-Alaska) are also potential candidates. Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia, Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and former Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) have decided not to run.

Kerry's decision to run for reelection to the Senate in 2008 ends a period of positioning among members of Massachusetts's 10-member, all-Democratic House delegation who had been interested in running for his seat if it became vacant.

With Kennedy just beginning his ninth term and newly elected Gov. Deval Patrick (D) also taking office in January, opportunities for advancement are far off.

Rep. Michael Capuano told The Hill that he recently called Kerry to express interest in running for the seat. Reps. Marty Meehan and Edward Markey have sizeable war chests ($4.9 million and $2.4 million, respectively) and most other members of the delegation have expressed some interest in the Senate in the past.

Kerry Rules Out 2008 Run For President (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts ruled out a second presidential bid yesterday, asserting that he could do more to change the course of Iraq policy in the Senate than by campaigning in Iowa and New Hampshire.

"I've concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," the former Democratic nominee said. "I intend to work here to change a policy in Iraq that threatens all that I have worked for and cared about since I came home from Vietnam."

Since his loss to President Bush in 2004, Kerry had left open the possibility of a return run. He had emerged as one of the most vociferous voices in opposition to the war in Iraq and spent much of the 2006 campaign season traveling the country in support of Democratic candidates. Much of that work was forgotten when, a little more than a week before Election Day, Kerry made a remark that Republicans said was disparaging to American troops in Iraq. He insisted that it was nothing more than a botched joke, but he quickly issued an apology.

Several people close to Kerry said he struggled with the decision over whether to run again, weighing the narrowness of his 2004 defeat against the obvious hurdles presented by a Democratic field filled with popular figures such as Sen. Hillary

Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.). Kerry acknowledged as much in his remarks, saying: "We came close, certainly close enough to try again."

The sources said his decision was not motivated by national and state polling that showed him trailing Clinton, Obama and Edwards in hypothetical 2008 matchups. They noted that Kerry has nearly $13 million in the bank, which could have been used to reintroduce himself to voters. But there are real concerns that a second national candidacy could endanger Kerry's standing in his home state.

"Like a very smart fighter, [Kerry] made the best long-term decision for himself and the country by recognizing where the real battlefield is on the Iraq war," said Jenny Backus, a former Kerry adviser who is currently neutral in the 2008 race.

Kerry is expected to run for a fifth Senate term in 2008. He made clear during his speech that he will continue to forcefully oppose the foreign policy course being pursued by the Bush administration.

"It's not enough for Congress to go on record opposing the president's reckless plan," Kerry said. He added that he supports a measure that would require congressional authorization for any further U.S. troop buildup in Iraq.

In an e-mail to past supporters announcing his decision, Kerry unveiled a new online grass-roots effort, which is being run by progressive blog guru Jerome Armstrong. The effort seeks "co-sponsors" to legislation he plans to introduce aimed at forcing Bush to set a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. The proposal mirrors one Kerry offered last April that would have required all U.S. forces be out of Iraq by the end of 2006; it was defeated 83 to 16 in a Senate vote in June.

Kerry's announcement came on the same day that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved a nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of a surge of additional U.S. troops in Iraq. Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), a potential presidential candidate, was the only Republican who voted in favor of the resolution.

Edwards, who was Kerry's running mate in 2004, called the Massachusetts senator a "friend." He noted that "all Americans are fortunate to have John's experience, insight and conscience in the Senate."

Obama was similarly laudatory, predicting that Kerry "will continue to serve his country with honor and distinction in the years to come."

Many Democrats had regarded Kerry's decision as a foregone conclusion because of the competitive field, his baggage from the 2004 election and the historical unwillingness of the Democratic Party to renominate a losing presidential candidate.

Stephanie Cutter, Kerry's national spokeswoman in 2004, praised the senator for the campaign he ran, but she added: "The reality is the 2008 race moved past him months ago, and catching up would have taken much more than another candidate's implosion or last-minute surge."

Kerry's allies said yesterday that he remains a major political force in no small part because of his fundraising ability. In last year's election campaign, they noted, he raised $14 million for 260 candidates, thanks to an e-mail list that contains more than 3 million names.

Kerry To Forgo White House Bid (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, said yesterday that he will not seek the nomination again in 2008, but will instead devote his energies to ending the war in Iraq and bringing American troops home.

Mr. Kerry had intended to make another try for the White House, but a remark he made in the fall while campaigning for Democrats suggesting that only poorly educated Americans ended up fighting in Iraq sparked an uproar of criticism, even from within his own party, that drove him from the campaign trail.

Mr. Kerry said at the time that his comments were nothing more than "a botched joke." But the angry public reaction to his remarks, especially from military voters and veterans, embarrassed his party and, some said, tarnished his image as a presidential prospect.

"I have concluded that this is not the time for me to mount a presidential campaign," Mr. Kerry said from the Senate floor at the end of an address opposing President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 soldiers to Iraq. Instead, with his voice breaking, he said he planned to "put my energy to work as part of the majority in the Senate to do all I can to end this war."

"What happens here in the next two years may irrevocably shape or terribly distort the administration of whichever candidate is elected president," he said.

Mr. Kerry who ruefully recalled that he had voted for the Senate resolution to authorize the war, a vote he called "a mistake" said that as a result of his vote, he now felt "a personal responsibility to bring this war to a conclusion."

DOJ_NMG_0121681

"So I say to John Kerry: I love you, John Kerry. And I'm so sorry that things didn't work out for our country. But that doesn't take away from the fact that I will always care about you greatly and remember the times we've spent together," the Nevada Democrat said.

His 2004 running mate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, paid tribute to Mr. Kerry by saying the withdrawal decision must have been tough because "we know his first instinct is always to respond to any call to serve his country."

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, said that from Vietnam to the 2004 campaign, "John Kerry has fought for his country and his ideals and will continue to serve his country with honor and distinction in the years to come."

But Democratic campaign strategists privately have been saying for some time that the senator was no longer a contender in a crowded field of candidates, led by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards.

A Gallup Poll of Democratic voters found last week that Mr. Kerry, who lost to Mr. Bush by a 51 percent to 48 percent margin, drew only 8 percent support among his party's rank and file.

Democratic leaders in the early caucus and primary battlegrounds of Iowa and New Hampshire also said that Mr. Kerry was registering little support in their states, running far behind the front-runners, who already have considerable campaign organizations and fundraising pledges.

Mr. Kerry had more than $12 million in his Senate campaign account, which he could have used for a presidential bid, and a valuable e-mail list of 3 million supporters and donors who backed him in 2004. But aides to the senator said he intends to seek re-election to a fifth Senate term in 2008.

Obama Debunks Claim About Islamic School (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 25, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama fought back Wednesday against an allegation that he was educated at a radical Islamic school as a child in Indonesia, determined to avoid being tripped up by unsubstantiated charges like those that undermined John Kerry in 2004.

Interviews by The Associated Press at the elementary school in Jakarta found that it's a public and secular institution that has been open to students of all faiths since before the White House hopeful attended in the late 1960s.

Obama, who was born in Hawaii, moved to Indonesia at age 6 to live with his mother and stepfather, attending schools in the country until age 10, when he returned to Hawaii to live with his maternal grandparents.

"The allegations are completely baseless," said Akmad Solichin, the vice principal at SDN Menteng 1, who added, "Yes, most of our students are Muslim, but there are Christians as well. Everyone's welcome here ... it's a public school."

A spokesman for Indonesia's Ministry of Religious Affairs said claims that Obama studied at an Islamic school are groundless.

"SDN Menteng 1 is a public primary school that is open to people of all faiths," said the spokesman, Sutopo, who goes by only one name. "Moreover, he studied earlier at Fransiskus Assisi, which is clearly a Catholic school."

The contention that Obama was educated at a radical Muslim madrassa surfaced on the Web site of the conservative Insight magazine the day after Obama announced he was jumping into the 2008 presidential race. Conservative Internet blogs and the Fox News Channel picked up the story and spread the charges just as his candidacy was getting off the ground.

Obama on Wednesday called the reports "scurrilous," and his communications director e-mailed reporters a lengthy memo attempting to set the record straight.

"I think they recognize that the notion that me going to school in Indonesia for two years at a public school there at the age of 7 and 8 is probably not going to be endangering in some way the people of America," Obama said on NBC's "Today" show.

The push-back was a signal Obama would fight to protect his reputation in the presidential campaign.

Many Democrats argued that Kerry's failure to challenge aggressively his critics in the 2004 presidential race cost him in his effort to unseat President Bush. A group with conservative ties, the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, charged that Kerry did not deserve the medals he won in the Vietnam War — despite his combat record of bravery and valor. Kerry announced Wednesday that he will not run again in 2008.

"We will not be swift-boated," said Obama communications director Robert Gibbs. "And we won't take allegations that are patently untrue lying down."

Obama's mother, divorced from Obama's father, married a man from Indonesia named Lolo Soetoro, and the family relocated to the country from 1967-71. At first, Obama attended the Catholic school, Fransiskus Assisis, where documents showed he enrolled as a Muslim, the religion of his stepfather.

The document required that each student choose one of five state-sanctioned religions when registering — Muslim, Hindu, Buddhist, Catholic or Protestant. Gibbs said he wasn't sure why the document had Obama listed as a Muslim.

"Senator Obama has never been a Muslim," Gibbs said. "As a six-year-old in Catholic school, he studied the catechism."

Iis Darmawan, 63, Obama's kindergarten teacher, remembers him as an exceptionally tall and curly haired child who quickly picked up the local language and had sharp math skills. "He wrote an essay titled, 'I Want To Become President,'" the teacher said.

Obama later transferred to SDN Menteng 1 — the elite, secular elementary school at the center of the controversy. The school is public but is very competitive and has exceptionally high standards. It is located in one of the most affluent parts of Jakarta and attracts mostly middle- to upper-class students, among them several of former dictator Suharto's grandchildren.

Indonesia is home to several of the most radical Islamic schools in Southeast Asia, some with alleged terrorist links. But Solichin, who proudly pointed to a photo of a young Barry Obama, as he was known, said his school is not one of them.

Those tied to the school say they are proud to have had a student like Obama, and hope that, if he is elected president, his ties to Indonesia will broaden his world perspective and his views on religion.

Sri Murtiningsih, who retired from Menteng 1 recently after 39 years of teaching, said she has vivid memories of the left-handed boy who followed a standard curriculum of math, writing, and language, together with twice-weekly religious affairs classes and sports.

Murtiningsih said neighbors ran to her house after seeing a television report about his intention to run for president.

"They were yelling, 'Your old student is going to take Bush's job!'" she said. "Tears filled my eyes."

Obama Fires Back (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 25, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) fired back yesterday against Insight magazine and Fox News for purveying a discredited report that he attended a radical Islamic religious school during his childhood years in Indonesia.

In a memo to reporters, Obama communications director Robert Gibbs reiterated that CNN has officially debunked claims published last week in Insight, a property of Washington Times owner Rev. Sun Myung Moon. Fox News picked up the magazine's report, which claimed that the Democratic presidential contender was educated for years in a madrassa, or Muslim school.

Obama attended a secular public school in Indonesia, Gibbs noted, taking Fox News hosts John Gibson and Steve Doocy to task for reiterating the rumor. Aides to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Obama's biggest early rival for the nomination, have made clear that Clinton's camp was not behind the Insight story.

"These malicious, irresponsible charges are precisely the kind of politics the American people have grown tired of, and that Senator Obama is trying to change by focusing on bringing people together to solve our common problems," Gibbs wrote.

Alongside the memo was a letter signed by 11 leaders of Jewish, Baptist, Catholic, Muslim and other Christian groups condemning the Obama news reports as a mean-spirited attempt to drive a wedge between American religious sects.

Obama's Appeal To Blacks Remains An Open Question (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

CHICAGO -- Looking around at the overwhelmingly white audience that was applauding Sen. Barack Obama's luncheon speech on Iraq at a downtown hotel recently, the Rev. B. Herbert Martin expressed both satisfaction and concern.

Martin, who said he was the only black person in the crowd, was thrilled that Obama, the only African American in the Senate, could engender such enthusiasm from a white audience because it offered further proof that the Illinois Democrat would be a formidable presidential candidate. But Martin also worried that in order to run successfully Obama would have to become a different kind of politician than the one who earned the trust of voters on Chicago's mostly black South Side as a state legislator before he was elected to the U.S. Senate in 2004.

"How does he identify himself?" asked Martin, who was pastor to the late Harold Washington, Chicago's first black mayor. "Will he continue to be an African American, or will he become some kind of new creation?"

The question of how Obama chooses to define and approach race looms large as he moves closer to formally launching his campaign next month. Although he rides a wave of enthusiasm among Democrats who like his vision of a different kind of politics and see him as an alternative to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), it is not clear that his multiracial message can excite black voters hungry for affirmation of their top concerns.

Melissa V. Harris-Lacewell, a Princeton University professor who has followed Obama's political ascent, said that he may be forced to choose: "You can be elected president as a black person only if you signal at some level that you are independent from black people" -- a move she said would be "guaranteed" to make black people angry. "He is going to have to figure out whether there is a way not to alienate and anger a black base that almost by definition is going to be disappointed," she said.

Already, that balancing act is causing some strains. Some of Obama's longtime black supporters in Illinois are grumbling about the largely white crowd of advisers who now surround Obama as he gears up his national campaign. "Who does he represent? That is what people are worried about," said Lorenzo Martin, publisher of the Chicago Standard newspapers, a chain of black-oriented weeklies that circulate in the southern suburbs. "When you look and see who is surrounding him, you are not going to see too many brothers. What you see is the liberal left."

Complicating matters is that Obama appears certain to encounter fierce competition for the black vote from the other leading Democratic presidential contenders. Black Democrats prefer Clinton 3 to 1 over Obama, and four out of five of black Democrats view her favorably, much higher than the 54 percent who have a favorable view of Obama, according to combined findings from two Washington Post-ABC polls taken in December and January. Clinton also enjoys close ties to top black elected officials, and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, remains extremely popular among African Americans.

Former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.), who launched his presidential campaign from New Orleans's devastated Lower Ninth Ward to highlight his commitment to attacking poverty, is also expected to make a strong appeal to black voters. And waiting in the wings is another African American, Al Sharpton, a candidate in 2004 who is considering running again.

"If we're talking about the urban agenda," Sharpton asked earlier this month in discussing his possible candidacy, "can you tell me anybody else in the field who's representing that right now?" And, in remarks that were widely interpreted as referring to Obama, he added: "Right now we're hearing a lot of media razzle-dazzle. I'm not hearing a lot of meat, or a lot of content. I think when the meat hits the fire, we'll find out if it's just fat or if there's some real meat there."

Jesse L. Jackson, whose presidential campaigns in 1984 and 1988 created a sensation across black America that swept millions of new voters onto the rolls, said there is no guarantee that Obama could expect the same kind of support. "He faces some real challenges," Jackson said. "First, there will be intense competition for black votes. The other reason is that most black people met him two years ago on television from Boston."

Jackson was referring to the speech at the 2004 Democratic convention that propelled Obama onto the national stage when he was still an Illinois state senator. The contrast with Jackson's own background as a nationally known civil rights leader years before he ever thought of running for president was implicit. But Jackson said he has encouraged Obama to run, adding last week that his "inclinations are really to Barack."

Born to a white mother and a black Kenyan father, reared in Hawaii by his white grandparents and for a few years in Indonesia with his Indonesian stepfather, Obama in many ways embodies the one America he often talks about: He identifies himself as African American, but his experiences are at once those of African Americans, whites, Asian Americans and immigrants.

"I've never had the option of restricting my loyalties on the basis of race, or measuring my worth on the basis of tribe," Obama wrote in his latest book, "The Audacity of Hope," in which he also observed that he has "blood relatives who resemble Margaret Thatcher and others who could pass for Bernie Mac."

Still, Obama chose to build his political career by rooting himself in the black community. In 1983, not long after resigning from a high-powered financial consultant's post in Manhattan, he moved to Chicago as a $10,000-a-year organizer for the Calumet Community Religious Conference. Dressed casually, he would visit barbershops and cruise the main thoroughfares in his used car to get a feel for the South Side.

He left Chicago to attend Harvard Law School and then returned to head a statewide voter-registration effort before joining a small civil rights law firm. In 1996, he was elected to the Illinois Senate from a mostly black South Side district.

Obama and his wife, Michelle, another black lawyer, were married at the predominantly black Trinity United Church of Christ in Chicago. "He had built himself a base among black voters on the South Side," said Timuel D. Black, professor emeritus at City Colleges of Chicago.

Despite his record of grass-roots work, questions about Obama's racial credentials formed a critical subplot for his ill-fated primary challenge of Rep. Bobby L. Rush (D-Ill.) in 2000. Rush, a former Black Panther, appeared politically wounded after failing badly in his campaign to unseat Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley the year before. But Rush trounced Obama 2 to 1, and the congressman was joined on primary night by Jackson, who had endorsed him.

Rush won in part by depicting Obama as a Harvard elitist who was out of touch with the concerns of workaday African Americans. More suspect for some voters was that Obama lived in racially mixed and largely upscale Hyde Park and was teaching law part time at the University of Chicago, which is widely viewed as being disconnected from the poor South Side communities nearby.

"There were elements within the African American community who might have suggested 'Well, he's from Hyde Park' or 'He went to Harvard' or 'He was born in Hawaii, so he might not be black enough,' " Obama told the Chicago Tribune.

Those questions were intensified by Obama's unusual heritage, according to other observers. Kwame Raoul, a Haitian American who now fills Obama's former seat in the state Senate, said he too has encountered skepticism from black voters for his ethnic background and for his name.

"When I first decided to run for office and circulate petitions, people would say: 'Kwame Raoul? I'm not voting for a foreigner,' " he said. "I'm certain that before people knew who Barack Obama was, he had to deal with the same thing."

Four years after losing to Rush, Obama cruised to a lopsided victory during a U.S. Senate run in which the campaigns of his major primary and general election opponents imploded in scandal. Still, the issue of his heritage was raised by Alan Keyes, the black radio host and conservative activist brought in late by the Republican Party to oppose Obama.

During the campaign, Keyes argued that the government should pay reparations to descendants of slaves -- pointedly observing that Obama would not qualify under his proposal. When the question of race was raised in that campaign, Obama frequently responded with a practiced line. "I'm rooted in the African American community," he would say. "But I'm not limited by it."

Keyes's broadside had little effect as Obama won his Senate seat with strong support in many parts of the state, including in the black precincts where he had been drubbed in his race for the House. Now, as Obama moves closer to formalizing his presidential campaign, he is sure to be confronted with more questions about his racial identity. Through his staff, Obama declined to comment.

"This is a question Senator Obama has had to answer many times during his career," said Tommy Vietor, Obama's press secretary. ". . . He's consistently proved that he hasn't forgotten the communities he's worked with so far, and certainly won't in the future."

In Chicago's storied Bronzeville neighborhood, African Americans asked about his candidacy mainly expressed excitement. Browsing through Afrocentric Book Store, Nathan Unger, 63, stopped to say that he wants Obama to run although he harbors few illusions about how much Obama would be able to focus on the concerns of black voters.

"Even if we get 30 percent from Obama, we're not going to get that from anybody else," Unger said. "From white folks, we might get 10 percent. What I worry about is that we might want too much from him. It's not just about us out here; it's about everybody."

Obama On Tightrope In Bid For Black Vote (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama will have a tough time generating support for his presidential bid among key black Democratic leaders -- many of whom are loyal to the Clintons -- and he must guard against undermining his electability by becoming the civil rights candidate, campaign strategists say.

"It will be very difficult for Obama to take those superdelegate votes in the hip pockets of the Clintons. They have a lot of political IOUs with the party bosses and that will be very difficult for Obama to abscond with," said political consultant Sam Riddle, who helped the Rev. Jesse Jackson win Michigan's Democratic primary in his 1988 presidential bid.

"If they back Obama, most of them know or suspect they have very little money coming. But if they back Hillary and garner black voters for her, they know they can get something," he said, referring to the political strength of Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Several strategists said Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, will have to walk the tightrope of wooing black liberal activists, including such polarizing figures as the Rev. Al Sharpton and Mr. Jackson, while avoiding limiting his appeal by leading with his race and running primarily on civil rights issues.

"He has to be really careful not to be labeled 'the black candidate' because it will put him in the position of being linked to Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton," Mr. Riddle said.

DOJ_NMG_0121685

Mr. Obama will have his first opportunity to talk with Mr. Sharpton about his candidacy today when the New York minister visits Capitol Hill to meet with Democratic presidential candidates, first with Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, then with Mrs. Clinton, and with Mr. Obama last.

Mrs. Clinton has a similar problem with female voters if she allows liberal feminists to usurp her campaign, said Morris Reid, a former Clinton administration official who is managing director of the political consulting firm Westin-Rinehart Group.

"They are really going to be fighting for the black vote, but also, Hillary will have to fight for the white suburban women's vote as well. Her base, that white-female educated woman, isn't just going to flock to her," he said.

"Isn't it refreshing that Democrats will have to fight for the black and Hispanic vote? I mean, her husband, Bill Clinton, is a god in the black community. But Hillary and Obama will have to measure up to him," Mr. Reid said.

Democratic strategist Donna Brazile said the complexion of the campaign ensures a split vote along every conceivable demographic of the party, particularly the black vote.

"The black vote is up for grabs, and no candidate -- past or present -- can simply rely on their record," she said. "In order to generate support, they will have to reach out, discuss issues of importance to black voters and include them in the campaign as part of their broader strategy in winning the nomination."

Mr. Riddle said Mr. Obama's biggest critics may end up being black political leaders, who view his "de-racialized" campaign -- "diametrically opposed" to every civil rights-focused black candidate who has run for president -- as a potential threat to their political influence.

To this point in the election cycle, with a year before any primary or caucus votes have been cast, the candidates' messages have been broad. They will have ample time to build a detailed message, backed by policy ideas, but for Mr. Obama that deadline is a bit shorter, Mr. Reid said.

"It works for him, and it is helping him right now, when he is speaking to large macro-organizations," he said. But "he will have to dig deep and pick out two or three meaty issues that he can really dig down on, because it is going to get real old real quick if he continues to talk in these general macro tones to the American public."

While Mr. Obama has the influence to do well, his candidacy is considered by some as an effort to secure the vice-presidential nod.

"Two-thirds of the large recipients of his Political Action Committee are members of the Democratic Leadership Council, which was founded by President Bill Clinton," said Glen Ford, executive editor of blackagendareport.com, a politics and social issues Web site.

"He embraces those who are in power and ingratiates with power, and yet, who is the power in the Democratic Party? Two Clintons. So how does that translate to him trying to take over? It doesn't, and I don't see that coming from him."

By Mike Sunnucks

Phoenix Business Journal, January 25, 2007

Arizona Sen. John McCain fared well in a poll of Arizona voters, but trailed former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani among Republicans in surveys taken nationally and in Iowa, a key primary state.

A poll released Wednesday by Arizona State University and KAET-TV 8 shows McCain with a mammoth lead over GOP rivals in a potential Arizona primary.

The ASU survey gives McCain a 54 percent edge. Former U.S. House Speaker Newt Gingrich checks in as the second most popular candidate, favored by 14 percent of respondents, followed by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. The ASU poll did not ask voters about Giuliani.

McCain also was the top choice among state voters -- at 28 percent -- among candidates from both parties. His closest rival was Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., with 20 percent, followed by Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., with 18 percent.

Asking specifically about a Democratic primary in Arizona, the ASU poll gives Obama 29 percent versus 23 percent for Clinton and 15 percent for John Edwards.

McCain's strong showing in the ASU poll comes on the heels his loss in a Maricopa County Republican Party straw poll. Critics say that vote was rigged by conservatives. California Congressman Duncan Hunter, who garnered only 2 percent in the ASU poll, won the straw poll.

A new Rasmussen Reports poll gives Giuliani a 30 percent to 22 percent lead over McCain among GOP voters nationally with Gingrich third and Romney fourth.

A Strategic Vision poll in the early caucus state of Iowa gives Giuliani a 25 percent to 21 percent edge over McCain. Among Democrats, Edwards leads Obama and Clinton in that survey.

Big States' Plan For Earlier Primaries Scrambles Race (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — As many as four big states — California, Florida, Illinois and New Jersey — are likely to move up their 2008 presidential primaries to early next February, further upending an already unsettled nominating process and forcing candidates of both parties to rethink their campaign strategies, party officials said Wednesday.

The changes, which seem all but certain to be enacted by state legislatures, mean that the presidential candidates face the prospect of going immediately from an ordered series of early contests in relatively small states in January to a single-day, coast-to-coast battlefield in February, encompassing some of the most expensive advertising markets in the nation.

The changes would appear to benefit well-financed and already familiar candidates and diminish the prospects of those with less money and name recognition going into such a highly compressed series of contests early next year.

Associates of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the New York Democrat, and Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican, said that should either of them stumble early on, the respective party primaries in California and New Jersey — two states that would seem particularly hospitable to them — could offer an expensive but welcome firewall.

But at the same time, states like New Jersey and California could provide an opening for Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, who faces the daunting prospect of overcoming resistance among social conservatives in the Republican contests in Iowa and South Carolina in January.

And several party analysts suggested that having such delegate-rich states at stake on Feb. 5 could persuade candidates who might otherwise step out after a defeat in Iowa or New Hampshire to press on in hopes of a dramatic recovery on the new Super Tuesday.

"I think this is huge," said John Weaver, a senior adviser to Mr. McCain. "And the unintended consequences could be even bigger."

While officials in both parties are wary of the changes, final say over the calendar rests with the states. Advisers to Republican and Democratic presidential candidates say they have come to view substantial changes as inevitable and they have begun to plan accordingly.

"We don't set the calendar, and we don't control the calendar, but we are going to compete aggressively in all these states," said Patti Solis Doyle, who is the manager of Mrs. Clinton's exploratory presidential effort. "And I will also tell you we have the resources and the organization to compete in all those states."

The developments mark the latest upheaval in a political calendar already in disarray. The Democratic Party voted last year to allow Nevada and South Carolina to move their nominating contests into the narrow period at the beginning of the process that once was confined to just Iowa's caucus and New Hampshire's primary.

But New Hampshire officials, protective of their first-in-the-nation primary status, have responded by saying they will schedule their primary as early as it takes, even before Jan. 1, to protect its traditional role. And no one seems to know where the scramble for influence among the states will end.

"This is completely out of control," said William F. Galvin, the Massachusetts secretary of state. He is the leader of a National Association of Secretaries of State committee that is monitoring this movement and trying to push back against it.

"The issue has been bad," Mr. Galvin said. "But it's never been as bad as it has been this year. In New Hampshire, they are going to be singing Christmas carols and voting."

The developments suggest that the national parties are losing any control they have had over the calendar by which they will nominate presidential candidates in 2008. California, New Jersey, Florida and Illinois are most likely to move their primaries early, probably to Feb. 5, joining at least five smaller states that had already scheduled primaries for that day. Illinois lawmakers are talking about moving their primary to help Senator Barack Obama, a Democratic contender; if history is any guide, it is possible that the other candidates might decline to compete in the home state of one of their rivals.

But final votes have not been taken, and state officials said it was possible they could end up going even earlier. Florida in particular has talked about holding its primary seven days after New Hampshire's, at the risk of sanctions from the Democratic National Committee. And officials said that other states, viewing this surge to the front of the pack, could join in as well.

The Democratic National Committee had adopted a new calendar last year, reducing the once dominant influence of Iowa and New Hampshire, after years of consideration. The Republican Party has so far deferred to Democrats on the changes, waiting to see the outcome of the back-and-forth.

Democrats and Republicans said that the changes would be the latest step in the evolution of a presidential nominating system that increasingly seems resistant to the kind of dark-horse presidential bid that was possible back when small states like Iowa and New Hampshire enjoyed such influence over the nominating process.

It has sowed unease and confusion among campaign staff members as they have tried to measure its implications, and has prompted them to begin making moves now to prepare for a whole different nominating system. While conventional wisdom is that the best-known candidates would benefit, views about how the shift might play out vary among strategists.

Tad Devine, a Democratic consultant who was a senior adviser to Democratic presidential candidates in 2004 and 2000, said the calendar changes, combined with the presence on the Democratic side of three strong and well-financed candidates — Mr. Obama, Mrs. Clinton and, probably, John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator — could mean that the battle for the nomination drags on for months.

"I think there's a very good chance that we are going to be sitting here at the end of next March saying, 'How are people going to put together a majority of delegates with 80 percent of the delegates gone?' " he said. "The nominating process in 2008 is not a little different. It's fundamentally different."

And the campaigns are adjusting accordingly. Mr. McCain recently hired Steve Schmidt, a former Bush campaign operative who managed the re-election bid of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, the California Republican, in no small part because of what he saw as Mr. Schmidt's command of California politics.

Similarly, Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, has turned his attention to Florida, where he sees a strong prospect of knocking out Mr. McCain by appealing to social conservatives, and installed a campaign team that includes two top political advisers to former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida. He is about to announce the hiring of more than six top aides in Florida.

Last weekend, Mr. Romney went to New Jersey, where his aides also think he could make a strong appeal.

"The focus of our efforts publicly have been in Iowa, South Carolina, Michigan, New Hampshire," said Kevin Madden, Mr. Romney's press secretary. "But we are very well organized in Florida."

In the case of Florida, Democrats and Republicans have welcomed the prospect of having to spend heavily on an early primary because that could prove an early investment for the general campaign, as well, considering how competitive that state is. That is not the case in California or New Jersey, two expensive states that have been solidly Democratic in recent presidential races.

And some Democrats disputed the notion that a California victory could help someone recover from a poor showing in the early states. Nick Baldick, a senior adviser to Mr. Edwards, noted that Howard Dean spent heavily in states that held their primaries after New Hampshire and Iowa and never recovered.

"All that mattered was momentum and winning in Iowa," Mr. Baldick said Wednesday. "I would argue that more states on Feb. 5 makes that exponentially more true. That if you don't have momentum going into states like those four big states, then forget it and just go home."

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich yesterday announced his support for legislation that would make English the nation's official language in order to combat what he calls "an unprecedented influx of non-English-speaking immigrants."

The Georgia Republican, who is weighing a bid for his party's 2008 presidential nomination, places third in most Republican polls behind Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Mr. Gingrich has said he is speaking out now to infuse his party's presidential primary with ideas and will not make a formal decision about running until September.

"If you are pro-immigration into America, you should be pro-assimilation into the American way of life," Mr. Gingrich said during a press conference in Washington yesterday. "Bilingual education has been stunningly destructive."

Mr. Gingrich denied having an anti-immigration stance. "I am pro-immigration," he said.

He also is for a bill to be introduced by Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, which would make English the official language. Mr. King's bill amassed more than 150 co-sponsors last year but did not become law.

Mr. Gingrich said public pressure ultimately will force lawmakers pass the legislation, even in a Democrat-controlled Congress.

"You find a way to bring it to the floor of the House every two months," he said. "And then those elites in government will be forced to answer, 'Are you with 85 percent of the country or are you against 85 percent of the country?' This is not a Republican or a Democrat issue."

He said previous attempts to pass the legislation failed because of "timidity and [a] rejection of the people's will."

In May, the Senate voted 62-35 for an amendment to the immigration-reform bill that would make English the national language. Supporting it were nine Democrats and all Republicans who voted. Sen. Jim Bunning, Kentucky Republican, Sen. Mel Martinez, Florida Republican, and Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat, did not vote on the amendment.

DOJ_NMG_0121688

A Rasmussen Reports survey taken shortly after the vote found that 85 percent of respondents support making English the official language, compared with 11 percent who do not favor the idea.

Mr. Gingrich has outlined a five-step assimilation plan that would: require greater proficiency in English before citizenship is granted, require new citizens to give up the right to vote in their native countries, require that federal documents be in English only, emphasize American history in citizenship courses, and create a program for immersion in English-language training.

"This is a cultural pattern," he said of emphasizing American history and language skills to prospective citizens. "America is a state of mind; it's a way of being."

For Democrats, Bergen County Spells Success (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, January 25, 2007

For Republicans, New Jersey, once a GOP-leaning, anti-tax state, stands as a stark reminder of how things have changed, particularly in the Northeast. But the better example — and warning of things to come — is Bergen County, a suburban bedroom community that has moved away from its Republican roots and toward the Democratic Party.

The county, once bedrock Republican territory and the most populous county in the state, has voted Democratic in the past four presidential elections — twice for Bill Clinton, and more recently for Al Gore and John Kerry.

Even more notably, the county executive and all seven members of the county board of freeholders are Democrats. Republicans lost their last freeholder last year, when incumbent Elizabeth Randall lost her bid for renomination and the eventual nominee lost in November.

But in a development that was more humiliating than substantive, the county party's headquarters was padlocked recently because the Bergen County GOP couldn't pay its rent.

The last remaining county-wide GOP officeholder is County Clerk Kathleen Donovan, a moderate who last year lost a Republican primary for county executive. Donovan, a former state legislator and one-time chairman of the state GOP, is serving her fourth term as county clerk.

No Republican has ever won statewide office without carrying Bergen County, and the last statewide GOP candidate to carry the county was Bob Franks in his losing bid for the Senate in 2000. Last year, Tom Kean Jr. (R) lost the county to Sen. Bob Menendez (D) by 8 points.

Republican Rep. Scott Garrett's 5th Congressional district includes part of Bergen County. He carried the county by only 4,209 votes (51.2 percent), though he won district-wide by 55 percent. The part of Bergen County not represented by Garrett is represented by 9th district Democrat Steven Rothman. Rothman carried the Bergen portion of his district with 71.5 percent of the vote, meaning Bergen County voters voted overwhelming Democratic for Congress last year.

Republicans have three major problems in the county: the national party, changing demographics and a fractured GOP that is being outworked by Democratic strategists.

Many of Bergen County's Republicans are more politically in sync with former Gov. Tom Kean (R) than they are with his son. They are classic Northeast moderates, whose views on cultural issues don't easily fit with Sunbelt conservatives.

The county itself also is changing. Hispanics and Asians have moved into the county in recent years, as have New Yorkers, many of whom have brought their values and Democratic preference with them.

While these developments would have posed a challenge for the county GOP, they could have been managed had the Bergen County party leaders been smart or county Democratic operatives been inept. Unfortunately for the GOP, neither of those things happened.

Bergen County's Republican organization is being outworked and outfundraised by its Democratic counterpart, which has become a well-oiled machine under the guidance of party Chairman Joseph Ferriero.

While Ferriero helps local Democratic parties raise money and contact voters, Republicans spend most of their time fighting with each other over issues and personalities. Republican conservatives, in particular, seem more interested in isolating and purging moderates than in winning elections. As a result, the county GOP is getting badly outspent in races and losing more and more elections, creating a vicious cycle of defeat.

Bergen Record reporter Scott Fallon noted in a November article that when Ferriero became the county Democratic chief in 1998, Republicans controlled two-thirds of Bergen County towns that had a partisan form of government. After November's elections, Democrats had increased their control to 56 percent of those communities, a dramatic reversal in just eight years. Now, Ferriero has plans to go after sitting GOP state legislators and town officeholders in other previously heavily Republican areas.

Republicans complain that Ferriero is using Democrats' increased political muscle in the county to wring even more money out of companies that want to do business with the county. Odds are that they are right, but so what? That's the way the game is played in New Jersey, and as long as both sides know the rules, nobody is in a position to complain.

Ferriero took a weak county party and built it up, brick by brick. Republicans could do the same thing, if not with immediate success, if they got their act together. And they actually have an issue they could use, both in Bergen County and statewide, to start to rebuild their party: property taxes.

If Bergen were an isolated case, it might not even be worth mentioning. But what's happening there could happen (and indeed has happened) in other northern suburbs. While the GOP has made gains in Georgia, Tennessee and Kentucky, it continues to lose ground in New Jersey, Illinois and southeast Pennsylvania.

Increasingly, Bergen County looks like a model for further Democratic success outside the South. We'll see if the Republicans write it off or take steps to resuscitate their local parties, both in Bergen County and elsewhere in the Northeast.

Gore Film Sparks Parents' Anger (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

FEDERAL WAY, Wash., Jan. 24 -- Frosty E. Hardiman is neither impressed nor surprised that "An Inconvenient Truth," the global-warming movie narrated by former vice president Al Gore, received an Oscar nomination this week for best documentary.

"Liberal left is all over Hollywood," he grumbled a few hours after the nomination was announced.

Hardiman, a parent of seven here in the southern suburbs of Seattle, has himself roiled the global-warming waters. It happened early this month when he learned that one of his daughters would be watching "An Inconvenient Truth" in her seventh-grade science class.

"No you will not teach or show that propagandist Al Gore video to my child, blaming our nation -- the greatest nation ever to exist on this planet -- for global warming," Hardiman wrote in an e-mail to the Federal Way School Board. The 43-year-old computer consultant is an evangelical Christian who says he believes that a warming planet is "one of the signs" of Jesus Christ's imminent return for Judgment Day.

The teacher in that science class, Kay Walls, says that after Hardiman's e-mail she was told by her principal that she would receive a disciplinary letter for not following school board rules that require her to seek written permission to present "controversial" materials in class.

The e-mail also pressured the school board to impose a ban on screenings of the film for the district's 22,500 students.

The ban, which the school board says was merely a "moratorium," was lifted Tuesday night, subject to rigorous conditions. Still, the action has appalled the film's producers and triggered a ferocious national backlash.

Members of the school board say they have been bombarded by thousands of e-mails and phone calls, many of them hurtful and obscene, accusing them of scientific ignorance, pandering to religion and imposing prior restraint on free speech.

It has been a terrible ordeal, school board member David Larson said during a long, emotional speech at the board meeting.

"I am here to foster healing in our community," he said, while noting with sadness that "civility and honest discourse are dying in our country."

What the school board had really intended to do, Larson and school board members insisted, was not to stop schools from teaching the science of global warming, but merely to follow long-standing school board rules that require students to be exposed to "other perspectives" when they view a film like "An Inconvenient Truth."

"We do not need to lose balance in order to save the Earth," Larson said.

Exactly what "balance" might amount to, however, was not spelled out.

The National Academy of Sciences, together with nearly all of the world's leading climate experts, have agreed that there is conclusive evidence that human activity is causing the Earth to warm and that there is an urgent need to reduce the amount of carbon being released into the air.

In public comments at the board meeting, several riled-up Federal Way residents argued that "An Inconvenient Truth" was, indeed, scientifically true and that saying otherwise is "deliberate obfuscation."

These residents derisively compared the search for "balance" in the global-warming issue to decades of phony claims by cigarette companies about the lack of "proof" that smoking is harmful to human health.

DOJ_NMG_0121690

Before the board meeting started Tuesday night, several residents buttonholed Larson and asked him if there should be a "balanced" presentation of the Nazi Holocaust, because there are many who deny that it occurred.

"The Holocaust happened," Larson said. "We have evidence and photos. The difference between the Holocaust and the global warming is we don't have photos of what will happen 50 years from now."

Sitting in on this conversation was Walls, the seventh-grade science teacher whose class includes Frosty Hardiman's daughter.

"We do have photos of snow melting off Kilimanjaro," Walls said, hopefully.

In the end, though, the board opted for an abundance of balance.

That means that "An Inconvenient Truth" may be shown only with the written permission of a principal -- and only when it is balanced by alternative views that are approved by both a principal and the superintendent of schools.

Hardiman was pleased.

"I am happy they are giving the kids as much information as possible," he said.

His daughter's science teacher, meanwhile, said she is struggling to find authoritative articles to counter the information in the Gore documentary.

"The only thing I have found so far is an article in Newsweek called 'The Cooling World,' " Walls said.

It was written 37 years ago.

Steele To Head GOP Funding Outfit, Start Firm (WT)

By Tom Lobianco

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

ANNAPOLIS -- Former Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele will lead a major Republican fundraising group and start a public affairs consulting firm in Maryland.

Mr. Steele will be the chairman of GOPAC, the national fundraising outfit that former House Speaker Newt Gingrich elevated to national prominence in 1994, and start the Legacy Strategies public affairs firm, he told The Washington Times yesterday.

"I'm really looking forward to it," Mr. Steele said. "It has been a whirlwind challenge. I just finished up four years as lieutenant governor, and I was excited to do it. We'll keep plugging along."

He begins both jobs Feb. 1 and will make a public announcement today.

Mr. Steele also said he likely will write a book about his 30-plus years in politics.

"I've really never shared too much of what it feels like to read words about you in the paper that aren't true, about who has just called you an 'Uncle Tom,' " Mr. Steele said. "I think it speaks to the double standard someone like myself has to live with."

Mr. Steele, 48, was the first black elected statewide in Maryland.

The announcements follow broad speculation about the former U.S. Senate candidate's plans.

Mr. Steele lost his race for a Senate seat in November to Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin. The race attracted national attention as Republicans and Democrats battled for every last seat to control Congress. After Mr. Steele's loss, he was briefly considered to run the Republican National Committee.

He will run his public affairs firm with former Chief of Staff Paul D. Ellington and one or two others, and he expects the firm to grow rapidly.

Mr. Steele said he chose the firm's name based on his belief that minorities need to build "legacy wealth" -- a term that he said means "not just financial legacy, but also the kind of legacy you can't touch."

"I talked a lot about legacy [in the campaign] and very much want to continue that theme in the private sector," he said. "For me, the bottom line is all about building legacy."

After the November elections, Mr. Steele said he was committed to rebuilding the Maryland Republican Party. The GOPAC position allows him to fulfill that promise, Mr. Ellington said.

"GOPAC is kind of a name brand, focusing on the development of state and local candidates," he said. "There will obviously be a Maryland component."

The group was formed in the late 1970s to aid Republican candidates facing a Democrat-controlled Congress and calls itself the Republican Party's "preeminent education and training center."

Outgoing Chairman J.C. Watts Jr. approached Mr. Steele with the offer, based on Mr. Steele's national recognition and his experience running the state Republican Party, Mr. Ellington said.

Mr. Steele's new jobs are good news for state Republicans, said Audra Miller, a spokeswoman for the Maryland Republican Party.

DOJ_NMG_0121691

"It's great that Steele will continue to have that presence on the political scene, not only in Maryland, but nationally," she said. "GOPAC has continued to be a strong presence among states and the legislatures for more than 10 years. This will only continue to build upon the great success that they've had."

Reality, At Last, In Richmond (WP)

EYEBALL TO eyeball with a potential electoral disaster in this fall's legislative elections, Virginia Republicans have finally blinked -- a little. They have put forward a transportation funding package that is at least partly serious, which is to say that it relies to a significant degree on new taxes and fees to address the state's most urgent problem. It is an imperfect plan but also a sound starting point for a deal.

Having signed pledges to oppose any new taxes and having torpedoed one funding plan after another, the conservative ideologues who hold sway in the House of Delegates haven't found the courage to raise taxes much themselves. But they have decided to allow the localities where traffic is worst -- in Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads -- to increase their own taxes, particularly on commercial real estate and home sales.

If the local governing boards in Northern Virginia give their assent -- and that remains in doubt in one or two key jurisdictions -- those locally raised taxes would generate some $383 million annually for Northern Virginia. Add that to the state funds the Republicans say they would produce, and the yield is perhaps $500 million a year in new money for roads and mass transit in the region. That's at the low end of what Northern Virginia needs, but it's not bad. It's just part of the story, however.

A primary concern is the portion of statewide funding that would supposedly come from Richmond. In theory, some $250 million of the overall $1 billion in new annual spending for transportation (plus another $100 million annually in debt service) would be siphoned off from the general fund. Translation: It would be taken from existing money for schools, public health, public safety and other priorities that was provided three years ago in the far-reaching tax package enacted by former governor Mark R. Warner (D).

Even if all that money is allocated for transportation, though, there's a catch: Much of the state's portion would be spent not for new construction but to cover soaring maintenance costs. That leaves the locally raised funds -- minus $50 million annually in dedicated funding for Metro -- to widen Interstate 66 or Routes 7, 28 and 29 and other roadways in Northern Virginia. When all's said and done, Richmond is doing the bare minimum itself, and it is leaving the heavy lifting to the Northern Virginia suburbs and Hampton Roads.

We don't mean to dismiss the GOP transportation plan. It's the first serious one offered by House Republicans. And it's encouraging that it includes measures such as raising statewide vehicle registration fees and diesel fuel taxes. All that suggests that the real world facing Virginia's budget makers has begun to make an impression on Republican lawmakers.

Over A Barrel: The Global Scramble For Energy Security (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins, Bhushan Bahree And Patricia Minczeski

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

The past four years have seen the biggest oil-price spike in a generation. That shock has shown energy insecurity to be one of the chief political, economic and military challenges facing the world. 1

The concern from Washington to Beijing -- and a central issue as business and political leaders gather at the World Economic Forum -- springs from a broader-based fear than prices, which have tumbled this month to nearly $50 a barrel after soaring to $77.03 last summer. Rather, the worry is that the geopolitical and economic equilibrium that long enabled the oil industry to smoothly supply customers is a thing of the past. Events in 2007 will test that view.

One concern: Has power permanently shifted to producers? The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel that supplies a third of the world's oil, has seen its market clout soar in recent years as demand grew faster than supply. It cut output twice late last year, and is now pondering additional cuts.

Another worry is turmoil in exporting nations. Nigerian militants are attacking oil facilities almost daily. Russia is renationalizing its oil sector. The U.S. set the stage for trouble in Iraq with its 2003 invasion. Insurgents are sabotaging that country's vast petroleum industry and driving skilled technocrats into exile, threatening to cripple the industry for decades to come. Some experts worry that Iran and Saudi Arabia may be drawn into a proxy war in Iraq. That raises the specter of an energy-doomsday scenario: a conflict among the world's top three oil-reserve holders.

Arguably, the leading culprit is rising demand. The U.S. and China, the two largest consumers, could dramatically shift the balance of power back in their favor by curbing their enormous appetites for crude and developing alternative energy sources.

The quest for energy security, in short, is a global scramble of power, money and ideas. This is a guide to flashpoints likely to shape the outcome of that scramble in 2007.

Bolton: U.S. Following Flawed Iran Plan (AP)

AP, January 25, 2007

Former U.N. Ambassador John Bolton says the United States may not be able to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons because the Bush administration is following a flawed diplomatic strategy.

In an interview with Fox News airing Wednesday night, Bolton said that contrary to administration claims, the U.N. Security Council resolution against Iran that was approved last month is "very weak."

Bolton stepped down in December after serving as U.N. ambassador for 16 months. He was the point man for the administration in the diplomatic debate over the resolution.

The former envoy said the diplomatic means chosen by the administration to halt Iran's nuclear program may not achieve the desired ends.

"The disjunction between that objective and the diplomacy we have been pursuing is ultimately going to be a problem for the president," Bolton said.

He added that the administration placed too high a priority on achieving unity in the council.

"Pursuing the goal of unity detracts from the substantive goal of preventing Iran from getting nuclear weapons," Bolton said.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Bolton and his U.N. team should take "great pride" in winning the 15-0 council vote against Iran. He said the U.S. would have preferred a stronger resolution but noted that compromise is a central element of international diplomacy.

On Dec. 24, after two months of debate, the council voted unanimously to punish Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment.

The resolution orders all countries to stop supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs. It also freezes Iranian assets of 10 companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

"Is it a good, strong resolution? Yes," McCormack said. "And is it having real effects on Iran and their ability to develop nuclear weapons? I would argue yes to right now, and I think probably even more down the road if they continue down the current line of behavior."

Details On Iran's Activity Pledged (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD — The top U.S. envoy to Iraq said Wednesday that he would soon reveal details he asserted would show Iranian interference in the country, in the latest round of diplomatic jousting between Washington and Tehran.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told a group of Western journalists that American officials would provide details "in the coming days" about Iranian officials detained and interrogated in Baghdad and the Kurdish city of Irbil within the last month.

The U.S. military detained five Iranian diplomats in Irbil on Jan. 11, and had detained several others in late December in Baghdad, touching off diplomatic rows and creating tensions with the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

The presentation, Khalilzad said, would include details about who the detained Iranians are and what they were doing in Iraq, as well as information about alleged contraband coming across the Iran-Iraq border.

"We are working to put something together and we will have something for you in the coming days," he said.

The upcoming presentation, he said, is a response to public comments by Iranian Ambassador Hassan Kazemi-Qomi, who this week publicly challenged Americans to show "any shred of evidence that Iran is working to destabilize Iraq," according to Iranian news agencies.

Khalilzad said the U.S. would take up the challenge.

"I know the Iranian ambassador said the Americans do not have anything and if they have something why don't they come up and share it," Khalilzad said. "We're going to oblige him."

Khalilzad said Iranian diplomatic missions and offices in Iraq were providing diplomatic cover for members of the Revolutionary Guard's Quds Force, an elite intelligence and paramilitary organization that answers to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

DOJ_NMG_0121693

One of those arrested in a pair of December raids in Baghdad and later released has been identified as a Quds Force "director of operations," he said.

Iran's complicated government includes ordinary state functions such as the Foreign Ministry and the presidency in addition to powerful institutions that grew out of Iran's 1979 Islamic Revolution. The Revolutionary Guard, one of the latter organizations, operates as a parallel army and controls Iran's borders as well as its foreign policy toward neighboring countries such as Iraq and Afghanistan.

Khalilzad said it was time for Iran to change the people who conduct its relations with Iraq.

"Iran has not adapted to the changed situation in that it uses the security instrument as the channel, diplomatically," he said. "Many of the officials that represent Iran diplomatically are Quds Force operatives."

The U.S. has alleged that Iran has been funneling money and weapons to and providing training for armed groups in Iraq. Khalilzad said Wednesday that Iranian elements associated with the Quds Force had infiltrated Iraq's political parties.

He said the Bush administration had made a decision to aggressively confront Iranian networks operating in Iraq, as laid out by President Bush in a Jan. 10 speech on the Iraq troop buildup.

"Operations are aimed at making it harder for them, to make [it] difficult for them to do things they used to do more easily, in the expectation that would change their behavior," Khalilzad said.

"Those [Iraqis] who associate with them also risk being caught, targeted in these operations," he added.

Iran Receives Russian Defense Missiles (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, January 25, 2007

Iranian officials said Wednesday that they have taken delivery of advanced Russian air defense missile systems — weapons intended, according to one Russian news agency, to defend Tehran's major nuclear facilities.

Announcement of the delivery of the Tor-M1 mobile missile launchers came as Iran launched three days of military maneuvers, its first since the U.N. Security Council approved sanctions against Iran on Dec. 23.

"We have had constructive defense transactions with Russia and we purchased Tor-M1 missiles that were recently delivered to us," the official Web site of Iranian state television quoted Minister of Defense Mostafa Mohammad Najjar as saying.

Najjar did not say how many missiles were delivered or when they arrived. Previously Moscow said it would supply 29 of the mobile surface-to-air missile systems to Iran under a $700 million contract signed in December 2005, Russian media has reported.

"It certainly isn't an appropriate signal to be sending a government which is under U.N. sanctions for trying to develop a nuclear weapon," Grenell said.

According to Russia's ITAR-Tass news agency, the weapons were expected to be used to protect major government and military installations such the nuclear facilities at Isfahan, Bushehr, Tehran and in eastern Iran.

ITAR-Tass on Tuesday quoted Sergei Chemezov, the head of the country's state-run weapons exporter as saying that the Tor-M1 missiles had been delivered before the end of December 2006.

It is not clear whether the sale was completed before the Security Council vote. Russian officials have repeatedly said the sale would not violate any international obligations.

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin, current president of the Security Council, did not explicitly confirm the handover. But he said "whatever deliveries may have been carried out," they had "nothing to do" with the U.N. sanctions on Iran over its uranium enrichment.

The United States last year called for a halt to international arms exports to Iran, and for an end to nuclear cooperation with Iran to pressure it to stop uranium enrichment. Israel has also criticized arms deals with Iran.

Iran denies U.S. accusations that it is using its nuclear power program as a cover to develop nuclear weapons. On Monday, Tehran conducted missile tests and said it had barred 38 U.N. nuclear inspectors from entering the country.

Olmert Calls For Action Against Iran (AP)

By Steven Gutkin

AP, January 25, 2007

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert devoted one of his most important policy speeches of the year Wednesday to a single topic — Iran — saying Israel will respond to a nuclear threat "with all the means at our disposal."

DOJ_NMG_0121694

Addressing an annual security conference in this seaside city, he said the international community has no choice but to act forcefully against Iran and its president, Mahmoud Ahmedinajad, who has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction.

"When the leader of a country announces, officially and publicly, his country's intention to wipe off the map another country, and creates those tools which will allow them to realize their stated threat, no nation has the right to even to weigh its position," Olmert said.

"It is the obligation of every country to act against this with all its might."

Iran has insisted that its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, but Israel believes its goal is to build nuclear weapons that could threaten the Jewish state's existence.

Olmert has made similar declarations before. But Israel has been vague about whether it would be willing to carry out military strikes against Iran, though it has not ruled them out.

"The Jewish people, with the scars of the Holocaust fresh on its body, cannot afford to allow itself to face threats of annihilation once again," Olmert said.

"Anyone who threatens us, who threatens our existence, must know that we have the determination and capability of defending ourselves, responding with force, discretion and with all the means at our disposal," he added.

Olmert said Israel supports using diplomacy to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions and said there is still time for international pressure to work.

"As serious as the Iranian threat is, the threat of nuclear attack on Israel is by no means imminent," he said.

"The Iranian issue preoccupies me and my thoughts constantly," Olmert said.

Olmert's speech diverged from a precedent set by his predecessor, Ariel Sharon, who used the Herzliya gathering as a forum for setting out new policies, like Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza.

Olmert's decision to devote the high-profile speech to Iran reflected his country's growing concern over the issue. The four-day security conference at Herziliya was overwhelmingly about Iran.

Before launching into the Iranian issue, however, Olmert offered a few sentences about Israel's embattled president, Moshe Katsav.

Olmert called on Katsav to resign after the attorney general announced his intention to press criminal charges, including rape, against him.

"Under these circumstances, there is no doubt in my mind that the president cannot continue to fulfill his position and he must leave the president's residence," Olmert said.

Olmert's call for Katsav to step down came minutes after the president finished an emotional address to journalists, insisting that he would not resign unless he is actually indicted.

Olmert himself is under a legal cloud. Police are investigating his role in the 2005 sale of one of Israel's largest banks by the government after allegations that he tried to skew the tender in favor of supporters.

His speech at the Herzliya conference was coolly received, with no breaks for applause, reflecting his loss of popularity because of the inconclusive results of last summer's war in Lebanon.

Outside the hall, a handful of demonstrators called on Olmert to resign because of that war.

U.S. Picks An Inauspicious Time To Restart Mideast Talks (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

HERZLIYA, Israel, Jan. 24 — It would be hard to imagine a less promising moment for the United States to restart serious Palestinian-Israeli peace negotiations.

Six years after the last such talks, the Palestinian government is controlled by Hamas, which preaches Israel's destruction. Approval ratings for the Israeli prime minister are barely in double digits. Gaza and neighboring Lebanon are in turmoil. President Bush is weak.

Yet the administration is holding a meeting on Feb. 2 of the so-called quartet, whose other members are the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, to be followed by "informal talks" between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, with help from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, about the shape of a final peace treaty and the nature of a Palestinian state beside Israel.

The Americans are responding to pleas for re-engagement from the European Union, the Palestinian president and moderate Arab nations.

But expectations are purposely low. Ms. Rice and her Israeli counterpart, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, have borrowed a phrase from frustrated Palestinians and speak only of providing "a political horizon" to the two parties. They have been vague about the content and the path.

The European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, has no doubt what he wants to see.

"It's time to enter final status talks, it's time to enter a discussion of the end of the conflict," he said in an interview. "The crisis-management approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is over. We need to enter the conflict-resolution stage and try to end the occupation of 1967."

But the European Union does not run the quartet; the Americans do.

The main aim, senior American officials suggest, is to increase Palestinian confidence in a two-state solution and thereby elevate those Palestinians who advocate such a solution — Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, and his Fatah movement — and hope to undermine the appeal of Hamas, which rejects a permanent peace with Israel.

Ms. Rice also hopes that new American involvement and leadership will help its Arab allies like Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, let alone the fragile government in Lebanon, which fear the growing influence of Iran and Syria, supporters of Hamas and its Shiite Lebanese counterpart, Hezbollah.

While it is unlikely that either Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, or Mr. Abbas has the political strength to deliver big concessions, "sometimes it's best to try to buy in at the bottom," a senior American official said.

Israelis are nervous about the coming talks, and see them as part of the growing internal rivalry between Mr. Olmert and Ms. Livni, who has said publicly that she is prepared to become prime minister and has become close to Ms. Rice.

Uzi Arad, who had been an aide when Benjamin Netanyahu was prime minister and is now the director of the annual Herzliya Conference here devoted to security issues, said the American initiative was essentially for show, to try to pacify domestic critics on Iraq and nervous Arab allies.

"We all want to do something, but let's see what's doable, to help tranquilize the situation as much as possible and look like progress, without harming our security," Mr. Arad said.

Richard N. Haass, a Middle East specialist who runs the Council on Foreign Relations in New York, said here that "there's a difference between negotiating final status and raising final status." He said the case was strong for doing the latter, which he described as "prenegotiations," starting a process that could only conclude when stronger governments could take serious risks.

"It's important to shape the Palestinian debate and signal to them that there are strong reasons to forgo violence," Mr. Haass said. "If there's a place to go, it puts Hamas on the defensive. It can either strengthen the moderates or help the process of transforming the radicals."

With the Israelis battered by the war in Lebanon, rockets coming from Gaza and a Palestinian power struggle, few Israelis would support large new withdrawals from the West Bank when Mr. Abbas cannot control Palestinian militants and the Palestinian Authority is run by Hamas.

Mr. Olmert is also unwilling now to modify the so-called road map peace plan of 2003, which calls in its first stage for Palestinians to begin to disarm militants and dismantle terrorist organizations while the Israelis freeze settlement building. Final-status negotiations are left to the third stage. But no one in 2003 expected Hamas to be running the Palestinian Authority, and Mr. Abbas has been regularly calling for final-status talks to begin now as a way to provide "a political horizon" and do an end run around Hamas.

These new talks are a compromise — a serious discussion that can clarify a final settlement, including final borders and what will happen to Jerusalem and refugees — without committing either party. If there is a new, all-party commitment to an independent Palestinian state based essentially on 1967 boundaries, it may reinforce the idea of a permanent Israel next to a Palestine, which Hamas, Iran and Islamic Jihad currently reject.

Some Palestinians, too, are skeptical. Moderates welcomed the Rice initiative "because what's important to them is change, even if it is only a facade, that promises a 'positive possibility' for the future," wrote Ali Jarbawi a professor of political science at Birzeit University, on a Web site devoted to an Israeli-Palestinian dialogue, bitterlemons.org.

If the result is "an end to the Israeli occupation and the creation of a Palestinian state on 1967 borders (with minor and agreed-upon adjustments) and solving the issue of refugees according to international resolutions," Mr. Jarbawi wrote, then fine. "But this is not in the framework of thinking of this administration," he said, calling it "hostage to the Israeli perspective," which prefers "a long-term transitional stage."

Salam Fayyad, a former finance minister for the Palestinian Authority, said, "We need an agreed definition of where we're going and how to get there." The current situation is deteriorating, he said, and too much time is wasted on negotiating peripheral issues like roadblocks. "A political horizon is a framework in which internal issues can also be addressed," he said.

David Makovsky, a Middle East expert with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said for the United States the Israeli-Palestinian issue was not central. "The issue is a derivative of getting Arab support for Iraq and Iran policy," he said. "They want a broad front, and this is part of helping those Arab leaders they see as important on these other issues."

AFP, January 25, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121696

Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf said that he had agreed with five Arab leaders to develop a Muslim peace initiative for the Palestinian conflict, which he said lay at the root of worsening violence around the region.

"Destructive violence is going on in Iraq, Lebanon is mired in crisis, and the most dangerous aspects of these two are the visible sectarian undertones which cause a special concern to us in Pakistan," Musharraf told reporters in the United Arab Emirates at the end of a five-nation Middle East tour.

"The core lies in the Palestinian dispute and the core lies in the disharmony within the Muslim world, which is leading to terrorism and extremism," he said.

"This is a time to act and adopt a reconciliatory approach... toward starting a fresh initiative to facilitate peace, a resolution of the Palestinian dispute and bringing harmony to the Muslim world."

Musharraf said there had been a "total consonance of views" on the need for such an initiative among the leaders of the countries he visited -- Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Syria, as well as the UAE.

"We have agreed to undertake this mission in a responsible, pragmatic, but forceful manner," he said, adding that the initiative would have to be a compromise capable of winning broad support.

"The European Union is a very important player, it must be on board. And definitely ... the major players of the world must have faith in this new initiative.

"It has to be a middle course initiative acceptable to both extremes."

The Pakistani president gave no details of how he intended to advance the initiative or how it would mesh with the internationally drafted peace roadmap, which has made next to no progress since its launch nearly four years ago.

US To More Than Triple Aid To Lebanon (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 25, 2007

The United States will offer nearly $770 million to help the fragile democratic government in Lebanon, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday, a tripling of U.S. aid announced a day after deadly protests in Beirut underscored the country's deep political and sectarian divisions.

The donation, which must be approved by Congress, would include $220 million in military aid for the beleaguered Western-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. The money could buy small arms, ammunition, spare parts and Humvees, U.S. officials said.

Lebanon remained tense Wednesday, a day after Hezbollah-led protesters clashed with government supporters across the country, killing three. What had been planned as a peaceful work-stoppage around the country turned into the worst violence since Shiite Hezbollah militants and their allies launched a campaign two months ago to oust the government.

"What you saw yesterday was irresponsible in the violence that erupted," Rice told reporters traveling with her to a 35-nation conference meant to help Lebanon recover from the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah and make a dent in its huge national debt.

The street protests and violence underscore the world's duty to help the democratic government survive in Lebanon, Rice said.

Saniora will also attend the donors' session in Paris, proof that he will not be intimidated by political opponents at home, Rice said.

Although the Saniora government is warmer to the United States than any Beirut government in two decades, he has paid a cost in criticism that he is a puppet of Washington.

Rice will meet privately with Saniora on Thursday, patching up a relationship strained by Saniora's frustration that it took 34 days to get a United Nations cease-fire in the Israeli-Hezbollah war.

The United States was widely viewed as sanctioning Israel's desire to do as much damage to Hezbollah as possible before the campaign stopped last August. The war wasted towns in southern Lebanon, destroying bridges and roads and other structures that neither Hezbollah nor the Beirut government have been able to replace quickly.

Hezbollah, backed by Iran and allied with Syria, is a military and political organization that controlled much of southern Lebanon before the war. The United States considers the group a terrorist organization. Its popularity among many of Lebanon's majority Shiites rose after the war, but the extent of its political clout is uncertain.

Rice did not directly answer a question about whether Tuesday's demonstrations reveal that Hezbollah is strong enough to bring down Saniora. His collapse could re-ignite civil war in a nation of 4 million that has traditionally been a Middle East battleground.

"I assume they would not want to plunge Lebanon into open conflict and to kill lots of innocent Lebanese to pursue their political goals," she said.

The United States and other Western nations that support Saniora see crucial stakes in Lebanon, hoping the country can emerge from years of war as an oasis of stability in the Middle East without interference from countries like Syria or Iran.

The Paris session is expected to bring in pledges of about $5 billion. The government estimates its needs at about $3.5 billion to repair buildings and infrastructure damaged in the summer war. Lebanon owes a staggering $40 billion, some of it dating to the 1970s and the country's long and bitter civil war.

The U.S. money would more than triple last year's pledge of $230 million, and represents a major increase over past years' annual offerings of $30 million to $40 million.

The largest chunk of that money would be a $250 million cash reserve to be meted out as the Lebanese government meets targets for financial and structural overhauls.

About $184 million would go to the U.N. peacekeeping force that is supposed to keep postwar order in southern Lebanon, and $60 million would support internal Lebanese security services.

It is not clear whether any of the money would directly fund efforts to disarm Hezbollah, something the United States insisted must be part of a settlement to end the war but which has never happened.

Donors Gather To Help Lebanon's Government (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 24 — After 50 days of Syrian- and Iranian-backed protests that culminated in Tuesday's daylong standoff in Beirut, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and officials from more than 30 other countries are gathering here to see if they can inject enough money into the Lebanese government to prop up the pro-Western prime minister, Fouad Siniora.

Ms. Rice, demonstrating the level of concern about the deteriorating situation, said Wednesday that the United States would provide close to $1 billion in aid.

In many ways, the donor conference here on Thursday will serve as a snapshot of the larger proxy war between the United States — joined by its Sunni Arab allies and Europe — and Iran and Syria. Lebanon, like Iraq, is a battleground in that war, and Mr. Siniora, a Sunni Muslim, is fighting for his political survival.

The Paris conference is considered central to the survival of his government. Lebanon is badly hobbled after the monthlong war between Israel and Hezbollah last summer, with Hezbollah trying to use the war to strengthen its political role, and reconstruction efforts have been burdened by the country's $41 billion in public debt.

On Tuesday, opposition groups bent on toppling Mr. Siniora's cabinet essentially shut down the country with protests in Beirut.

The protests, initiated by Hezbollah to press its claims, were the latest trial for Mr. Siniora, whose government has survived thus far, Lebanon analysts say, not just because about half of the country supports him, but also because he has strong international support, including from Europe, America and the Sunni Arab countries.

"Very clearly, Syria and Iran don't want to see this work," said David Schenker, a senior fellow in Arab politics at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, referring to the donor conference. "If the Siniora administration walks away from Paris with sufficient funds, it will return to Lebanon vindicated and strengthened, proving that it can effectively govern and pursue key initiatives without Hezbollah."

Some Middle East experts say that Lebanon needs at least $5 billion in aid to cover reconstruction and debt payments. But even if Mr. Siniora were able to raise that much, he would face political problems back at home.

His government has been under siege for two months now, as he has fought to establish a tribunal that may implicate Syria in the killing of a former Lebanese prime minister, Rafik Hariri, an outspoken critic of Syria.

Syria occupied Lebanon for 30 years until being forced to withdraw its troops after the assassination. The United States has accused Syria and Iran of trying to bring down the Siniora government to wreck plans for an international tribunal to try suspects in Mr. Hariri's killing.

The Paris conference is supposed to focus on ways to stimulate the Lebanese economy, improve living conditions for the people and lower the country's debt over five years.

Just how much money it will take to prop up Mr. Siniora is in question. On Wednesday, the European Commission was the first to announce that it would pledge 400 million euros, or $519 million, at the conference, bringing to 500 million euros, or $649 million, its overall reconstruction money for Lebanon over the next five years. President Jacques Chirac of France, who met with Mr. Siniora in Paris on Wednesday, followed with a pledge of a 500-million-euro loan to Lebanon, which a spokesman for Mr. Chirac said would be extended on "highly preferential terms."

Ms. Rice told reporters aboard her flight that the United States, whose contribution will be watched closely, would provide an additional $770 million in grants, including $220 million for the Lebanese armed forces and additional money for the police and peacekeeping. The grants also will include $250 million in cash transfers directly to the government, which will be tied to certain benchmarks that the Siniora government would be required to meet through economic reform programs. A donor conference for Lebanon that was held in Stockholm last year after the Israel-Hezbollah war brought in $940 million in aid, including about $230 million from the United States.

"You will find that the United States will be very supportive of Lebanon at this conference," C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near East affairs, told reporters in Paris. "Of course, you all know the importance of our political voice; now we are going to put some money behind that."

How much Saudi Arabia and other Sunni Arab countries come up with will also be of interest, analysts say. Saudi Arabia and Qatar, in particular, have been giving money in hopes of influencing Lebanon, as a counterweight to Iran and Syria, which have long given huge amounts to Hezbollah and other Lebanese groups, particularly in the south, where support for Hezbollah is the strongest.

On Tuesday, Mr. Chirac tried to play down the impression that donors at the conference were trying to impose their will on the Lebanese people by propping up Mr. Siniora. "I have no preferences among the Lebanese people," Mr. Chirac said. "I respect all the Lebanese people, but I advise them to obey the general rules of democracy, that is, to wait for normal elections to take place, in order, if that's the case, to change the government."

Lebanon's Pro-Western Premier Seeks Aid (AP)

By Jamey Keaten

AP, January 25, 2007

Lebanon's embattled pro-Western prime minister pleaded for international aid Wednesday to stave off financial ruin in his war-scarred country and counter interference from Iran, Syria and their Lebanese allies. The United States said it would offer $770 millon.

Fuad Saniora said he expected a donors conference Thursday in Paris to provide "very significant" financial support from Arab states and Western countries to help Lebanon become a haven of stability in the Middle East.

The meeting comes as Saniora's U.S.-backed government is locked in confrontation with Iranian-backed Hezbollah and other Lebanese foes while struggling under mountains of debt and facing the task of rebuilding following the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah.

It is the third Paris donor conference on Lebanon since 1998.

Experts predict the funds offered — in the form of debt relief, low-cost loans and aid — will likely total $4 billion to $7 billion. That compares to Lebanon's $40 billion of state debt, equivalent to about 185 percent of its annual economic output.

Although they insist the aid will be for all of Lebanon — not just for one man or his government — the U.S. and other donor nations back Saniora and say Lebanon must be defended from meddling by Iran and neighboring Syria, which occupied Lebanon for nearly 30 years until 2005.

"Not helping Lebanon will be much more expensive than helping it," Saniora told reporters after meeting with French President Jacques Chirac to prepare for the meeting, which is expected to draw about 30 foreign ministers and representatives of the World Bank, International Monetary Fund and European Union.

Already Wednesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the U.S. will offer the Lebanese government nearly $770 million, a tripling of U.S. aid announced a day after deadly protests in Beirut underscored the country's deep political and sectarian divisions.

The donation, which must be approved by Congress, would include $220 million in military aid for Saniora's government. The money could buy small arms, ammunition, spare parts and Humvees, U.S. officials said.

Host France announced plans for a $650 million loan at "very advantageous" terms, while the EU pledged $522 million in aid and loans.

Rice was expected to meet early Thursday with Saniora, who is under mounting pressure at home. Pro- and anti-government factions clashed for a second day on the northern Lebanese city of Tripoli on Wednesday — a day after three people died and 173 others were injured in violence nationwide.

"The government of Lebanon may be stressed by what's going on, but I believe they are strong and will weather this crisis," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State David Welch, the State Department's top Middle East diplomat, told reporters in Paris.

Hezbollah gained new support at home from its 34-day war with Israel and is thought to have doled out millions of dollars in aid to people in areas devastated by fighting. Western nations hope to counter that influence by pouring in even more money.

No Hezbollah representatives were invited to the Paris conference because its six ministers quit Saniora's Cabinet last year. France and other donors said they are dealing only with the elected Lebanese government, and it is up to Saniora to work with his domestic opponents.

But the worsening political turmoil has raised concerns that Saniora's government may be too paralyzed to fully rebuild even with newly injected funds. Many parts of southern Lebanon — a Hezbollah stronghold — remain a wasteland five months after the war despite pledges from the government, Hezbollah and the world to help.

The new aid will come with conditions — mainly assurances that Saniora's government make good on economic and structural reforms announced this month, which have infuriated labor unions and Hezbollah supporters.

U.S. Opposes Iranian, Saudi Meddling In Crisis (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

The United States yesterday criticized Iranian overtures to Saudi Arabia suggesting the two countries cooperate to resolve a political crisis between the Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora and the Shi'ite group Hezbollah.

Tehran's proposal, made during a visit to Riyadh last week by Ali Larijani, head of the Supreme National Security Council, is aimed at giving the Iranian-backed Hezbollah a bigger role in the Lebanese Cabinet, diplomats said.

"We certainly wouldn't support any effort to try to negotiate something over and above the heads of the Siniora government," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

"As for any political arrangements or accommodations that Prime Minister Siniora might come to with the various factions in Lebanon, those are going to be decisions for him to make," Mr. McCormack said. "But we won't work with individual ministers from Hezbollah and we won't meet with them."

Clashes between Hezbollah-led protesters and government supporters this week claimed at least three lives and caused dozens of injuries and property damage in Beirut.

"What you saw [Tuesday] was irresponsible in the violence that erupted," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said as she flew yesterday to Paris, where international donors are expected to pledge billions of dollars to help Mr. Siniora rebuild an economy devastated by last summer's war with Israel.

Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia, whose relations with Shi'ite-dominated Iran are usually tense, was said to be suspicious of Tehran's overture, but diplomats said Riyadh is looking for ways to help Mr. Siniora, whom Washington also supports.

Details of Mr. Larijani's meeting with Prince Bandar bin Sultan, a senior Saudi Foreign Ministry official who was a longtime ambassador to Washington, were not available. However, [a]news agency quoted Lebanese "political sources" as saying that any deal also would address plans for a U.N. tribunal to try suspects in the 2005 slaying of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

Mr. Siniora arrived in Paris yesterday for the donors conference, along with about 30 foreign ministers and representatives of the World Bank, International Monetary Fund and European Union.

"Not helping Lebanon will be much more expensive than helping it," he said after meeting with French President Jacques Chirac.

Mr. Chirac said France would extend a $650 million loan at "very advantageous" terms, and the European Union pledged $522 million in aid and loans.

Miss Rice said the United States would offer $770 million, including $220 million in military aid. Last year, Washington pledged $230 million.

The pledges at the Paris conference are expected to total about $5 billion. The government estimates its needs at about $3.5 billion to repair buildings and infrastructure. In addition, Lebanon's debt is about $40 billion, some of it dating to the 1970s and the country's long and bitter civil war.

Mr. McCormack said Miss Rice was accompanied by chief executives of U.S. companies with plans to invest in Lebanon, although he did not name them.

"Long after direct U.S. government assistance has gone through the pipeline and been delivered, investment by foreign companies and U.S. companies is going to continue to create jobs and opportunity in Lebanon," he said.

US Unveils 770 Million Dollar Aid Plan For Lebanon (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 25, 2007

The United States will pledge 770 million dollars in new aid to Lebanon as part of a major international drive to rebuild the country and bolster the embattled pro-Western government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0121700

Rice said the package, to be formally unveiled here Thursday at an international donors conference, would bring total US assistance to Lebanon to more than a billion dollars since a devastating 34-day war last July and August between Israel and the radical Islamic group Hezbollah.

"The president will request of the Congress 770 million dollars in support for Lebanon," she told reporters accompanying her from Washington to Paris.

She said about two-thirds of the new aid would go to strengthen Lebanon's security forces with training and equipment, and to fund reconstruction projects.

The remaining 250 million dollars will be direct assistance to Siniora's administration, which has just unveiled a controversial five-year economic reform plan to cope with rebuilding efforts and a massive 41 billion dollar public debt.

Before the war, annual US aid to Lebanon averaged between 30 and 40 million dollars per year, officials said.

Lebanese officials have said they need several billion dollars to rebuild villages and infrastructure damaged in the Israeli offensive sparked by Hezbollah's kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid in July.

Rice linked the latest US aid, and other pledges expected during Thursday's 30-nation donors meeting, to efforts to strengthen Siniora's government in a power struggle with Hezbollah and other Syrian-backed parties in Lebanon.

Hezbollah-led protests against Siniora and his reform plan erupted into violence Tuesday that left three people dead and fueled fears Lebanon could slide back into the civil strife that wracked the country in decades past.

"Yesterday's events if anything make more important a message from the international community that it supports the democratically elected government of Lebanon," said Rice, who is scheduled to meet with Siniora early Thursday.

She called the protests and violence "irresponsible" and "an effort to provoke, an effort to intimidate" Siniora.

Hezbollah has denounced Siniora as a puppet of the West and is seeking to topple his government or force a power-sharing deal that would leave the Iranian- and Syrian-backed movement and its allies with veto power in cabinet.

US President George W. Bush accused Syria in his State of the Union speech Tuesday of using Hezbollah to reassert its control over Lebanon, which Damascus occupied for decades until popular protests forced it to withdraw its forces in 2005.

Rice said she hoped the pro-Syrian camp "would not want to push Lebanon into open conflict and to kill lots of innocent Lebanese to pursue their political goals."

The United States has already pledged 231 million dollars in government aid to Lebanon since the summer war, including 39 million dollars to provide vehicles, communications equipment, night vision goggles and training to Lebanon's army.

Under the terms of a UN-brokered ceasefire that ended the fighting, the army deployed for the first time in more than 20 years in south Lebanon along Israel's border and also began patrolling the frontier with Syria.

A senior official accompanying Rice said the direct aid will be tied to "benchmarks" in the implementation of Siniora's five-year reform plan, which calls for raising some taxes and privatising the country's electricity and mobile phone sectors.

Another 280 million will provide training, equipment and small arms to the army and police, while 184 million will help fund international peacekeepers deployed in south Lebanon under the UN ceasefire, the official said.

A group of US corporate leaders, including the chief executive of Intel, will also on Thursday announce major workforce training and telecommunications infrastructure investment projects for Lebanon, another official said.

Rice said she was confident Siniora had the "mettle" to follow through on the reforms, unlike a plan announced by Beirut at the last Paris donors conference in 2002 which never took effect.

My Country Needs Help (WSJ)

By Saad Hariri

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Today, the French capital plays host to an international donor conference whose aim is Lebanon's long-term economic stability. The conference, dubbed "Paris III," will be attended by representatives from approximately 40 countries as well as from international financial institutions. This is a critical moment for the international community to support the Lebanese people's choice for democracy, peace and stability.

The friends of my country who will gather in Paris know how much is at stake. Lebanon is truly at a crossroads; the choices and actions Lebanese government officials and their supporters in the international community make are critical for what my country will look like in the future. This conference will be decisive for the future of Lebanon as a democratic and moderate Arab country with a liberal economy, and as a beacon of coexistence and tolerance for the entire region.

There are two competing visions for Lebanon today: One is a vision of freedom, peace, prosperity, democracy and independence from outside interference; the other is a vision of conflict, economic paralysis, oppression and hegemony by Lebanon's neighbors. The late Pope John Paul II praised Lebanon for the example it set for the world through the peaceful coexistence, brotherhood and cooperation among its various religions and sects. This view was shared by my father, the late

Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri, who was assassinated in Beirut on Feb. 14, 2005 -- a despicable act which only served to unite the Lebanese people, who knew that my father dedicated his life to our country's independence and sovereignty.

The Lebanese people chose the vision of peace, independence and unity when they rallied after the assassination of my father. But while the people of Lebanon are free today, we are not free of foreign intervention. Unfortunately, after the devastating Israeli war last summer, the Lebanese people today face another critical challenge fueled by outside interference in our internal affairs. Outside powers are supporting a move by a coalition of Lebanese parties to topple the elected government through street demonstrations and other activities, ostensibly calling for more power-sharing.

But the real goal is to prevent the establishment of the U.N.-endorsed international tribunal which would try those individuals responsible for the assassination of Prime Minister Hariri, and which would finally put an end to a culture of impunity in Lebanon, which has witnessed so many horrific political assassinations that have gone unpunished.

The other goal of the opposition is to prevent the full implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 1701, which demands that the Lebanese government be in full control of the entire country, including southern Lebanon.

At Paris III today the Lebanese government will present its reform program and hopes that an international consensus around Lebanon will help put its economy back on the path to recovery so we can rebuild. In the weeks prior to Paris the government, supported by the majority in parliament, put forth a strategy to continue the country's economic growth and job creation programs as a way forward, despite the political standoff we currently face. We intend to work with our friends in the international community at Paris III to offer the Lebanese people an alternative to the chaos that others seek to sow in Lebanon.

Yet it will not be the first time the international community has come together to help rebuild Lebanon. Three conferences were held previously. The first was the Friends of Lebanon summit in Washington in 1996, hosted by the U.S. State Department. It brought Lebanon much-needed economic aid and political support. The next two conferences, Paris I and Paris II, were hosted by France's President Jacques Chirac in 1998 and 2002. They brought economic aid in the form of grants and projects to help stabilize the Lebanese economy, and thus inject it with enough confidence to generate respectable economic growth and the return of significant international investment.

Paris III is a continuation of the last three conferences and of Prime Minister Hariri's legacy. More importantly, it is a testament to the tremendous work of the democratic Lebanese government and the resilience of the Lebanese people. This resiliency will prevail, and I predict Lebanon once again will be able to extract itself from its difficulties and meet its challenges. Lebanon's greatness lies in its people and its rich history and its values. These are the treasures we are trying to preserve.

There is much at stake at Paris III for all of us. We hope the international community fully understands the historic importance of the path which the Lebanese people have chosen: a path towards true sovereignty, democracy, pluralism and prosperity; and we hope our friends will stand with us.

Mr. Hariri is the majority leader of Lebanon's national parliament.

Hezbollah Won't Topple The Lebanese Government, Its Leader Says (NYT)

By Nada Bakri

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon Jan. 24 — Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader, said Wednesday that Lebanon's opposition movement had decided to stop short of toppling the government of Fouad Siniora, fearing civil strife. He warned, though, that Hezbollah and its allies would continue to ratchet up the pressure on Mr. Siniora in coming weeks and vowed not to back down on their demands.

"The opposition has the political, popular and organizational strength to bring down the unconstitutional government today or tomorrow," Sheik Nasrallah told worshipers commemorating the Shiite holiday of Ashura in Beirut's southern suburbs. "What has so far prevented the fall of the government that is clinging to power is not international support but the patriotic feelings of the opposition and its desire to preserve civil peace."

The speech followed a crippling and violent strike on Tuesday that brought life to a virtual standstill in Lebanon.

Sheik Nasrallah blamed what he called the "government of militias" for Tuesday's violence, insisting that the opposition had respected the rule of law in its protest.

"The war in July showed how many weapons we have," he said. "But we did not resort to those weapons yesterday. Those who insist they have none, however, did use weapons."

He was referring to accusations made on Tuesday by Hezbollah members that their supporters had been protesting peacefully when residents of the area started throwing stones at them.

The police said Tuesday that at least three people died in the violence and that 100 more were wounded throughout the country. It was the worst since Hezbollah began demanding more political power and began a series of protests late last year.

DOJ_NMG_0121702

For the past two months Lebanon has been gripped by a political crisis pitting the Syrian- and Iranian-backed Hezbollah and its allies against the American- and Saudi-backed government of Mr. Siniora.

Hezbollah has demanded that Mr. Siniora step down or form a government of "national unity" that would give the opposition veto power and hold early parliamentary elections. Mr. Siniora has refused to resign, insisting that the opposition come off the streets and negotiate.

Sheik Nasrallah, at the end of November, called for a huge demonstration in the center of Beirut in an effort to paralyze the government. Hundreds of thousands of people came out on Dec. 1 and began a sit-in. The protesters camped out in tents, and Sheik Nasrallah called for them to remain until the government fell.

The violence began Tuesday when groups of protesters set up roadblocks along major streets leading into Beirut, blocking them with burning tires, trucks and rubble. They set fire to vehicles and attacked cars trying to pass. Many of the clashes in Beirut took place in mixed neighborhoods, where young men on each side shouted epithets and hurled stones at one another.

Some of the most violent clashes took place on a highway north of Beirut, where supporters of Gen. Michel Aoun, leader of the Free Patriotic Movement, a Christian group and a Hezbollah ally, fought with men loyal to Samir Geagea, a government ally.

Lebanon slowly inched back to life on Wednesday as cleaners removed roadblocks and debris from streets across the country and as the Lebanese tried to take stock of the political and social implications of Tuesday's action.

Gunfire broke out again on Wednesday during the funeral of one of two people shot dead in the northern city of Tripoli a day earlier, wounding two mourners.

U.S. Launches New Airstrike In Somalia (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, January 25, 2007

The United States launched an airstrike in Somalia against suspected terrorist targets — the second such attack this month, defense officials said Wednesday.

The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the action was carried out in secret, provided few details about the strike by an Air Force AC-130 gunship earlier this week and were uncertain whether the intended target was killed.

One official suggested that early indications showed that no high-value target was killed or captured.

At the Defense Department, spokesman Bryan Whitman declined to confirm any new strike but said in general that the United States is "going to go after al-Qaida in the global war on terrorism wherever it takes us."

He said the nature of some military operations, especially those by special operations commando forces, requires that they be kept secret in order to preserve an advantage in future missions.

Lt. Cmdr. Marc Boyd, a spokesman at U.S. Special Operations Command in Tampa, declined to comment.

A variety of U.S. special operations have operated in the Horn of Africa from a base in Djibouti, a small country sandwiched between Somalia and Ethiopia.

The U.S. Navy also has had forces in waters off the Somali coast, where they have monitored maritime traffic, boarded suspicious ships and interrogated crews in an attempt to catch anyone escaping the Somalia military operations.

Navy officials said Wednesday that no aircraft from the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower, stationed off the Somali coast, were involved in the latest strike.

Earlier this month, Ethiopian and U.S. forces were pursuing three top al-Qaida suspects but failed to capture or kill them in an AC-130 strike in the southern part of Somalia. A main target that time was Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, one of the three senior al-Qaida members blamed for the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The latest operation came as Ethiopia began withdrawing troops that invaded Somalia last month to help Somalia's government drive out a radical Islamic militia that officials say has been harboring al-Qaida operatives.

In Mogadishu on Wednesday, gunmen launched several mortars at the capital's international airport, killing at least two people and wounding several others, witnesses said.

Abdilkabir Salad, who was at the gate of the airport when the mortars fell, said he saw two corpses. Another witness, Abdi Mohamed, said he saw three young men who were injured by shrapnel.

"Two mortars landed inside the airport and the other outside," said Mohamed.

The attack comes one day after Ethiopian troops, whose military strength was crucial to helping Somalia's government drive out a radical Islamic militia, began withdrawing. The pullout leaves the fledgling government to stand on its own for the first time in this notoriously violent capital.

The intervention of Ethiopia last month prompted a military advance that was a stunning turnaround for Somalia's two-year-old government. Without Ethiopia's tanks and fighter jets, the administration could barely assert control outside one town and could not enter the capital, which was ruled by the Council of Islamic Courts.

Moment Of Opportunity In Somalia (NYT)

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

Thanks to an unusual and probably fleeting set of events, Somalia has a chance to return to the community of law-abiding and legitimate states. For a country that dissolved years ago into chronic clan warfare and became a way station for international terrorists, that would be an enormous gain — and an enormous gain for the rest of the world.

To make the most of this opportunity, Washington needs to move quickly, along with Arab and African leaders, to try to broker a political compromise between responsible leaders of the Islamic Courts Union, which was evicted from power last month by the Ethiopians, and the internationally endorsed transitional government installed in its place.

International peacekeepers will also be needed to replace the Ethiopian force, which is already starting to head home. Ethiopia, Somalia's longtime regional rival, needs to complete that withdrawal quickly to avoid a violent nationalist backlash.

If the transitional government is to survive, it will have to strike a deal with moderate Islamists. The person it needs to talk with is Sheik Sharif Ahmed, who is No. 2 in the movement and by most accounts a reasonable man. He is currently in Kenya after apparently getting an American guarantee that he would not be deported back to Somalia.

The United Nations, which helped create the transitional government, should take charge of organizing a peacekeeping force. The Arab League (Somalia is a member) and the African Union (with headquarters in Ethiopia) need to persuade all sides to come and stay at the table. Unfortunately, none of these organizations are known for operating quickly. The Bush administration needs to press them all to seize this moment. This sudden chance to make peace is not likely to last for long.

Rice Dismisses Report North Korea Helping Iran Prepare Nuke Test (AFP)

AFP, January 25, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sought to play down a report in a British newspaper that North Korea was helping Iran prepare an eventual nuclear test explosion.

"I don't see that it's based on anything that I've seen," Rice said of the report published in The Daily Telegraph.

"I don't see what it's based on," she told reporters accompanying her to a Lebanon donors conference in Paris.

Citing an unnamed senior European defence official, the newspaper said that North Korea has agreed to share all the data it received from its nuclear test last year as both countries face Western pressures over the development of their own nuclear programmes.

"The Iranians are working closely with the North Koreans to study the results of last year's North Korean nuclear bomb test," the European defence official was quoted as saying by the newspaper.

"We have identified increased activity at all of Iran's nuclear facilities since the turn of the year ... All the indications are that the Iranians are working hard to prepare for their own underground nuclear test."

The official also said that North Korea had invited a team of Iranian scientists to study the results of last year's underground nuclear test.

Rice also said she had spoken with her South Korean counterpart Wednesday and the foreign ministers of China and Japan on Tuesday as part of efforts to hold a new round of six-party nuclear disarmament talks with North Korea.

"We're hoping for an early resumption. I think its' time to do that," she said.

"We've had productive preparatory discussions with all of the parties, including the North Koreans, but there's not going to be an agreement until we're in the six-party format," she said.

"So I think people would like to get to an early resumption of the talks."

The six-nation talks involving China, Japan, Russia and the United States, as well as North and South Korea, started in 2003 but have been repeatedly suspended and have failed to yield concrete results.

The most recent round was held last month in Beijing after a 13-month break and a UN Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea for carrying out its first nuclear test explosion in October failed to make any headway.

US and North Korean negotiators met in Berlin last week and reported progress towards a resumption of the broader negotiations, but no date has been set.

Iran is also under UN sanctions since December for refusing to suspend a uranium enrichment program it says is designed to produce fuel for nuclear power production but that many fear is aimed at making nuclear weapons.

Greek Militants Claim Embassy Attack (AP)

By Derek Gatopoulos

AP, January 25, 2007

A Greek militant group has claimed responsibility for a rocket attack on the U.S. Embassy in Athens earlier this month, blaming American policy in Iraq and the Middle East for the strike.

DOJ_NMG_0121704

The far-left group Revolutionary Struggle issued a statement to the weekly Pontiki newspaper, its publisher Dimitris Benekos said Wednesday. He said the statement would be published on Thursday and police said forensic experts were examining the document.

"It is a five-page statement which explains why it chose the embassy as a target, linking (the attack) with U.S. foreign policy in various parts of the world — Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, Palestine and so on," Benekos told The Associated Press.

"The statement was signed by Revolutionary Struggle," he said.

There were no injuries in the Jan. 12 attack, which caused minor damage. The strike using a rocket-propelled grenade alarmed authorities, who fear a possible resurgence of Greek militant attacks that were common in the 1980s and 1990s.

On the day of the attack, a Greek private security firm used by the embassy received a call from someone claiming to be from Revolutionary Struggle. But police could not verify that the caller actually represented the group.

Benekos said the statement also mentioned the names of two government ministers and senior judges in an apparent threat of future attacks.

Revolutionary Struggle, which first appeared three years ago, has claimed responsibility for a failed bomb attack on Greek Culture Minister George Voulgarakis. Nobody was injured in the May 2006 blast.

The group also bombed a U.S. bank, a police station and two government ministries, including a 2005 blast in Athens' main Syntagma Square.

Revolutionary Struggle has sent four statements in the past to Pontiki claiming responsibility for attacks.

"The method in which the statement was delivered and the appearance of the statement itself are similar to the previous cases," Benekos said.

British Defence Ministry Denies Rift With US After Diplomat's Comments (AFP)

AFP, January 25, 2007

The British defence ministry denied there was any rift with the United States over the two countries' plans for troop levels in Iraq following comments made by the US ambassador to the war-torn country.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the American envoy to Baghdad, had earlier told the BBC that the United States "would like the British to co-ordinate and for us to have a joint plan."

Though the United States is planning a "surge" of about 21,500 troops in Iraq, Britain has said it wants to withdraw "thousands" of its soldiers from the country this year.

"There is no tension between US and UK objectives and activities in Iraq," a spokeswoman for the defence ministry said.

"We are a major member of the Coalition ... our plans are consistent with the Coalition's long-term strategy and the Iraqi government's desire for increased Iraqi security responsibility.

"This is the strategy of transition, which we are working towards, as are the Americans. We always said this was a process and not an event and will happen at a different pace across Iraq."

Khalilzad, who is set to be Washington's next ambassador to the United Nations, earlier said in an interview with the BBC: "It's clear what our preference would be -- the longer we stay together here, the better," adding that he was convinced that a "mutually acceptable" agreement would be reached.

Earlier this month, US President George W. Bush announced a major policy shift for Iraq after nearly four years of escalating violence, saying that he was adding 21,500 soldiers to the 132,000 US troops deployed in the country.

Britain, by contrast, has said it hopes to withdraw thousands of its 7,200 troops in Iraq, most of whom are deployed to the south of the country.

Chinese Leader To Visit Sudan For Talks On Darfur Conflict (NYT)

By Howard W. French

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

SHANGHAI, Jan. 24 — Chinese officials announced Wednesday that President Hu Jintao would visit Sudan in early February and would seek a diplomatic solution to the conflict in the country's western Darfur region, which the United States has described as genocide.

Mr. Hu's visit to Sudan will be part of an eight-country tour of Africa, the latest of a string of high-level visits to the continent by Chinese officials.

In recent months, China has faced widespread criticism for its economic engagement with Sudan at a time when government-allied militias known as the janjaweed have carried out frequent attacks on civilian populations in western Darfur. At least 200,000 people have died in the conflict since early 2003, and many thousands have been forced to flee their homes.

DOJ_NMG_0121705

China has played a leading role in building a thriving oil industry in Sudan amid the violence in Darfur, and now imports more than 64 percent of Sudan's oil exports, accounting for nearly 5 percent of China's petroleum imports.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman said that China would use its diplomatic influence to encourage a settlement of the Darfur crisis, but that China would not publicly pressure Sudan or threaten it with sanctions.

"The Sudan issue should be resolved like any other — through peaceful negotiation," Assistant Foreign Minister Zhai Jun said at a news conference in Beijing. "Using pressure and imposing sanctions is not practical and will not help settle the issue."

Mr. Zhai acknowledged China's prominent role as a leading trading partner of Sudan's and said China would sign new economic agreements with the country during Mr. Hu's visit. "With Sudan, we have cooperation in many aspects, including military cooperation," he said. "In this, we have nothing to hide."

China's intense engagement with the continent has brought increasing scrutiny, and very often criticism, from Western governments and from international human rights groups and others who say China ignores questions of governance and of rights as it pursues business opportunities in Africa.

Despite the vow not to pressure the Sudanese government, Chinese diplomatic analysts said the announcement of a diplomatic initiative with Sudan was a turning point in China's foreign policy and in its relations with Africa in particular.

"This is a remarkable change," said Shi Yinhong, an expert in international relations at People's University in Beijing. "It would boost China's image in the West, and would be welcomed in Africa, too."

Mr. Shi said that during the recent China-Africa summit meeting in Beijing, Mr. Hu had pushed the Sudanese president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, in private to cooperate with the United Nations.

"China has begun to follow a different pattern on this issue," Mr. Shi said, adding, "When the world talks about China's rise, naturally that places demands and pressure on China to take on more responsibility."

An expert in African affairs, however, expressed more caution. "China now is showing slightly different tactics, paying more attention," said He Wenping, director of African studies at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, in Beijing. "Hu's visit at least gives a clear signal that China thinks the Sudan issue is important and China wants to play a role. But China's strategy remains the same, and as always, it uses quiet diplomacy to keep a constructive engagement, rather than waving a stick."

In the last two years, Africa has been the focus of a huge push by Chinese diplomats and companies to expand China's influence abroad. Africa's many countries offer China a rich source of support in United Nations votes and help in securing petroleum and other natural resources needed by China's booming economy.

Africa is also a stage of China's bitter diplomatic contest with Taiwan, with China offering large amounts of foreign aid and investment to countries in order to keep them from recognizing Taiwan, which this country regards as a breakaway province.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman, Mr. Zhai, acknowledged that there had been problems in certain countries, like Zambia, where there were riots last year at a Chinese-controlled copper mine after a labor dispute over working conditions. "We are also trying to educate Chinese businesses who have interests in Africa and investments there to respect social conventions and observe local laws and regulations," he said.

Analyst Rebuked Over His Support Of Spy For China (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

A senior U.S. intelligence analyst has been formally criticized for "poor judgment" after writing a letter and e-mails in support of a convicted former Defense Intelligence Agency analyst, U.S. intelligence officials said.

Lonnie Henley, the deputy national intelligence officer (NIO) for East Asia, was given a letter of reprimand several months ago after an investigation within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI).

Mr. Henley, who could not be reached for comment, was a close friend and protege of former DIA analyst Ronald Montaperto, who was convicted in June on espionage charges that included supplying secrets to Chinese military intelligence. Mr. Henley wrote a letter to the judge supporting Montaperto, and an e-mail that criticized the FBI investigation of the former analyst.

DNI spokesman Carl Kropf declined to comment on the reprimand, noting that it was an administrative matter.

"The issue has been appropriately addressed within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence," Mr. Kropf said.

Montaperto pleaded guilty in June to charges related to illegally storing classified documents. As part of a sting operation that led to his conviction, Montaperto admitted passing "top-secret" and "secret" information to two Chinese military intelligence officers. He was sentenced to three months in prison.

Montaperto's admissions of passing highly classified data to the Chinese coincided with the loss of a major U.S. electronic eavesdropping operation against China in the late 1980s, U.S. officials said.

Mr. Henley is in line for promotion to the top post of NIO for East Asia, but the appointment could be derailed by the reprimand, officials familiar with the internal inquiry said.

Mr. Henley is favored for the job by National Intelligence Council Chairman Thomas Fingar, who officials say shares the views of Mr. Henley and Montaperto on China.

The current NIO for East Asia, James J. Shinn, is set to take a job in the defense secretary's office.

The letter of reprimand was similar to the punishments received in two other cases of bad judgment within the National Intelligence Council, of which NIOs are a part.

Lawrence K. Gershwin, NIO for science and technology, and retired Army Maj. Gen. John R. Landry, NIO for military issues, were reprimanded for their role in the 2002 National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

The cases are expected to be raised during Senate intelligence committee hearings on the nomination of retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell to be the next director of national intelligence.

Mr. Henley first got into trouble after writing a private e-mail in June to a closed group of more than 100 China specialists known as "Chinasec" that included several high-ranking CIA and other U.S. intelligence officials and private China affairs specialists.

The two-page e-mail criticized the FBI for investigating Montaperto. Mr. Henley stated that he had spoken with Montaperto and that he regarded his passing of secrets to Chinese intelligence as inadvertent and minor security violations.

Mr. Henley also compared Montaperto in the e-mail to fired FBI Agent James J. Smith, a senior counterintelligence official who was convicted of lying to the FBI as part of the Chinese spying case of Los Angeles businesswoman Katrina Leung.

Montaperto's conviction was a blow to the influential group of China affairs specialists in the U.S. government and private sector who share similar benign views of China. The group has been called the Red Team by critics and are known to harshly criticize or discredit anyone who questions or criticizes China's communist government and its activities.

Blackmailing By Journalists In China Seen As 'Frequent' (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

SHENZHEN, China -- At 9 p.m. in a dark Shenzhen parking lot, Bai Xiuyu handed over a plain brown envelope containing 15,000 Chinese yuan, the equivalent of nearly $2,000, in what was supposed to be a discreet blackmail payment to a local reporter.

Hidden in Bai's car, Gou Hua, Shenzhen bureau chief for the Southern Metropolitan Daily, watched the scene unfold and recorded the transaction with his cellphone camera. His interest was more than journalistic; the reporter receiving the payoff was Zhou Yu, a 29-year-old newcomer to Gou's own bureau.

To his consternation, what Gou saw the evening of Sept. 21 was another instance of the blackmail journalism metastasizing through China's news media. Bai's money was supposed to buy silence on alleged wrongdoing at her health clinic in this southern Chinese city. But more generally, journalists and officials say, Chinese reporters are demanding such hush money with increasing regularity from businesses and government agencies in exchange for the withholding of unfavorable news.

"It's very, very frequent," said Ma Yunlong, an editor whose newspaper exposed an instance of extravagant extortion in central Henan province in 2005. Ma said the case involved 480 reporters and others pretending to be reporters who asked for "shut-up fees" to keep news of a mine flood out of the public eye.

In many ways, blackmail journalism grew naturally out of a system in which Communist Party censors control the news rigorously, barring reports that could be seen as unfavorable to the party or contrary to the government's political goals. If the ruling party distorts the news for political reasons, blackmailing reporters have concluded, why wouldn't they do it themselves for financial reasons?

In addition, local party officials, long used to manipulating information, have been complicit in the payoff system when it suits their needs. In the everybody-does-it atmosphere, even non-reporters have found ways to get in on the take by posing as journalists.

After the August 2005 mine disaster, for instance, reporters and their friends in Henan province dispatched a flurry of cellphone messages as soon as they heard the news -- not because they were eager to report on it, but because they knew local officials would be eager to hush it up.

By the time Fan Youfeng of the Henan Business News arrived at the mine, in a village in Jiliao county, local officials said they had already given money to so many reporters and phony reporters that the coffers were dry. But still more people showed up, Fan wrote, and the officials sought more cash, pressing the mine owners to chip in.

Journalists and poseurs lined up to get their handouts, he said, with some pushing and jumping the queue. Over several days, the extortionists carried away 200,000 yuan, or more than $25,000, he reported, quoting officials and a list signed by those who got the cash.

Encouraged by Ma, his editor, Fan wrote a story for the Henan Business News about what had happened. It was the first open discussion of what had become a widespread if secretive practice, Ma said with a note of pride.

As a result, however, an official from the central government propaganda department visited from Beijing and accused Ma of publishing an "inappropriate" and "false" story. The newspaper was suspended for a month, Ma was forced to retire and Fan was reprimanded, Ma said. The death toll from the mine disaster was never reported, he added.

"This kind of thing has an important impact on the success of local officials," Ma explained, "so they always want to cover it up."

More recently, some blackmail targets have started striking back. More than 40 people were arrested last month in Shanxi province on charges of impersonating reporters and trying to extort money from local officials and business owners, according to the official New China News Agency.

"People can't help but ask, 'Why are these fake reporters so savage?' " the news agency said in a Dec. 12 editorial.

Zhou Yu, a slight man with sharp gestures and a ring in his left earlobe, said the lure of money was not what motivated him to take Bai's payoff envelope that evening in Shenzhen. "I was trying to help," he said in an interview. "It was out of friendship."

Zhou said Bai, a physician, had telephoned him earlier in the day asking for advice because, she said, two reporters had warned her they were about to write a story accusing her Jianmin Clinic of providing services it was not certified to perform, including abortions. Bai turned to him, Zhou explained, because a year earlier he had written what he described as a critical but objective story about her clinic.

"If I can help a friend, I think I should help," he said.

The two reporters who went to Bai's office were Hua Kejian of the Nanfang Daily and Liang Yongjian of Zhou's own Southern Metropolitan Daily, both owned by the prestigious Nanfang publishing house based in nearby Guangzhou, according to Zhou and others involved. A third reporter, Song Yi of the Yangcheng Evening News, joined the pair later in the day, they said.

"Their motive was very apparent," Zhou said.

After contacting the reporters, Zhou told Bai she would have to come up with 15,000 yuan to buy silence for her clinic, according to Zhou and the other sources. Zhou said he did not plan to pocket any of the money himself, only to pass it along to the other reporters.

"I thought this would be okay with my newspaper," he added, "because I was just a go-between."

The sum demanded was high, even for a boomtown such as Shenzhen. Most blackmail payouts to reporters are counted in the hundreds of yuan, according to Chinese reporters and editors. Acting on the advice of another acquaintance, therefore, Bai sent a cellphone message to Zhou complaining that the price was unreasonable. But Zhou responded that there was no way to reduce it, Bai's acquaintance said in an interview.

Zhou told Bai the cash should be divided into three packets of 5,000 yuan each and arranged for the handover to take place in the parking lot near his bureau on a leafy boulevard in central Shenzhen, according to several people involved.

At that point, Gou, the bureau chief, received a troubling telephone call. The acquaintance of Bai's, outraged at the amount demanded by Zhou, called to say Gou's reporters were involved in a blackmail scheme and that, as bureau chief, he should do something about it, according to Gou and the acquaintance, who described his role on condition of anonymity.

"As soon as I heard about it," Gou said in an interview, "I wanted to verify what was going on."

Gou, 32, arranged with Bai to be in her car that evening as a witness.

When Bai got out of her car and approached Zhou, the two exchanged pleasantries for several minutes, and Zhou patted her on the shoulder. But when Zhou looked inside the envelope, he complained because she had not divided the cash into three bundles as requested, according to Zhou and others.

Zhou, in the interview, said he showed up alone to collect the money because the three other reporters were busy and he wanted to do them a favor. Gou, the bureau chief, said that "a lot is unclear" about what was really going on. In any case, Gou got out of the car after taking the photographs and confronted Zhou, who promptly handed the envelope back to Bai.

Returning the money was not enough, Gou said, and ordered Zhou to follow him to the office. Once inside, Gou started writing a memo about what had occurred and demanded to see Liang, the other reporter from his paper.

Liang reported to Gou's office looking embarrassed, witnesses said. "There's nothing wrong with my reporting," he maintained, according to the witnesses. For his part, Zhou said that the ringleader was Nanfang Daily's Hua Kejian and that he himself was only trying to help Bai get through a difficult time.

Unmoved, Gou fired Zhou. Liang was spared for lack of evidence, he said, and continues to work in the bureau. Hua Kejian and Song Yi also remain at their jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0121708

At the bureau's regular weekly meeting on Oct. 10, Gou told his staff that the Zhou Yu case was a "shame" for himself, the bureau and the newspaper, besmirching its "glorious history," according to a record of the meeting.

After investigating, Gou told his reporters that he was convinced this was a unique case; he threatened to fire any others caught engaging in such conduct. "If anyone feels he can only make a living by blackmailing people, he should leave," Gou said, according to the record. "This is not the place for you."

But he also acknowledged that Shenzhen has an "unhealthy environment" in which such corruption can flourish. One of his own reporters has asked him repeatedly to withhold certain news, he complained.

Shenzhen journalists said that, in addition to blackmailing, reporters and editors regularly receive payments from businessmen and officials in exchange for publication of favorable articles. Instances range from the 300,000 yuan paid to a newspaper recently for an article praising Shenzhen's city government to "red envelopes" containing "transportation money" for reporters who show up at news conferences. The practice is encouraged, they added, by a system in which reporters are also responsible for selling advertising and subscriptions to the institutions and businesses they cover.

The payoffs have become so accepted that a reporter who showed up this month at a news conference called by an Internet software company here complained loudly and walked out when he discovered he would be given only a bottle of mineral water, according to other reporters present.

"I would say there are problems in the Chinese media world," one of them commented.

Zhou, meanwhile, said he feels betrayed by Bai for denouncing him to his boss. He no longer has any contact with his former colleagues Liang, Hua and Song, he said. His girlfriend seems to be the only one who believes his version of what happened that evening, he complained. His dreams of being a great journalist have dimmed, he added, and now he plans to start a trading company.

"I'm not thinking of the news business anymore," he said, smiling. "This had too much of an impact on me."

Debris In Space (WSJ)

By Bruce Berkowitz

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

China's foreign ministry acknowledged on Tuesday what the world press had reported for almost two weeks: a test of an anti-satellite weapon in space. The danger now is that partisans and pundits will overreact. Some will claim the launch represents a new threat to the United States. Others will warn of the militarization of space.

They are both wrong. The real threat is that Washington will miss an opportunity to move China along the path to more diplomatic openness and democracy, and deter it from aggression against its neighbors and American interests.

It helps to begin with a few facts. First, it is not especially difficult to make a "killer satellite." If a country can build a satellite, it is easy to build one that can approach another satellite and destroy it. Modern guidance technology is widely available and more accurate than ever, so this step is not difficult. Conversely, it is impossible to ban killer satellites without banning all satellites. Even if a country did not build a dedicated killer and train its operators, the skills for space rendezvous, docking and refueling (like the Russian "Progress" vehicle used to supply the International Space Station) are the same.

Second, because these technologies and skills are interchangeable, it is impossible to verify a ban on killer satellites. Unverifiable treaties are worse than no treaties at all because they offer the illusion of control where none exists.

Third, the Chinese test is not a major step in "militarizing space." Space is already heavily militarized. Most major military powers use satellite-based systems for communications, navigation and imagery. It's all available from commercial venders. The U.S. may operate more satellites than any other country, but it is not uniquely dependent on them.

Fourth, even if one were to somehow ban killer satellites, there are many other ways to deny an adversary the use of space -- for example, by bombing an enemy's ground stations or jamming the radio links he uses to command satellites. So even if a ban on killer satellites were possible, it would not solve the vulnerability problem.

In short, anyone concerned with the ability of the U.S. to use space should be concerned less by the fact that China tested a weapon, and more by the kind of weapon it tested.

Press reports say that the Chinese killer satellite was a "kinetic" weapon, similar to the kind the U.S. and the Soviet Union tested 20 years ago. These satellites destroy targets by ramming into them at high velocity, or by shooting their victim with a mass of pellets, like buckshot. Either way, the result is a huge amount of debris in orbit, creating a hazard to other satellites. Most of this debris remains in space for several decades -- or longer.

According to NASA, there are already approximately 11,000 objects larger than 10 centimeters circling the Earth. The number of objects smaller than that -- mainly unused rocket fuel, exhaust waste and flecks and chips from routine operations -- is so great as to be practically incalculable.

In time, an accumulation of this debris could make space operations extremely difficult. The material orbits the Earth at seven kilometers per second or more, depending on its altitude. At this velocity, even minute objects can cause enormous damage to satellites. This is why U.S. space operators are required to minimize debris under regulations administered by NASA.

Since the Chinese have ambitions of their own to use space, they have as much interest as the U.S. to limit debris. Washington should use this test as an opportunity to discuss an international convention on the subject. These discussions could codify the guidelines that Russia, Japan, the European Space Agency and the U.S. already follow, and would bring China into the fold.

There is a precedent for an agreement on space debris: the Incidents at Sea Agreement America signed with the Soviet Union in 1972. At the time, U.S. and Soviet warships were playing an aggressive game of intimidation, stunting and near-misses as each shadowed the other's exercises. Neither wanted to give in, nor allow the game to go too far.

In talks over the course of a year, the two navies agreed to guidelines for avoiding collisions. The agreement was negotiated largely at the working level, where naval officers dealt with each other on a professional basis to achieve a practical understanding.

If Washington simply protests the anti-satellite test or ignores it, the U.S. will tell the Chinese military that there is no penalty for their actions, nor any real desire abroad to stop them. On the other hand, if there is any discussion or disagreement among Chinese leaders on this subject, America can at least let Beijing know the test will affect U.S.-China relations.

Minimizing space debris is just like protecting intellectual property and setting a market value for the renminbi. It's an obligation China must meet if it expects to take part in the free market. We'll never demilitarize space. But we can make it a safer place to work, and in the process move America's China policy along, too.

China's Missile Message (WP)

By Elizabeth Economy

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

China's successful anti-satellite missile test has sparked a political firestorm, as analysts have tried to ascertain who in China knew what when and to what end. Were China's diplomats in the dark about the missile strike? Was it all a gambit to force a reluctant United States to the negotiating table for a ban on space-based weapons? While interesting to China watchers and nonproliferation experts, this discussion risks obscuring the real message of the test: Chinese rhetoric notwithstanding, China's rise will be as disruptive and difficult as that of any other global power.

Officials in both Beijing and Washington have worked hard to sketch out an alternative reality. China's leaders have traversed the globe, preaching the gospel of the country's peaceful rise, often to great effect: China will do things differently than the United States and earlier European powers did, not polluting the environment, not colonizing countries to gain access to their natural resources and not infringing on the sovereignty of other countries. For their part, senior U.S. officials, with a growing list of challenging issues on their China agenda, are reluctant to focus for too long on the reality of China's rise. Doing so would only make cooperation more difficult and provide support to an often obstreperous anti-China lobby in Congress. It is easier to paint China's rise as a work in progress -- one that the United States has the ability to influence.

Yet the truth is that China, with its rapidly growing economy and large population, already exerts an unsettling and often negative impact on the world. China is the largest or second-largest contributor to many of the most vexing global environmental problems, including climate change, the illegal timber trade, ozone depletion and marine pollution in the Pacific. It is squeezing manufacturing industries from South Africa to Thailand to Mexico, placing stress on economies ill-equipped to compete. And its weak public health infrastructure but strict media regulations rank it at the top of potential incubators for the next global health pandemic.

While such effects might be excused as unintentional consequences of China's rapid growth, others cannot be so easily dismissed. China's insistence that it doesn't mix business with politics in its foreign relations, while sounding benign, has the perverse effect of contributing to violence and repression throughout much of the world. Its political and financial support for regimes in Sudan, North Korea, Zimbabwe and Burma, among others, cannot in any way be construed as contributing to global peace and stability. Moreover, China's export of unsavory environmental and labor practices in countries where it is aggressively extracting natural resources has contributed to anti-Chinese demonstrations from Peru to Zambia.

The missile strike also underscores perhaps the greatest challenge of China's rise as a global power: The lack of transparency, official accountability and rule of law that defines China on the domestic front plays poorly on the international stage. Chinese leaders' inability to be forthcoming on matters of international importance -- whether SARS, the Harbin pollution disaster or this missile strike -- erodes whatever goodwill and trust they earn from their tireless sojourns abroad and suggests that they are not ready for prime time.

If this is the reality of China's rise, then the United States has work to do, the most important being to change the way it does business. If we want China to be a responsible world power on issues such as energy security, climate change, human rights and even space-based weapons, we need to step up and lead. We can and should condemn China for not respecting the international rules governing these issues or negatively affecting other countries' well-being, but we must be prepared to play by the same rules. While other powers may have granted American exceptionalism in the past, China is not inclined to do so. Indeed, China is more likely to seek its own "exceptional" status.

Even if we get that far, there will still be a tough road ahead. The transparency, accountability and rule of law that responsible world leadership entails are nascent and under constant threat in China. This is where Washington has it right. We need a strong commitment -- from the federal government as well as the private sector -- to helping, if not pushing, China in the right direction, and we need to do so with a long-term perspective.

If there is a silver lining to this missile strike, it may be that we can finally stop talking about China's peaceful rise or the Washington consensus vs. the Beijing consensus. The only consensus that matters is one rooted in a clear understanding of China's rise and the urgency it brings to the need for real U.S. leadership.

Russia Hits U.S. Anti-missile Plans (WT/AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

NEW DELHI -- Russia's defense minister yesterday harshly criticized U.S. plans to deploy missile-defense sites in Central Europe, saying Moscow doesn't trust the U.S. explanation that they are intended to counter missile threats posed by Iran and North Korea.

Sergei Ivanov, speaking during a trip to India where he co-chaired a bilateral commission on military ties, said neither Iran nor North Korea has or will have a capability to build missiles that can reach Europe.

"They don't and won't have intercontinental ballistic missiles," Mr. Ivanov told reporters. "And a question comes: whom it's directed against?"

U.S. authorities said Monday they had told Polish leaders that the United States wants to open formal negotiations on the possibility of locating ground-based interceptor missiles in Poland.

Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek of the Czech Republic also said Washington had asked to base a radar station in the country that would serve as another part of the system.

Both Poland and the Czech Republic are former Soviet satellite nations that are now NATO members.

Mr. Ivanov said yesterday that the deployment of U.S. missile-defense facilities in Poland and the Czech Republic was a decided issue despite official claims that talks were still ahead.

"It's done mostly to assuage domestic public opinion," he said. "The decision already has been made, and the talks serve simply as a cover. Like other new NATO members, the Czech Republic and Poland want to show their loyalty."

Russian military officials have said they see the U.S. system as a threat that would upset the security balance and have warned of unspecified measures in response.

Asked about how Russia could respond to the U.S. move, Mr. Ivanov said there was no need for any quick retaliation. "Our strategic nuclear forces ensure national security under any scenario," he said.

Russia's criticism of the U.S. move comes just days after the United States and other allies raised concerns over the rising militarization of space after a successful test by China of an anti-satellite weapon.

China confirmed the test on Tuesday but didn't provide details. Aviation Week, which first reported the test, said the satellite was hit by a "kinetic kill vehicle" launched from a ballistic missile.

Analysts said the test represented an indirect threat to U.S. defense systems by raising the possibility that its spy satellites could be shot down. The threat wouldn't affect the anti-missile system.

Putin In India: Visit Is Sign Of Durability Of Old Ties (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

NEW DELHI, Jan. 24 — A new nuclear accord, booming trade and an ever closer partnership with the United States notwithstanding, the guest of honor this week at India's Republic Day ceremony, an annual display of military pomp, will be a symbol of New Delhi's newest old friend: President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia.

Mr. Putin's two-day visit to this country, starting Thursday, is his fourth since becoming president and is seen as testament to the enduring ties between India and Russia. Battered by the end of the cold war and challenged by India's warmer relations with the United States, those links have been revived by the strategic demands of a prospering India, namely energy and arms. In both areas Russia stands to be an important partner.

Asked about the visit's significance, one Indian government minister took pains to point out that his country's old camaraderie with Moscow ought not to alarm its new friends in Washington.

"Our relationship with Russia is not directed against the United States, and our relationship with the United States is not at the expense of our continued engagement with Russia," said Jairam Ramesh, India's junior commerce minister.

For starters, India wants to expand its access to investment in Russia's vast oil reserves. On the agenda during Mr. Putin's visit, Indian officials have said, is a proposed joint venture to explore for oil in Siberia. India's $1 billion stake in an existing project called Sakhalin I is this country's largest foreign investment.

Reliance Industries, an Indian energy company, has floated the idea of investing in a Russian refinery.

And according to Indian officials, Russia has expressed interest in investing in a pipeline that would carry natural gas from Iran through Pakistan to India. The Bush administration has repeatedly expressed reservations about the project.

India's current oil imports from Russia, or indeed from anywhere outside the Middle East, are negligible, primarily because of transportation problems.

Far more important, analysts pointed out, Moscow is already New Delhi's largest defense partner. Paradoxically, when the India-United States nuclear deal opens the door for New Delhi to buy nuclear technology to expand its civilian nuclear program, Russia may benefit.

Kanwal Sibal, India's ambassador to Russia, predicted that Russia would be "among the first, if not the first, to walk in."

India would be allowed to purchase nuclear fuel, reactors and other technology on the world market, but only after it gained approval from the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group, which regulates international atomic energy trade.

Russia is already building two nuclear reactors in this country. This week, the Interfax news agency quoted the Russian defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, as saying his government was prepared to build additional reactors here.

Likewise, India has Moscow to thank for a variety of conventional weaponry, from tanks to an aircraft carrier and fighter jets. Russia remains India's biggest military partner, though New Delhi's utter dependence on Moscow during the cold war has been complicated by new entrants, most prominently Israel.

The Indians and the Russians have jointly produced a short-range missile called the Brahmos, which, contrary to Russian objectives, India wants to sell on the private market. And India's ambitions for space research — particularly in light of China's successful testing of an antisatellite missile last week — rely heavily on Russian cooperation.

"Russia continues to be as important an ally as before and will remain that way, but the contours of this relationship have changed," said Ashok Mehta, a retired general.

Best of all from an Indian perspective, Russia has displayed none of the compulsions that the United States has, for instance, to maintain good relations with India's neighbor and rival, Pakistan.

Gauging Russia's future importance to India is a matter of debate. If India is allowed to shop on the world nuclear market, Russia is likely to face competition from France, C. Raja Mohan, the strategic affairs columnist of The Indian Express, argued, and from the United States and Israel on conventional weapons.

Russia's soft power in this country has all but collapsed. Where once there were state-sponsored performances of the Bolshoi Ballet in New Delhi and Russian literature flooded Indian libraries, there are now only a handful of relics of Russian romance left: a statue of Lenin at a public park here in the capital or a prominent politician in the south named after Stalin.

Trade with Russia has plummeted. At roughly $2.5 billion, it now represents a little more than a tenth of India-China trade. In an effort to fix that, a trade delegation is expected to come to India next month.

Smuggler's Plot Highlights Fear Over Uranium (NYT)

By Lawrence Scott Sheets And William J. Broad

New York Times, January 25, 2007

TBILISI, Georgia, Jan. 24 — Last January, a Russian man with sunken cheeks and a wispy mustache crossed into Georgia and traveled to Tbilisi by car along a high mountain road. In two plastic bags in his leather jacket, Georgian authorities say, he carried 100 grams of uranium so refined that it could help fuel an atom bomb.

The Russian, Oleg Khinsagov, had come to meet a buyer who he believed would pay him $1 million and deliver the material to a Muslim man from "a serious organization," the authorities say.

The uranium was a sample, just under four ounces, and the deal a test: If all went smoothly, he boasted, he would sell a far larger cache stored in his apartment back in Vladikavkaz, two to three kilograms of the rare material, four and a half to six and a half pounds, which in expert hands is enough to make a small bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0121712

The buyer, it turned out, was a Georgian agent. Alerted to Mr. Khinsagov's ambitions by spies in South Ossetia, Georgian officials arrested him and confiscated his merchandise. After a secret trial, the smuggler was sentenced to eight and a half years in prison.

The case has alarmed officials because they had thought that new security precautions had tamped down the nuclear black market that developed in the 1990s, after the Soviet Union collapsed.

Until now, all but the vague outlines of the case have remained secret. But an examination of the episode, and a similar one in 2003, suggests that the region's political instability and culture of rampant corruption continue to provide a fertile breeding ground for illicit commerce in atomic materials.

Interviews with Georgian and American officials, along with a review of confidential government documents, provide a glimpse into a world of smugglers who slip across poorly policed borders and the agents who try to stop them.

The illicit trade — not just in atomic goods but also in everything from stolen cars to furs to counterfeit $100 bills — thrives especially in Georgia, where tiny separatist regions have broken away to become lawless criminal havens.

This latest uranium seizure, said the American ambassador here, John F. Tefft, "highlights how smuggling and loose border control, associated with Georgia's separatist conflicts," pose a threat "not just to Georgia but to all the international community."

What is most worrisome about the two most recent case, nuclear experts say, is the material itself: in large enough quantities, it could provide a terrorist with an instant solution to the biggest challenge in making a nuclear weapon, obtaining the fuel.

The uranium seized in both 2003 and 2006 had been enriched to nearly 90 percent U-235, according to Russian and American government analyses obtained by The New York Times. Though the quantities were too small to make a bomb, that level of purity is ideal for doing so.

Both cases appear to fit a broader profile: virtually all of the nuclear materials seized since the Soviet breakup are believed to be Russian in origin, according to American government reports.

In these two episodes, the individuals arrested testified that they had obtained the uranium through a web of Russian contacts and middlemen of various nationalities.

An American government laboratory's analysis of the 2006 material — which, among other things, disclosed traces of two rare forms of uranium, U-234 and U-236 — provides "a strong case" that it indeed came from Russia, said Thomas B. Cochran, director of the nuclear program at the Natural Resources Defense Council, a private group that monitors atomic arsenals.

However, a confidential memorandum from the Russian intelligence service, the F.S.B., to the Georgian government said a detailed analysis had been unable to pinpoint the material's origins, though it did not rule out Russian provenance. It also estimated that the uranium had been processed more than a decade ago.

Officials in Georgia, locked in a cold war with Moscow, say the cases underscore their concerns over borders, security and the fate of the breakaway regions.

Georgia's chief nuclear investigator, Archil Pavlenishvili, said that while Russia cooperated in the early stages of the 2003 investigation, in 2006 it had hardly helped at all, beyond taking a sample of the seized material for analysis. He said the Georgians had informed the Russian Embassy here in Tbilisi of Mr. Khinsagov's detention, and had offered to let diplomats speak to him. But the Russians, he said, never responded.

The Georgian interior minister, Ivane Merabishvili, said the cases illustrated the grave risk posed by nuclear trafficking, especially in an age of terrorism. The biggest danger, he said, were the people "in Russia and Georgia and everywhere else, even in America, who will sell this radioactive material" for millions of dollars.

The Russian Interior Ministry and the intelligence service did not respond to requests for comment.

Murat Dzhoyev, the foreign minister of South Ossetia, one of the separatist regions in Georgia, denied that any nuclear smuggling had taken place in his region.

"As concerns their claims that contraband, or moreover, the laughable claim that nuclear materials are going through South Ossetia, that's just funny," he said in an interview. "I hope not a single serious person in the world takes this seriously."

On Friday the United Nations International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna is expected to make the first official announcement with details about the 2006 case.

The old Soviet empire had a vast network of nuclear facilities. After its breakup, as managers abandoned plants and security fell apart, the West grew alarmed as many cases of atomic smuggling came to light.

In 1994 alone, two seizures involved more than five kilos — 11 pounds — of highly enriched uranium. The I.A.E.A. listed more than a dozen cases of illicit trade in highly enriched uranium, along with dozens of seizures of highly radioactive material.

Since 2000, however, the amounts and purity of the seized material has declined as former Soviet republics set up new security precautions, often financed by the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0121713

For instance, Washington provided thousands of hand-held devices meant to detect radiation, and planned to spend a total of $570 million to install small and large radiation detectors, according to recent government reports. In short, the threat seemed to recede.

"People said, 'Hey, the situation's improved,' " said William C. Potter, a leading authority on nuclear smuggling at the Monterey Institute of International Studies in California. The seizures in Georgia, he said, suggest something else: that the trade may simply "have gone under the radar."

The smuggler in the first case, an Armenian named Garik Dadayan, was arrested on June 26, 2003, at Sadakhlo, a muddy village where Georgia meets Armenia and Azerbaijan. With Armenia and Azerbaijan at war over territory, the village had become neutral ground for the trading of tea and cognac, illicit caviar, cheap light bulbs and smuggled gasoline.

When apprehended, Mr. Dadayan, who described himself simply as a businessman, was carrying a tea box that held 170 grams, about seven ounces, of highly enriched uranium. According to the Georgian officials, he said the uranium had come from Novosibirsk, in Siberia, the site of a major Russian nuclear complex that processes vast quantities of highly enriched uranium.

Mr. Pavlenishvili, the Georgian investigator, said the Russian intelligence agency confirmed that before his trip into Georgia, Mr. Dadayan had twice traveled by railroad from Moscow to Novosibirsk.

The smuggler told the authorities that he intended to sell the material to a Turkish middleman named Teimur Sadik; its ultimate destination, he said Mr. Sadik had told him, was "a Muslim man."

Mr. Dadayan was handed over to the Armenian government, tried and sentenced to two and a half years in prison. Mr. Sadik, Georgian authorities say, is now in custody of the Turkish secret services.

Since that episode, the United States has spent millions of dollars to help the Georgians strengthen nuclear security, especially along the borders.

Two years later, Georgian authorities learned that highly enriched uranium was again being offered for sale, this time in South Ossetia, a rugged and beautiful land no bigger than Long Island, with few border controls on either the Russian or Georgian side. People and contraband move freely through its fields and along its mountain roads. The United States says it has discovered counterfeit $100 bills traceable to South Ossetia circulating in at least four American cities.

The man trying to sell the uranium, Georgian officials say, was Oleg Khinsagov, a shabbily dressed 50-year-old trader who specialized in fish and sausages.

Eventually he came into contact with four Georgians who were already under government surveillance. The four men went to North Ossetia, a neighboring region within Russia, and arranged to smuggle the uranium into Georgia. It was at that point that the Georgian authorities set their trap.

They arranged for a Georgian operative who speaks fluent Turkish to meet with the middlemen and tell them he represented a Muslim man from "a serious organization." Mr. Khinsagov and several of his cohort entered Georgia in late January 2006, and on Feb. 1 they were arrested in a two-room apartment on the eighth floor of a crumbling Soviet-style building in a lower-class district of Tbilisi.

"We got that 100 grams and put it into a box and were very afraid," said Mr. Merabishvili, the interior minister. Where the smuggler got the uranium and whether he actually had more remains unclear.

The Georgians called for help from American diplomats, who sent in experts from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department of Energy, American officials say. Mr. Merabishvili said the Americans shocked them by taking the uranium and simply putting it "in their pocket." Uranium in that form emits little radiation and presents little or no danger to its handlers.

When it was analyzed at the Energy Department's laboratory in the Pacific Northwest, it was found to have a U-235 purity of 89.451 percent, "suitable for certain types of research reactors, as a source material for medical isotope production, and for military purposes including nuclear weapons."

Death Of Spy Who Ingested Polonium Spurs Drug Makers (WSJ)

By Steve Levine

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Chemet, a drug developed by Ovation Pharmaceuticals Inc. of Deerfield, Ill., to treat the symptoms of radiation exposure, wasn't getting much attention until last November. But that month, a rare radioactive isotope was used to murder former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko, and a week later, Ovation got a call from the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases: Could the company brief the agency on Chemet?

Ovation is one of a few U.S. drug companies and laboratories that are attracting new attention because of Mr. Litvinenko's death in London from poisoning by polonium-210. In the case of Ovation, the company hasn't received federal funding but thinks its chances have dramatically improved.

DOJ_NMG_0121714

The federal government's interest precedes Mr. Litvinenko's murder, and is linked with the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the U.S. In 2003, the Bush administration launched Project Bioshield, a federal program to obtain drugs against nuclear, biological and chemical agents. One of the program's aims is to prepare for a possible attack on the U.S. by terrorists using a "dirty bomb" -- a conventional explosive laced with a lethal chemical, biological or nuclear agent.

Last fall, the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases in Bethesda, Md., and the Pentagon separately offered funding for research into promising radiation-injury treatments. The institute is looking for remedies for civilians, while the Pentagon is seeking to prolong the lives of soldiers irradiated by nuclear weapons.

Now, pharmaceutical companies are giving notice that drugs they have developed, or are developing, for cancer and other diseases can also be used for exposure to radioactive elements, including possibly polonium-210. Most must be taken within hours of exposure to be effective.

British authorities haven't completed their investigation of Mr. Litvinenko's murder, but say that his killers may have slipped the isotope of polonium-210 into his drink or food Nov. 1, when his first symptoms appeared. He died Nov. 23 in a London hospital after weeks of agony.

Radioactive elements attack the body by damaging the DNA in blood cells. The cells stop dividing and die, and the body ends up short of the blood cells it needs to survive. Chemet (pronounced KEM-et) works by accelerating the evacuation of heavy-metal isotopes from the body. It works by binding with the isotope and moving it from the bone marrow -- essential to produce blood cells -- to the kidney, says Jason Bradt, Ovation's executive director of medical affairs. The movement away from the marrow "increases survivability," he says. Kidney damage can be dealt with later.

Cleveland Biolabs Inc. takes a different approach with its drug Protectan. The Cleveland-based company developed the drug as a cancer treatment, but in November it said it was responding to a Department of Defense announcement seeking a radiation-treatment drug. Andrei Gudkov, the company's chief scientific officer, says that he was inundated with questions after Mr. Litvinenko became an international news story.

Protectan works by preventing cells from self-destructing, thus giving "them a time window to repair the damage," Mr. Gudkov says. "You give the cells the metaphorical equivalent of antidepressants."

Mr. Gudkov says he can't be sure that Protectan, meant to work against gamma rays, will be effective against polonium-210, which emits another kind of energy called alpha particles. Gamma rays pass through solid objects; Alpha particles travel only a short distance, can't penetrate the skin, and only cause damage if ingested or inhaled. Inside the body, alpha particles bombard and punch holes in organs. "I tell them we can't say [Protectan] will work with alpha particles" until it's tested on a nonhuman primate, says Mr. Gudkov.

A third possible antidote for polonium-210 is being developed by Hollis-Eden Pharmaceuticals Inc. of San Diego and the Pentagon. The drug, Neumune, treats radiation by promoting the growth of bone marrow.

But a drug like Neumune starts working only after an isotope like polonium-210 is expelled from the body, says Dwight Stickney, Hollis-Eaton's vice president for medical affairs.

So one idea would be to combine drugs. One like Chemet, for instance, would remove the isotope from a victim's body, or isolate it in a lethally nonthreatening place like the kidney; a drug like Protectan could stop the cells from committing suicide; and one like Neumune could promote production of more blood cells.

"There could be multiple cocktails that could have a synergistic benefit," says Ovation's Mr. Bradt.

Just How Good Is Globalization? (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

The business and political leaders who gather every year at the World Economic Forum have long shared a creed: Globalization is good.

That still is generally true. But this year, many of them are questioning whether it is good for the ordinary wage-earning people they employ -- or in many cases, no longer employ -- at their companies.

A new refrain is emerging in Davos this year: Globalization isn't working for everyone. Stagnating wages and rising job insecurity in developed countries are creating popular disenchantment with the free movement of goods, capital and people across borders. If unchecked, popular fears could turn into a political backlash that could lead to protectionism -- or at least make broad free-trade agreements harder to achieve in the future.

"The anxiety is there, because we have competitors that didn't exist 10 or 15 years ago," German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who arrived in Davos yesterday, said in an interview last week. Governments in the developed world, she said, have to persuade their own middle class -- a group used to a relatively stable economy in the postwar decades -- to embrace a life of constant change and challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0121715

In theory, less-developed countries win from globalization because they get jobs making low-cost products for rich countries. Rich countries win because, in addition to being able to buy inexpensive imports, they also can sell more sophisticated products like machine tools or financial services to emerging economies.

"The first win is there, but the second win is going to the owners of capital rather than labor," says Stephen Roach, chief economist at Morgan Stanley.

Many companies in the U.S. and Europe have been able to squeeze workers' pay increases by threatening to move production abroad. In the past decade, real labor incomes in the U.S. have grown at roughly half the rate of labor productivity, Mr. Roach says.

The reason for this is simple: With the emergence of China, India and countries from the former Soviet bloc, companies from the established economies of North America, Europe and Japan have more choices on where to invest. That puts them in a stronger bargaining position with workers in their home countries.

"There is compression of wages as a result of the number of workers competing for jobs," says Laura Tyson, dean of London Business School. As a result, an ever-larger share of national income in the U.S., Japan and Western Europe is going to company profits. The share that flows to workers is dwindling, which explains why worker anxiety is becoming an election issue in the U.S. and elsewhere.

Others at Davos say the problem isn't capital versus labor, it is that changing technology and trade patterns put high-skilled workers increasingly in demand, reducing the demand for less-skilled workers. "Skilled workers are enjoying rapid wage increases, but unskilled workers have had very slow wage rises in recent decades," says Ken Rogoff, a professor of economics at Harvard University.

To be sure, many businesspeople in Davos believe the problem is one of perceptions, and that fears about trade undermining living standards in developed countries are misplaced.

"What can we do to educate politicians to the reality that a rising tide floats all ships?" asks E. Neville Isdell, chief executive of Coca-Cola Co. In politics, the voices of interest groups can outweigh the wider good, he says. "We have to develop a less academic approach to explaining the benefits of globalization."

Mr. Isdell hopes governments will make the case that when U.S. companies move some jobs to China, the resulting gain in productivity can create a larger number of new jobs at home. The irony of heightened anxiety over job security, he says, is that it comes at a time of low unemployment in the U.S. and other advanced economies such as the United Kingdom.

The problem, many participants agree, is that workers in the West aren't equipped for today's pace of change, in which jobs come and go and skills can quickly become redundant.

"You have to have a better education system from preschool onward," says William McDonough, vice chairman of Merrill Lynch & Co. He recognizes, however, that improved education is a long-term remedy that won't help those feeling the pressure of rising global competition today.

"A shorter-term strategy is to have more assistance for workers who are laid off," Mr. McDonough says. "I think we need to be much more helpful as a society to people who are the victims of globalization." Such aid should be supported by the state, he adds.

Others support programs like the Scandinavian-style retraining of workers who lose their jobs. "Paradoxically, we need a bigger role of the public sector in the economy to make markets work better," says Nouriel Roubini, chairman of Roubini Global Economics, an online economic-advisory service.

Liberians Love Their Iron Lady, For Now (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

MONROVIA, LIBERIA — Liberians call her "da woma," in their soft patois where the word endings seem to die in the steamy West African heat.

"Da woma', she tra' her bes'," they tell you earnestly, if you inquire about the state of affairs in a country shredded by a 14-year civil war. "She tra'." She's trying.

One hip-hop song played on Monrovia radio these days just calls her Ma.

At times, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Africa's first elected female head of state, seems like a mild, smiling, grandmotherly figure. Diminutive and bespectacled, she travels about the country wearing jeans and a baseball cap. She can't resist hurrying over to speak to small children who catch her eye.

Yet the 68-year-old president also is a feisty, ambitious economist trying to turn around one of the most damaged and traumatized countries on Earth, with a ferociousness that has earned her another nickname: the Iron Lady. Friends say she's so strong she didn't even cry out during childbirth.

DOJ_NMG_0121716

"Ellie, she don't cry," said Gibson Jerue, publisher of the independent newspaper Public Agenda, who once fled Liberia fearing for his life after he wrote an article headlined "Charles Taylor's Days Are Numbered," on the warlord who was then Liberia's president.

Today, nearly 3 1/2 years after the war ended with Taylor's exile and a year after Johnson-Sirleaf took office, the most visible progress in this grimy, bullet-pocked capital is a few wan strings of fairy lights draped on dilapidated street awnings.

After years without electricity, some shops have thrown up a yard or two of the lights, which look more like an afterthought than a celebration. Still, as the winking bulbs struggle against Liberia's velvety darkness, their glow exudes sweet optimism.

Johnson-Sirleaf is under no illusions: A few more months or a year without bringing jobs and her people's love and admiration will themselves blink out. But for now she offers hope of a new beginning to a nation torn by war's atrocities, many of them committed by doped-up children who fought in drag and believed magic could protect them from the bullets.

When she changes into colorful Liberian costume for official functions, Johnson-Sirleaf seems to blossom like a tropical flower. Her raspy, charismatic voice rises powerfully as she addresses the crowds.

She is divorced with four sons and six grandchildren, and comes from a pious family. As a student, her only ambition was to be a schoolteacher like her mother. Both her grandmothers, one of whom had a market stall, were illiterate.

She played soccer with the boys, a rarity in those days. She was a lethal volleyball player, leaping up and whacking the ball two-handed across court, a shot that almost never failed.

After studying in the United States, she returned home to become finance minister under President William Tolbert in the early 1970s. After she was jailed by the regime of Samuel Doe in 1985 and was charged with treason under Taylor in 1997, she went into exile. She worked for the World Bank, Citibank, the International Monetary Fund and other organizations.

High standards

Johnson-Sirleaf has a fierce sense of probity: As finance minister, she was livid when close friend Clavenda Bright-Parker, who had a pharmacy business, told her that she had paid a $25 bribe to the ministry to speed up a check that was slow in coming.

"She got so upset with me," recalled Bright-Parker, still a friend and supporter. "She said I should know better than that — I am ruining her ministry. She has a standard she wants to maintain. She said, 'I should send your name in.' "

Johnson-Sirleaf has known for more than two decades, since elections in 1985, that the presidency could be hers. That year she was elected a senator.

"Once I got into my real first election, then of course the die was cast," she said. "At that point I knew that my popularity could take me to the presidency."

She withstood pressure from Doe to get out of politics before the elections and to not serve as senator.

"At that time, I became a folk hero for doing those things," she said in a recent interview in her Monrovia office.

After a coup attempt against Doe later that year, there were arrests and reprisal killings. A group of drunken soldiers seized her in what was to become her worst ordeal.

"I was taken to the military prison," she said. "In fact, as we were going, they told me they were going to take me to the beach and bury me alive. They started in that direction, changed their minds, put me through tortures, put matches to my hair. They said, 'We're going to burn your hair off,' but didn't do it. They would come as close as possible. It clearly was just meant to terrorize me.

"That particular night in prison, anything could have happened."

At one point, all the men in the cell with her were taken out, and she heard gunshots. She waited in terror, convinced the soldiers would come to shoot her next. Then a soldier came to open her cell with what seemed a clear intent to rape her.

He was interrupted. A senior officer, who happened to be from her father's tribe, saw him and barked, "As you were," an order to desist. The officer sat outside her cell all night to protect her.

"And I don't know him until now," she said. "He's never made himself known to me."

Later, soldiers brought a woman to the cell, naked.

"I started a great plea with the soldiers that they couldn't do this. Think of their mother, think of their sister, would they like someone to do that to their mother? After a while, they brought a cloth to cover her up."

But Johnson-Sirleaf said she never begged or broke down, a strength she attributes to her family's strong Christian faith.

"I never did cry, no. I've been through some difficult political times … and I guess I just developed a thick skin, and that inner strength is something that's hard to explain," she said. "I guess it comes from one's childhood, it comes from one's life experiences. It comes from one's faith and your family values."

A daunting task

DOJ_NMG_0121717

Liberia today seems a country of slogans, acronyms and good intentions. Crudely painted notice boards tell the population (more than half of which can't read) how to live: "Stop mob violence; use the law." "Say no to cigarettes, pipes and chewing tobacco." "Raped? Get help." Some are slapped up on walls by indignant residents: "Only dogs urinate here."

The acronyms of dozens of international nongovernmental organizations litter the country, proclaiming their intended sites for schools and clinics.

In Monrovia, the capital, a teeming population jostles and hustles. The smell of sewage pervades some streets. The city seems to exhale grime, leaving a grubby sheen upon the skin.

The hip-hop song about Johnson-Sirleaf is called "A Letter to the President."

Hello, Ma. See, what we need is change, a change from suffering, a change from poverty. You can make it, Ma. We trust you; that's why we voted for you.

To help jump-start the economy, Johnson-Sirleaf is relying on an end to diamond sanctions imposed by the United Nations, a revival of the rubber and timber industries, and an iron ore project by Mittal Steel offering more than 3,000 jobs.

A key donors conference is to be held in February. And moves to resolve the country's IMF debt are crucial if Liberia is to borrow from countries such as China, which wants to invest $1 billion thanks to Liberia's abundant resources.

Hounded by a question

One big step for Liberia was the arrest of Taylor in March, which sent a shudder of relief through the country.

When the former president was in exile in Nigeria, which granted him asylum after the war ended in 2003, the question of his extradition on international war crimes charges dogged Johnson-Sirleaf everywhere — especially on a trip to the United States, which had pressed for his arrest. Hoping her cooperation would attract donor funds, she asked a reluctant Nigeria to hand him over.

Then came the news: Taylor had escaped.

"At first I thought: 'How could this be? Was this with the knowledge of the Nigerian government? Were they setting him free? What would be the implications for our whole peace here? Would he end up here?' And the implication of that was serious. But then, when he was caught, I realized that Nigeria has its own ways of solving problems," she said, laughing wryly.

Later she had to face the fury of Taylor's greatest supporter, Libyan leader Moammar Kadafi. In a meeting in Tripoli, the Libyan capital, Kadafi thrust out his wrist at her, displaying a flashy watch. Look at it, he told her. Charles Taylor gave it to me. Then he berated her over the decision to hand Taylor over to a U.N. war crimes tribunal.

Taylor allies still circulate in Liberia, and Johnson-Sirleaf's security force has reported several assassination plots.

"If someone's willing to give his life to kill you, he'll probably kill you," she said. She eschews a heavy security presence.

"I don't want to be that kind of president," she said. "I like to remain what they call me, the people's president."

Johnson-Sirleaf has drastically cut the civil service, restored power and water to parts of Monrovia, pursued corrupt former officials and pressured the international community to help the country by lifting the diamond sanctions and forgiving its unsustainable level of debt.

Her government is admired abroad — in Washington, she won a standing ovation at a joint session of Congress last year — but is often lambasted in the independent local press. To her opponents, her famous tough exterior translates as vindictiveness; to supporters, it shows she's the only one strong enough to save Liberia from itself.

Even giving birth, she amazed her mother-in-law with her toughness, friend Bright-Parker said. There was no crying from the labor pains.

But at times her eyes do mist up. Perhaps it's when she asks a child in the street why he's not in school and hears there is no money.

"I cry quicker for the simple things than for the tougher things," she said. She recently visited the family of a well-known young journalist who had died of unexplained causes.

"He had two little children, and the little boy came to me and put his head in my lap and said, 'You know my father was everything to me.'

"Those things will break me a lot quicker than a soldier threatening me."

OPEC President Takes In Stride Decline In Prices (WSJ)

By Adam Smallman

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland -- OPEC's new president said that he would like higher oil prices than current levels, but that the long-term outlook was more important than a near-term price slide.

Mohammed al-Hamli, president of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries and oil minister for the United Arab Emirates, said he would be at ease if the cartel's reference basket of 11 of its members' crude oils was about $55 a barrel.

DOJ_NMG_0121718

OPEC on Tuesday pegged the basket of crude-oil types it watches at $49.52 a barrel, and that basket typically fetches prices $5 a barrel or more below the benchmark U.S. price.

Benchmark U.S. oil prices peaked at about $77 a barrel last summer and have declined since, as the increase ate into demand in parts of the industrialized world. In addition, the U.S. is awash in heating oil, an unusually mild winter has dashed global consumption expectations, and new oil fields entering production are easing long-held supply concerns.

"I was worried when we lost 12% on these prices," said Mr. al-Hamli on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum here. "People panicked when they took a collective slide. So, we are concerned -- but not very concerned." OPEC, he said, prefers a long-term view, adding that "we don't react to today's and tomorrow's prices."

His remarks underscore some of the uncertainty OPEC faces amid the volatile oil prices of recent weeks. Late last week, Ali Naimi, the influential Saudi oil minister and OPEC's de facto leader, said the global oil market is in a "very healthy condition."

Speculators also contributed to the rapid decline in prices, their faith in a drop buttressed by what appeared to be slack OPEC discipline in meeting its agreed-upon cuts.

Mr. al-Hamli, who succeeded Nigerian oil minister Edmund Daukoru as cartel president this year, is convinced the market has underestimated the strength of the cartel's compliance. "They can think whatever they like. We're happy with the compliance" to the group's first tranche of cuts, he said, adding that the additional Feb. 1 cut was necessary to respond to falling oil prices.

With an eye toward swelling global crude and product stockpiles, and the seasonal downturn in demand that occurs in the quarter that ends in June, OPEC's 10 members with quotas, excluding Iraq, agreed in October to cut their output 4%, or 1.2 million barrels a day, to about 26.3 million barrels a day. In December, OPEC met again and tacked on a further cut of 500,000 barrels a day commencing Feb. 1 -- lowering output, on paper at least, to 25.8 million barrels a day.
